[1-3] Appellants argue first that under the circumstances existing, the irrigation district has become the "competent authority" referred to in the option and contract. It is argued that while the railroad commission was such competent authority so long as the public utility continued to be the purchaser of the water, when the contract was assigned by the public utility to the city of San Diego, the railroad commission lost its authority; that the city then became the purchaser of water from the district on the same basis as any private individual, and that under the provisions of the Constitution and the California Irrigation District Act (St. 1897, p. 254, as amended), the irrigation district then became the competent authority referred to with full power to fix the rates for such water. We are unable to agree with this contention. While the railroad commission originally had control over the public utility, and while it continued to have control over the rates that this utility should charge its consumers, it had no control over the irrigation district. Glenn-Colusa Irr. Dist. v. Paulson, 75 Cal. App. 57, 242 P. 494; Water Users' Ass'n v. Railroad Commission, 188 Cal. 437, 205 P. 682; Henderson v. Oroville-Wyandotte Irr. Dist., 207 Cal. 215, 277 P. 487. The only way the railroad commission could have exercised control over this rate would have been indirectly by refusing to permit the utility to sell its system to the irrigation district, except upon conditions that would have covered these rates. City of Pasadena v. Railroad Commission, 183 Cal. 526, 192 P. 25, 10 A. L. R. 1425; Glenn-Colusa Irr. Dist. v. Paulson, supra. No such conditions were inserted in their order approving this sale from the public utility to the irrigation district. The railroad commission neither had authority over this rate during the time the utility continued to receive water from the district, nor do we think any change in the authority to fix the rate was worked by the sale from the utility to the city. The city of San Diego, as such, would not have authority to fix the purchase price of water thus being purchased in bulk for distribution to individual consumers.

Marin Water, etc., Co. v. Town of Sausalito, 168 Cal. 587, 143 P. 767, 772. Nor do we think the irrigation district either possessed or acquired by this transfer an authority not possessed by the other party to the contract to change the rate at will. The contract remained the same and the transfer to the city was expressly approved and consented to by the irrigation district. In fact, the district appears to have received an additional benefit through the transfer, having stipulated in its consent thereto for a limitation on the amount of water to be furnished, which does not previously appear in the written agreements.

[4, 5] Appellants rely upon section 13 of article 11 of the Constitution and upon sections 55 (as amended by St. 1927, p. 205), 61b (as added by St. 1915, p. 1291, § 1), 15 (as amended by St. 1927, p. 23, § 1), 15c (as added by St. 1917, p. 758, § 9), 18 (as amended by St. 1929, p. 657), and 39f (as amended by St. 1925, p. 501) of the California Irrigation District Act, as giving to an irrigation district the right to fix rates in such a case as the one before us. Without quoting these various sections, we may observe that while authority is given to irrigation districts to fix rates within their boundaries, and for surplus water sold to outsiders, it is also to be noted that such a district is given rather broad powers in reference to making and entering into agreements with other individuals and corporations, both public and private, for the purpose of acquiring for the district water rights and water systems. We find neither in these sections nor elsewhere any specific authority given to an irrigation district to fix or establish rates for water sold or delivered outside its own boundaries, in disregard of or irrespective of such a contract as we now have under consideration under which a district has acquired practically an entire system upon the condition of continuing to furnish water for the benefit of ultimate consumers in a portion of the territory theretofore served by the water system thus acquired. Such water is in no sense of the word surplus water. South Pasadena v. Pasadena Land, etc., Co., 152 Cal. 579, 93 P. 490, 496. As was said in the case of Marin Water, etc., Co. v. Town of Sausalito, supra: "No case has been presented holding that a municipal corporation may vary the terms of its own solemn contract, under the guise of rate regulation." We think the same applies to an irrigation district. In the same case Mr. Justice Shaw, in a concurring opinion, points out that even where a company has the right to fix its own rate, an agreement for the sale of its water upon such a rate is binding upon both parties, at least until a different rate is fixed by some proper authority. While an irrigation district is given authority by the Constitution and the Irrigation District Act to contract for and to acquire an existing water system, and while with the consent of the railroad commission it may even acquire such a system from a public utility, on the other hand, when a district has made such a contract it has no inherent power in itself to change the terms thereof. In support of their contention that in the absence of any regulation by an authorized rate-fixing body, the rate for this water could be fixed by the irrigation district itself, appellants quote from Henrici v. South Feather Land, etc., Co., 177 Cal. 442, 170 P. 1135, 1137, as follows: "Under the law, the water might have been furnished under rates fixed by public authority. In the absence of any such regulation (and there has been none during the period here involved), the service might have been rendered either on rates fixed by the corporation or on terms agreed upon by it with the customer."

[6, 7] While the fixing of the rate we are considering might have been left to the irrigation district, it was, in fact, fixed by an agreement between the district and its customer. We are unable to see that the situation, as thus established, was changed by operation of law by the later transfer of this agreement from the public utility to the city of San Diego, especially in view of the fact that this transfer was consented to by the district with full knowledge of the facts. Henderson v. Oroville-Wyandotte Irrig. Dist., supra. In the absence of any competent authority to change the rate as contemplated in the agreement, the terms of the contract would continue binding upon the parties until such time as the same was changed by mutual consent, or until such time as such a competent authority should be created by law. We think, therefore, that the relationship between the parties hereto is purely contractual, and that the appellant irrigation district did not become, by operation of law, the "competent authority" referred to in the option.

[8] The second contention of appellants is that under the terms of the option of April 5, 1924, as later embodied in the contract under which they acquired the water system, their obligation to furnish water to these districts ceased at the end of three years. Their contention is that it was optional with the district whether it would continue to furnish water after that time, and therefore that any water so furnished was exactly like any surplus water sold by the district to any individual outside its boundaries, with the corresponding right in the district to fix the price thereof. Their argument is that this was merely a contract to sell a commodity, water in bulk, that no easement or servitude was involved, and that a contract for the sale of a commodity, which is silent as to its duration, may be terminated after a reasonable time by either party. In support of this, they cite the case of Southern Pacific Co. v. Spring Valley W. Co., 173 Cal. 291, 159 P. 865, L. R.

A. 1917E, 680. As pointed out by the court in that case, such a principle, although discussed therein, does not apply where the parties are dealing in water, subject to the rights of others in its continued use. In this case the contract was entered into with knowledge of, and with a consideration of, the rights of the water users in the communities named, and the irrigation district is bound thereby. Henrici v. South Feather Land, etc., Co., supra; Henderson v. Oroville-Wyandotte Irrig. Dist., supra. The irrigation district definitely agreed to "continue to furnish water" to the utility, "for East San Diego, Normal Heights and Kensington Park territory now being furnished with water by the Cuyamaca System," and assented to the transfer of this agreement to the city.

[9] Under these circumstances, the irrigation district accepted the obligation and duty of delivering water, first to the Cuyamaca Water Company and later to the city of San Diego, for the purpose of distribution to the inhabitants of these particular communities. Having accepted such obligation and duty in consideration of other benefits accruing to the district, it must be held that the very considerable system acquired by the district from the water company, was acquired subject to the burden of continuing the service in question. The water in question was water theretofore dedicated to the use of the people of these districts, and was not such surplus water as the district may sell at its pleasure. In reference to a somewhat similar situation, the Supreme Court says in the case of South Pasadena v. Pasadena Land, etc., Co., supra: "In truth, however, the city will not be selling its surplus in the sense intended by the statute. The right to the use of the required quantity of this water is now vested in the city of South Pasadena and its inhabitants within the portion of its territory where it is to be served, and the city of Pasadena does not propose to take away this right. It is about to buy only the right of the Pasadena Land & Water Company to the water, which did not include the use. It will be obliged to put it to the same use as fully as that company is now compelled to do so. Water which is in this manner dedicated to the use of an outside community, cannot be at the same time surplus water subject to sale to others. The sale is already, in effect, accomplished. The city of Pasadena, with respect to this part of the water, will hold title as a mere trustee, bound to apply it to the use of those beneficially interested."

To the same effect, see East Bay Mu. Dist. v. Railroad Commission, 194 Cal. 603, 229 P. 949. In Fellows v. City of Los Angeles, 151 Cal. 52, 90 P. 137, it was held that although a city may purchase an entire water system and water supply with the avowed object of securing the surplus water, it cannot continue to hold and control such property as has been appropriated to public use and at the same time refuse to perform the public duty imposed upon it by possession, and it must continue to furnish water to those entitled thereto. See, also, La Mesa, etc., District v. Halley, 197 Cal. 50, 239 P. 719; Henderson v. Oroville-Wyandotte Irrigation District, supra. In Hewitt v. San Jacinto, etc., Irrigation District, 124 Cal. 186, 56 P. 893, 895, a water company had transferred its system to an irrigation district, with the exception of the right to the delivery of certain water previously granted to others, including the plaintiff. In speaking of the relation of the irrigation district to the rights of the plaintiff, the court said: "It purchased the property of the Water Company subject to this burden, and on no just principle can hold the property discharged thereof." Not only was this obligation a continuing one, but under the terms of the agreement under which the appellant acquired all its rights, the obligation was to continue to furnish water at the same rate until such time as this rate should be superseded by the order of some public agency, upon which had been conferred power sufficient for that purpose. In the case of Henrici v. South Feather Land, etc., Co., supra, the plaintiff had a contract for the purchase of water at a certain price, with a corporation which was engaged in the business of furnishing and supplying water to the public for hire, which contract did not specify how long the obligation should continue. That corporation transferred its property to another public service corporation which undertook to change the rate. In reference thereto the court said: "The obligation to furnish water at the agreed rate was unlimited in time, and continued until the rate was superseded by order of a public body vested with the power of regulating the service."

[10] Not only have the rights of these parties, as fixed by contract, not been changed by operation of law, but in our opinion that clause of this contract providing for the delivery of water at the rate agreed upon "until such time as this rate may be changed by competent authority," does not contemplate that the "competent authority" referred to shall be the irrigation district. "A contract must be so interpreted as to give effect to the mutual intention of the parties as it existed at the time of contracting, so far as the same is ascertainable and lawful." Civ. Code, § 1636. In Palmero L. & W. Co. v. Railroad Commission, 173 Cal. 380, 160 P. 228, 229, it was held that a provision in a contract that water was to be supplied "at such rates as may be fixed by law in the district in which said lands are situated," contemplated that the rate should be fixed by public authority. The words used here, "until such time as this rate may be changed by competent authority," show an intention that any change in the rate shall be made only by some public agency specifically authorized by law to regulate such charges. The language used seems to us to negative the idea that the seller or party collecting the charges is, or could be, the authority intended. To hold otherwise makes the clause meaningless. A contract should be so construed as to give force and effect to every part of it. Civ. Code, § 1641. In the same sentence the party who is to pay the rate fixed, agrees not to ask for a "rehearing or rerating" for a period of three years. This party had theretofore been subject to the regulation of the railroad commission, and while allowance was thus made for the fact that this regulation would cease, in so far as this rate was concerned, and for possible future changes in the law as affecting the rate-fixing authority it is apparent that the very thing the utility was trying to do was to protect itself from such an arbitrary raise in rates by the irrigation district as is now attempted. And to this protection the other party agreed.

[11] If there be doubt as to the meaning of words used in a contract, the court may look to the understanding which was given to it and acted upon by both parties. D. Ghirardelli & Co. v. Students' E. & T. Co., 175 Cal. 427, 166 P. 16. Some light may here be obtained from this source. It appears that the railroad commission withheld for a time its approval of this transfer from the water company to the irrigation district in the hope that a compromise which had been suggested by the railroad commission could be arrived at between the irrigation district and the city of San Diego in reference to their conflicting claims to water from the San Diego river. In a supplemental agreement dated June 13, 1925, between the water company and the irrigation district, such a compromise is referred to at length, and it is therein agreed that in the event the irrigation district should be able to make such a satisfactory settlement with the city of San Diego, including an arrangement by which the city of San Diego should purchase from the water company its distribution system covering East San Diego, Normal Heights, and Kensington Park, then and in that event the water company "will waive and relinquish the right given it and contained in said option to purchase water from said Cuyamaca system, after the consummation and carrying out of this contract of purchase and sale, at the rate of nine (9) cents per hundred cubic feet, and will waive and relinquish all right to purchase any water for supplying said above mentioned territories." In a later agreement between the same parties, dated December, 1925, this provision in the supplemental agreement of June 13, 1925, is stricken out, the compromise not having been effected. It seems reasonable to suppose that had such a compromise gone through the irrigation district would have given up something of value in consideration for the benefit thus obtained. In any event, it is apparent from this action that the irrigation district recognized a definite obligation to furnish water for distribution in those particular territories at the rate named, and that the obligation was one from which they desired to escape.

Again, in the agreement of September 27, 1926, under which the water company leased the remainder of its system to the city of San Diego with an exclusive option to purchase the same, the contract to purchase water at the 9-cent rate contained in the original option is copied verbatim, with the statement that while a number of modifications and extensions of time were subsequently executed, none of said modifications "in any shape, manner or form" changed "the obligation of the district to furnish to the lessors herein water at nine (9) cents per hundred cubic feet as above set forth"; and then appears the following: "Whereas, said obligation to so furnish said water now so rests upon said district; and

"Whereas, said district consents to the transfer of said contract to so furnish water by said Cuyamaca Water Company to The City of San Diego, as is shown by Exhibit A, attached hereto and made a part hereof."

The contract then goes on to provide as follows: "It is further understood and agreed that when and after this contract shall have been executed and The City shall be permitted to take water at nine (9) cents per hundred cubic feet under the assignment of the nine (9) cent water contract to it, the said payment shall be for water service and not for the purchase of water; it being understood and agreed that the lessors are only transferring such rights as to furnishing water as they have acquired from the La Mesa, Lemon Grove & Spring Valley Irrigation District in their said contracts with said districts."

Attached to said contract is a copy of a resolution unanimously adopted by the board of directors of the irrigation district, in which the president and secretary of the district are authorized to consent in writing "to the transfer of the existing contract between Cuyamaca Water Company and said District for water furnished and to be furnished to the East San Diego, Normal Heights and Kensington Park District. This consent is given, however, on the express understanding and in consideration that the assignee of said contract take the same subject to the understanding upon which said contract is now held by said Cuyamaca Water Company, to-wit: That the District shall not be obligated at any time to furnish more in any one year than the equivalent of a uniform flow of one million gallons of water per day." While it does not appear that any further consent was signed by the president and secretary of the irrigation district, it does appear that the district acted upon the transfer by furnishing to the city the water it was obligated to furnish to the water company. It will be noted that in thus consenting to the transfer of this agreement, including the obligation to furnish water at the 9-cent rate, while the irrigation district is careful to call attention to a limitation in the amount of water that the district is obliged to furnish in any one year, no objection is made to the recital in the transfer from the water company to the city that "said obligation to so furnish said water now so rests upon said district," and further that the district is still obligated to furnish to the lessors water at 9 cents per hundred cubic feet. It seems to us this throws considerable light upon the intention of the parties. The language used in the resolution that the district shall not be obligated to furnish more than a certain amount of water "in any one year" is also significant. The record shows that the entire transfer of the water system from the water company to the irrigation district, when finally consummated, was put through as of the date of the original option, April 5, 1924, so when this consent to the transfer to the city of San Diego was given by the district, nearly two of the three years had passed. The use of the words "in any one year," instead of words appropriate to one remaining year, indicates that at that time the irrigation district still considered the obligation a continuing one.

A further indication that the irrigation district did not consider that their obligation to furnish this water ended with the three-year period, during which it had been agreed that no rerating or rehearing should be asked for, is found in the fact that, while under the terms of the contract this three years expired on April 5, 1927, the irrigation district continued to furnish water at the rate named until March 1, 1929, at which time their contention in this regard was first brought to the attention of the respondent.

For the reasons set forth we conclude, as an answer to the specific questions which the parties, by stipulation, have submitted as involved herein: 1. That the appellant irrigation district has not the right to fix and determine the price to be paid by the respondent city for water furnished for distribution to the individual consumers in East San Diego, Normal Heights, and Kensington Park under the terms of the option and contract mentioned. 2. That the irrigation district may be enjoined from discontinuing or shutting off such water for the nonpayment of a rate fixed by the district in excess of that named in the contract. We think, however, that from that portion of the judgment reading as follows: "It is Ordered, Adjudged and Decreed that the defendants and each of them be and they are hereby restrained from discontinuing or shutting off the supply of water heretofore furnished to the plaintiff as set out in the Complaint herein or from the raising of rates for the service of such water until such time as the raising of rates therefor be authorized either by the Railroad Commission of the State of California or by the City of San Diego," the words "either by the Railroad Commission of the State of California or by the City of San Diego" should be stricken out, and instead thereof the words "by some public rate-fixing body" should be substituted. And the trial court is directed to make such modification.

As so modified, the judgment is affirmed.

SHERRIFFS v. SCOTT.

Civ. 7637.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 2, California.

Nov. 10, 1930.

1. Appeal and error ¶543.

It was incumbent on appellant to start proceedings to restore papers removed or lost from clerk's office which were necessary part of record on appeal.

2. Appeal and error ¶607(1).

Court properly terminated proceedings for settlement of transcript on ground appellant's delay of more than year was unreasonable.

3. Appeal and error ¶627(2).

Where appellant failed to excuse unreasonable delay in preparing record on appeal, appeal would be dismissed (Supreme Court Rule 5).

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John J. Van Nostrand, Judge.

Action by Alex Sherriffs against A. W. Scott, Jr. From the judgment, defendant appeals. On motion to dismiss the appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

Sidney Rhein, Geo. M. Naus, and Frank Golden, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Young, Hudson & Rabinowitz and Alan H. Critcher, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, P. J.

The respondent moves to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that the appellant has been guilty of unreasonable delay and laches in the preparation of the record and has failed to file a transcript within the time prescribed by law. Judgment was entered against the appellant on November 19, 1928, in an action upon appellant's written guaranty for the payment of a promissory note. Notice of appeal was filed on January 9, 1929, and, on the same day, the appellant filed with the county clerk his request to prepare a transcript under section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure. On August 12, 1930, upon motion of respondent, proceedings for the settlement of said transcript were terminated by order of the superior court. To date no transcript has been filed in this court.

Appellant's laches in the prosecution of the appeal is conceded, but he seeks to excuse the delay upon the ground that at some stage of the proceedings the papers constituting the judgment roll were removed from or lost in the clerk's office. Both parties seemed to have been content to place upon the other the burden of finding or restoring these papers. At this time, approximately two years after the entry of the judgment, they have not been restored, and, so far as we can learn from this record, no steps have been taken to restore them.

[1, 2] The existence of a judgment roll was of no interest to the respondent unless he might find it necessary for the purposes of execution of the judgment. It was of interest to the appellant if he intended to prosecute his appeal because it was a necessary part of the record on appeal. Having notified the clerk to prepare a transcript under section 953a and having learned that some of the necessary papers were lost or missing, it was incumbent upon him to start proceedings to restore those papers so that the record on appeal could be prepared. Hence, when, more than a year after the notice of appeal and after the notice to the clerk, the superior court was moved to dismiss and terminate proceedings for settlement of the transcript it had before it a case where appellant's delay and laches were unreasonable and upon that ground it ordered those proceedings terminated. In so doing that court was acting within the bounds of its discretion and nothing has been presented here which would tend to show that such discretion has been abused. Williams v. Williams, 176 Cal. 230, 168 P. 19; Crocker v. Crocker, 76 Cal. App. 606, 609, 245 P. 438.

[3] It being conceded that the transcript has not been filed within the time prescribed by law and the appellant having failed to excuse his unreasonable delay in the preparation of the record, this becomes a proper case for the dismissal of the appeal under rule 5 of the Supreme Court.

Appeal dismissed.

BURROUGHS, Justice pro tem.

This is an action for personal injuries. The cause was tried before a jury. The verdict was for defendants, and judgment was entered accordingly. Plaintiff thereafter moved for a new trial, and the motion was granted upon the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict.

Defendants appeal from the order granting a new trial. Appellants' sole contention in support of the appeal is that the plaintiff's version of the accident is impossible of credence because of the physical facts as shown by the evidence. Plaintiff was at work as a stevedore in the employ of the Bayside Steamship Company on Pier 17 adjoining the Embarcadero, San Francisco. Much of the testimony given refers to a blackboard map made by witnesses with the assistance of the attorneys which is not a part of this record.

However, after a careful study of the evidence as transcribed, it appears that Pier 17 extends in an easterly and westerly direction from the Embarcadero into the bay. Through the center of the pier from west to east extends a driveway estimated to be 25 feet wide. This driveway is for the use of the public in carrying freight to or from the pier, and is marked off from the sides by a seemingly slight depression variously described, but serving the purpose of defining the driveway from the side spaces immediately north and south of it in which freight is stacked to be loaded on ships or carried from the pier. On the day of the accident, a ship was on the north side of the pier, and this plaintiff with another stevedore in the employ of the Bayside Steamship Company was engaged in carrying freight on a flat truck from the ship across the driveway and there stacking it. Each flat truck was handled by two men, one pulling on the end of the tongue and one pushing from the rear. Plaintiff's story is that he and his companion worker had placed their flat truck in the space allotted, south of the driveway parallel to the driveway, and that the north side of the flat truck was about 4 feet south of the south line of the driveway, the tongue of the flat truck being to the east; that plaintiff and companion were in the act of removing a heavy case from the truck to the floor south of the truck; that plaintiff was on the north side of said flat truck pushing the case toward the south side, his companion pulling from the south side, with plaintiff facing south and bracing himself on his right foot, which was farthest to the north, when the accident happened. It is undisputed that in some manner one of the wheels of a Ford tractor or its trailer driven by one of the defendants from the western entrance of the pier toward the east ran over the plaintiff's right foot; the injury being on the outside of the foot from toe toward heel, and more or less on the front of the instep. There is no question as to this fact nor as to the extent of the injury.

Plaintiff contends that, as the tractor with its trailer approached the place where he was at work, it swerved to the south of the south driveway line, and one of the wheels ran over plaintiff's foot while he was in the position above described.

Evidence shows that at some disputed point east of the spot where plaintiff received his injury the tractor and its trailer were turned across to the north side of the driveway to discharge its freight on the north side.

Defendants contend that the tractor with its trailer at no time swerved from the driveway south of the south driveway line, but that plaintiff was on or close to the driveway, and that he was working when the driver first saw him at a distance of 50 or 60 feet, but that, when the driver passed him, he was standing still and looking in the direction of the on-coming tractor; that the plaintiff misjudged his step and put his right foot under the wheel. Defendant did not know of the accident until after he had crossed to the north side of the driveway.

Defendant produced a number of witnesses who testified to the effect that the space on the south of the driveway in which plaintiff claims to have been was filled with stacked freight up to the south line of the driveway, thus making it impossible for the plaintiff to have been south of the driveway, and tending to support defendants' claim that plaintiff was standing on the driveway.

Plaintiff produced a number of witnesses who testified to the effect that the space was ample for him to have been exactly where he claims to have been. It was not disputed that the men had been at work not over a half hour and that this was the first load of freight these men had brought out.

We see nothing physically impossible in the plaintiff's contention that a wheel traveling east could have struck plaintiff's right foot at the toe, raking the outside of the foot toward the heel, with the plaintiff in the position above described.

It appears more probable than the defendants' contention, especially in view of the fact that plaintiff was injured in no way except the injury to his right foot. Had plaintiff been facing the tractor, and stepped forward, or in any manner toward the tractor, it is difficult to see how the foot alone would have been injured.

There are numerous controversies in the evidence. We have discussed only the one point raised by appellants. Appellants' authorities are all to the effect that, where testimony in the light of undisputed facts is inherently improbable and impossible of credence, the appellate court is bound to recognize that certain facts are controlled by immutable physical laws, citing 10 Cal. Jur. p. 1169 § 381.

[1] A careful study of plaintiff's case as transcribed has presented no such difficulty to our minds. The trial judge, having the advantage of seeing and hearing all witnesses, is in a better position to judge the weight and bearing of the evidence offered and the credibility of the witnesses. As said in Green v. Soule, 145 Cal. 102, 78 P. 337, 340: "The trial court cannot rest upon a conflict in the evidence, but must weigh and consider the evidence for both parties, and determine for itself the just conclusion to be drawn from it. 'Where the decision is against the weight of the evidence, it is the duty of that court to grant a new trial.'"

[2-4] There is conflict in the testimony, but, while an appellate court will not review a verdict where the evidence shows a substantial conflict, the trial court is in a very different position on a hearing of a motion for a new trial. As said in Brush v. Pacific Electric R. R. Co., 58 Cal. App. 506, 208 P. 997, 1000: "If the trial judge, notwithstanding a conflict in the testimony, is satisfied that the verdict is against the weight of the evidence, he may, indeed he should, grant a new trial, although upon the same conflict an appellate court would be bound by the verdict." It is said in 20 Cal. Jur. p. 111 § 71: "A motion for a new trial on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict or other decision is addressed to the sound legal discretion of the trial court, which has power to set aside a verdict or decision and to grant a new trial, in whole or in part, in every case where, in its judgment, the evidence is insufficient. Accordingly it is settled that an order granting or refusing a new trial on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence or where this is one of the grounds set up is conclusive upon the appellate court and may not be disturbed on appeal, unless it appears that there was a manifest abuse of such discretion."

No abuse of discretion has been shown.

The order is affirmed.

PER CURIAM.

Defendant prosecutes this appeal from a judgment foreclosing a mechanic's lien, upon the ground that there is a fatal variance between the claim of lien and the proof. The verified claim, duly filed with the recorder of Tulare county, is attached to and made a part of the complaint. It states, in part, that the plaintiff had agreed to erect two barns for the defendant, "the material to be furnished by the owner, for the agreed construction price of two hundred ($200.00) dollars each, or the total sum of four hundred ($400.00) dollars, such cement work as was necessary for the construction of the foundations of said barns to be done by the contractor to be paid for as extra work; * * * that the amount of the contract price for the construction of said buildings and the concrete necessary for the foundations thereof is the sum of four hundred ninety-two ($492.00) dollars. * * *" Plaintiff's evidence satisfactorily establishes that he orally agreed with the defendant to construct the barns for $400, and was to receive, in addition thereto, $8 a day for himself and $3.50 a day for a helper while engaged in laying the cement foundations, and that the cement work consumed about nine days, totaling $92 for himself and such help. The trial court found in accordance with this evidence.

MARTIN v. DELLA.

1. Mechanics' liens $\S$ 277(6).

Complaint in action to foreclose mechanic's lien, alleging plaintiff contracted to construct barns for "agreed sum" of $492, held not at variance with proof.

While the complaint alleged that plaintiff undertook to construct the barns for the agreed sum of $492, the proof merely showed that defendant agreed to pay $400 for the construction of the building and a specified per diem charge for cement work.

allegation of paragraph 4 of the complaint is to the effect that plaintiff undertook to construct the barns for the "agreed sum of four hundred ninety-two ($492.00) dollars," and this allegation must be read with the notice or claim of lien, as the latter is distinctly made a part of the complaint. Olson-Mahoney, etc., Co. v. Dunne Inv. Co., 30 Cal. App. 332, 342, 159 P. 178. Even if it be assumed that the allegation of paragraph 4 is inconsistent with the notice of lien, which, as stated, is made a part of the complaint, the point should have been raised by demurrer. In 17 Cal. Jur. 193, § 137, it is stated that: "If the allegations of a complaint are ambiguous or uncertain, as where a complaint is inconsistent with a claim of lien annexed to and made a part thereof, objection must be taken by special demurrer." No demurrer was interposed in this case. However, we are not prepared to say that this allegation is at variance with the proof. There is evidence tending to show that defendant agreed to pay $400 for the construction of the buildings, and a specified per diem charge for the cement work. The work being done, it is not a distortion of the facts to say that plaintiff undertook the job for an "agreed" sum equal in amount to the sum due for the construction work plus the charge for the completed cement work.

[4] Moreover, it is an established rule of practice that, if a party desires to raise a question as to any variance between allegations in a pleading and the proof offered at the trial, such objection must be presented in the trial court, otherwise it is waived. California Portland Cement Co. v. Wentworth Hotel, 16 Cal. App. 692, 700, 118 P. 103, 113. Defendant herein raises the point for the first time on appeal. The only issue presented to the trial court had to do with the construction price of the barns, defendant contending that plaintiff had agreed to complete the entire job for $200. The court below, upon competent evidence, found against defendant and in favor of the plaintiff on this issue.

The judgment is affirmed.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 24, 1930.

1. Licenses ⇨18½.

Natural person owning securities of which he is not issuer or underwriter may sell them without permit (St. 1917, p. 673, § 3).

2. Licenses ⇨18½.

Where option in foreign corporation's name was executed by corporate officers in foreign state, but negotiations took place in state, sale of stock without permit was void (St. 1917, pp. 673, 679, §§ 3, 12).

Although option to purchase stock given in name of Nevada corporation was actually executed by corporate officers in Nevada, all offers to sell to buyer were made in oral negotiations with buyer in state, and all acts of buyer from which consent to issuance of stock might be implied took place in state, and upon execution of letters or agreements had in state, certificate for shares of stock was delivered to buyer.

3. Money received ⇨8.

Action for money had and received held proper remedy to recover proceeds of stock obtained through fraudulent representations.

4. Licenses ⇨39.

SEAWELL, J.

Plaintiff brought action to recover from defendants upon a common count for money had and received the sum of $21,532.49. Upon receipt of $5,000 from defendants Berger and Staunton, the action was dismissed as to them and as to the defendant Western Lead Mines Company. From a judgment entered against defendant Salsberry for the balance, to wit, $16,532.49, said defendant appeals. The sum of $21,532.49 was the price for which 20,000 shares of stock of the Western Lead Mines Company, a Nevada corporation, owned by plaintiff, were sold by defendant Staunton. The proceeds of the sale were divided equally between the three defendants.

[1] Said three defendants were the organizers and directors of said Western Lead Mines Company. In August, 1925, plaintiff purchased said 20,000 shares from defendant Salsberry. Plaintiff also held an option given by the corporation and expiring May 1, 1926, to purchase 100,000 shares at $.25 a share. In December, 1925, defendants falsely represented to plaintiff that they had paid $25,000 from their personal funds into the treasury of the corporation on behalf of plaintiff and in the exercise of said option. A certificate for 100,000 shares was actually issued in plaintiff's name in December, 1925. By said false representation defendants obtained possession of said 20,000 shares and plaintiff's consent to the sale thereof and the division of the proceeds among themselves to repay them for the amount they claimed to have advanced on plaintiff's behalf, as will more fully hereafter appear. The 100,000 shares were illegally issued to plaintiff, inasmuch as no permit had been obtained from the corporation commissioner authorizing the sale of said stock in this state. The proceeds from the sale of the 20,000 shares, retained by defendants, represent the price paid by plaintiff for the 100,000 shares which were illegally issued. It is conceded that the 20,000 shares owned by plaintiff were legally issued. Said shares were the personally owned stock of defendant Salsberry, legally issued to him in the state of Nevada, and by him transferred to plaintiff. A natural person owning securities of which he is not the issuer or underwriter may sell such securities for his own account without procuring a permit from the commissioner of corporations. People v. Pace, 73 Cal. App. 548, 238 P. 1089.

The findings follow the allegations of the complaint for money had and received and merely recite the receipt by defendants of $21,532.49 for the use and benefit of plaintiff, no part of which had been paid except the sum of $5,000. We are of the view that the judgment against Salsberry for $16,532.49 may not be sustained, but that recovery against him for $7,177.49, the amount of the proceeds of the sale actually received by him, may be allowed.

The Western Lead Mines Company was organized in the state of Nevada in August, 1925, for the purpose of operating a lead mine in Inyo county, this state. The minutes of the corporation recite that the entire capital stock, consisting of 1,500,000 shares, was issued to defendant Salsberry in consideration of his transfer to the company of the mining property which the corporation was to operate, and, further, that Salsberry donated back to the corporation 600,000 shares. Plaintiff, who testified that his business was that of oil producer, agreed to purchase 20,000 shares at $.25 a share in August, 1925, and also took an option given in the name of the corporation and expiring May 1, 1926, to purchase an additional 100,000 shares at said price. He completed payment for said 20,000 shares in November and received a certificate issued in the name of defendant Salsberry and by him endorsed to plaintiff. It is the proceeds from the sale of this stock, subsequently delivered by plaintiff to defendant Staunton, which plaintiff seeks to recover herein upon the count of money had and received.

In December, 1925, defendants represented to plaintiff that they were negotiating with C. C. Julian to interest him in the corporation, and that they had falsely told Julian that plaintiff had already exercised the option to purchase 100,000 shares. They urged plaintiff to exercise his option in order to make good their misrepresentations to Julian, and said that unless he did it would be necessary for them to raise the money themselves. In a subsequent conversation they represented to plaintiff that they had paid $25,000 into the corporation. On December 28, 1925, Staunton executed and delivered to plaintiff two instruments in the form of letters, to which plaintiff gave his indorsement. One of said letters acknowledged the receipt of Pollak's certificate for 20,000 shares, which Staunton was "to handle and dispose of as he deems for the best interest of plaintiff." The proceeds in case of any sale were to be paid over to plaintiff, and if the stock was not sold by May 1, 1926, the certificate was to be returned.

The other letter referred to the 100,000 shares. It contains the following statement: "You are advised that with your consent, and without any responsibility attaching to you therefor, the undersigned has exercised the privilege granted in said option, and has paid into the treasury of said company the sum of Twenty-five Thousand Dollars ($25,000.00) in lawful money of the United States, and has had issued to you Certificate No. 183 for one hundred thousand (100,000) shares of the capital stock in said Western Lead Mines Company." The letter then requests the indorsement and delivery of the certificate to Staunton, to be handled and disposed of as he deems best, Staunton to deduct and repay to himself from the proceeds of any sale the sum of $25,000 before paying the balance to plaintiff. The letter further provided that if the stock had not been sold by May 1, 1926, plaintiff might at his option ("but no legal obligation shall be presumed to exist therefor") purchase the stock at $.25 a share. A certificate for 100,000 shares, issued in the name of plaintiff, was exhibited to him on December 28, when the letters were signed and delivered to plaintiff, and at that time indorsed by him as provided by the terms of the letter. Staunton took the certificate and plaintiff at no time thereafter had possession of it. On January 11, 1926, Staunton sold the 20,000 shares, which plaintiff had bought at a price of $5,000, to C. C. Julian for $21,532.49, or $1.07 a share. The proceeds of this sale were divided equally between the three defendants. Julian's check for $10,000 in favor of plaintiff was exhibited to him by Staunton, who requested plaintiff to indorse it to defendant to reimburse them for the payment claimed to have been made on plaintiff's account. Julian paid the balance directly to defendants. The membership of the board of directors was increased from three to five. Julian became a director in November, 1925. Some time after the sale of the 20,000 shares, the stock of the company became worthless.

The representation made to plaintiff that defendants had paid $25,000 in cash into the corporate treasury to cover up misrepresentations made to Julian was false, and defendants had made no cash payment whatever for such purpose. The books of the corporation showed credits due defendants amounting to $54,800, which appeared from testimony upon the trial to consist largely of commissions on the sale of stock to Julian and one other person. Said commissions seem excessively large. At or about the time the certificate for 100,000 shares was issued in the name of plaintiff in December, 1925, defendants reduced their credits on the books of the corporation by $25,000 and credited the corporation with having received $25,000 from plaintiff. Plaintiff did not discover that defendants had not paid $25,000 in cash into the corporation until a few days before he instituted the action herein, on April 5, 1927.

[2] It appears from the evidence that one of the objects of defendant Staunton in obtaining possession of the 20,000 shares, as well as the 100,000 shares, with the right "to handle and dispose of the same," was to insure a unified control of all stock to facilitate the operations of Julian, which an outstanding option existing in plaintiff's favor would have prevented.

No permit authorizing the sale of the stock of the company in this state had been obtained. The sum of $21,532.49, for which the 20,000 shares were sold by defendant Staunton, was to pay part of the purchase price of said 100,000 shares. Defendant's contention that the transaction with plaintiff as to the 100,000 shares did not violate the Corporate Securities Act (Stats. 1917, p. 673) cannot be upheld. Section 3 of the act provides that "No company shall sell * * * or offer for sale, negotiate for sale of, or take subscriptions for any security of its own issue until it shall have first applied for and secured from the commissioner a permit authorizing it so to do." Subsequent provisions of the section make it expressly applicable to corporations organized under the laws of other states. Plaintiff was ignorant of the fact that no permit had been obtained until after the sale of his 20,000 shares. Although the option given in the name of the corporation was actually executed by the corporate officers in Nevada, all offers to sell to plaintiff were made by defendants in oral negotiations with plaintiff in this state, and all acts of plaintiff from which a consent to the issuance of stock may be implied took place in this state. Upon the execution of the letters or agreements of December, 1925, had in San Francisco, the certificate for 100,000 shares of the treasury stock of the corporation was delivered to plaintiff and thereupon indorsed by him and turned over to defendants, in accordance with the terms of said agreement. Plaintiff at no time authorized defendant Staunton, as his agent, to accept delivery of the 100,000 shares for him in Reno, Nev., on December 28, 1925, or at any other time.

[3, 4] Where stock has been issued without a permit it is void by the terms of the act (section 12), and the purchaser who is ignorant of such unauthorized issue may recover payments made by him on account of the purchase price. Reilly v. Clyne, 27 Ariz. 432, 234 P. 35, 40 A. L. R. 1005, with note; Reno v. American Ice Machine Co., 72 Cal. App. 409, 237 P. 784; Otten v. Riesener Chocolate Co., 82 Cal. App. 83, 254 P. 942; Barrett v. Gore, 88 Cal. App. 372, 263 P. 564. An action for money had and received is an appropriate proceeding in which to obtain relief. Barrett v. Gore, supra; Hemmeon v. Amalgamated Copper Mines Co., 95 Cal. App. 400, 273 P. 74; MacDonald v. Reich & Lievre, 100 Cal. App. 736, 281 P. 106; Smith v. Bach, 183 Cal. 259, 191 P. 14. The purchaser, for whose benefit the Corporate Securities Act has been enacted, is not in pari delicto with the corporation or its agents. "Where contracts or transactions are prohibited by positive statutes, for the sake of protecting one set of men from another set of men; the one from their situation and condition, being liable to be oppressed or imposed upon by the other; there, the parties are not in pari delicto; and in furtherance of these statutes, the person injured, after the transaction is finished and completed, may bring his action and defeat the contract." Tatterson v. Kehrlein, 88 Cal. App. 34, 263 P. 285, 291. See, also, Reilly v. Clyne, supra; Smith v. Bach, supra; Hemmeon v. Amalgamated Copper Mines Co., supra; Castle v. Acme Ice Cream Co., 101 Cal. App. 94, 281 P. 396.

Appellant also contends that plaintiff has lost his right to recover any part of the sum for which the 20,000 shares were sold by his conduct subsequent to the issuance of the 100,000 shares to him on December 28, 1925. He first learned, as a result of the investigation of the operations of C. C. Julian by the corporation commissioner, that no permit for the transfer of the stock had been granted late in January or in February, 1926. Immediately upon delivery of the stock to him, plaintiff indorsed it and returned it to defendant Staunton under the agreement of December 28, 1925, and at no time thereafter did he have possession of it. But plaintiff made repeated demands for delivery of the certificate, and on April 26, 1926, his attorney wrote demanding its delivery. Salsberry testified that on one occasion plaintiff threatened to sue if the stock was not turned over to him. It would appear that the void stock was retained because Julian desired to maintain a unified control of the corporation. Appellant also relies on a statement of plaintiff made to Julian and other directors in May, 1926, when Julian was having difficulties with the corporation commissioner, to the effect that plaintiff "would stand by the crowd that was running the boat." Appellant also claims that a few days prior to the commencement of the action herein, plaintiff had discussed with Julian the advisability of turning over his 100,000 shares in exchange for shares of another corporation Julian was organizing.

[5, 6] Plaintiff testified upon the trial, and his conduct indicates, that he regarded himself as the owner of the 100,000 shares even after he knew that the corporation had obtained no permit. Plaintiff could not by his conduct ratify or impart validity to the void contract and void stock. As said by the court in Reno v. American Ice Machine Co., 72 Cal. App. 409, 237 P. 784, 785: "Such a contract had no legal existence for any purpose, and neither action nor inaction of a party to it can validate it, and no conduct of a party to it can be invoked as an estoppel against asserting its invalidity." See, also, Tatterson v. Kehrlein, supra; Reilly v. Clyne, supra; Boss v. Silent Drama Syndicate, 82 Cal. App. 109, 255 P. 225. As between the corporation or its agents receiving payment for stock which is illegally issued and void, and the purchaser who in his dealings with the corporation persists in the notion that the stock possesses some validity, the corporation should not be privileged to take advantage of his error to retain money for which, by reason of its own violation of law, it gives nothing in return.

In addition to the stock being void, plaintiff was induced to become a party to the transaction by false representations of defendants, upon which he relied, to the effect that they had paid $25,000 in cash into the corporation on his account, when, in fact, they had merely reduced the amount they claimed to be due them for commissions. Instead of there being $25,000 in cash available for development of the mine in the corporate treasury, the corporation received no cash as a result of the transaction. The very fact that defendants represented that they had paid $25,000 in cash into the corporation reveals a purpose to conceal from plaintiff their intention to use any cash received to pay commissions. It cannot be held that such a deception is immaterial. One of the factors most thoroughly investigated by the corporation commissioner before a permit is granted is the use to which the proceeds from the sale of stock are to be devoted.

[7, 8] No obligation rested on plaintiff to investigate the books of the corporation to determine the truth of defendants' representation that a cash payment had been made to the corporation. Although the certificate was issued in the name of plaintiff, he never had possession except to indorse it and return it to defendants under the agreement of December 28, 1925. He received nothing of value arising from the issuance of stock in his name which he can or should restore to defendant Salsberry as a condition to recovery. Defendants are not relieved of liability because during the time the stock stood in the name of plaintiff its listing price, for a very brief period, rose far above the price of 25 cents a share which plaintiff was to pay.

[9] Defendant Salsberry makes the claim that it was Staunton and Berger who conducted the negotiations with plaintiff. Plaintiff claims that Salsberry was present and actively participated in the transaction. However this may be, it appears from the testimony of Salsberry himself that at least he was kept informed throughout the transactions with plaintiff, and knew that no permit had been obtained from the corporation commissioner for the issuance of the 100,000 shares of stock and that his codirectors had misrepresented to plaintiff the payment of $25,000 into the treasury to cover up misrepresentations made to Julian. Although the letters or agreements of December 28, 1925, were signed by Staunton, defendant knew the arrangements under which Staunton received possession of and sold the 20,000 shares. His receipt of one-third of the proceeds of the sale under such circumstances renders him liable in an action for money had and received.

[10, 11] Appellant Salsberry contends that in any event in an action for money had and received his liability is limited to the amount received by him, to wit, one-third of $21,532.49, or $7,177.49. This contention must be upheld. The action for money had and received is based upon an implied promise which the law creates to restore money which the defendant in equity and good conscience should not retain. The law implies the promise from the receipt of the money to prevent unjust enrichment. The measure of the liability is the amount received. Minor v. Baldridge, 123 Cal. 187, 55 P. 783; Whittier v. Home Savings Bank, 161 Cal. 311, 119 P. 92; French v. Robbins, 172 Cal. 670, 158 P. 188; Smith v. Bach, 53 Cal. App. 63, 199 P. 1106; Id., 54 Cal. App. 236, 201 P. 611; 2 R. C. L. 761; Woodward, The Law of Quasi-Contracts, p. 439; Keener on Quasi-Contracts, p. 200.

[12, 13] The release by plaintiff of all claims against Staunton and Berger arising from the transaction, upon payment by them of $5,000 shortly before the trial, did not terminate plaintiff's right to recover from Salsberry in an action for money had and received the amount actually received by Salsberry. We do not regard the rule of such cases as Flynn v. Manson, 19 Cal. App. 400, 126 P. 181, cited by appellant, as controlling. In the case herein the action was brought by plaintiff to recover the price paid by him for shares of corporate stock which, by reason of defendants' violation of law in failing to procure a permit from the corporation commissioner, were void. An action for money had and received sounds in assumpsit. Each defendant is severally liable in such an action for the portion of the amount paid by plaintiff which he received. The release of one or more defendants upon their several liabilities does not operate to discharge another defendant upon his several liability.

We have made close examination of the case presented, and upon mature consideration we are constrained to say that while the evidence is sufficient to sustain the modified judgment directed to be entered herein, the case, because of a failure to observe the law regulating the issuance, sale, and purchase of stock, is brought quite close to the borderline which courts will not cross in an effort to give assistance to those who have heedlessly followed the phantom of speculation into questionable realms.

It is ordered that the judgment be reduced from $16,532.49 to $7,177.49, with interest from January 11, 1926. As thus modified the judgment is affirmed.

WASTE, C. J.

Plaintiffs and defendants entered into a written agreement for the exchange of properties. Among the items of property to be transferred to the plaintiffs were seventy shares of the U. S. Grant Hotel Company, of the par value of $100 each. Certificates for these shares were delivered to the plaintiffs, but they allege that at the time of the purported transfer the defendants were without right, title, or interest in or to said shares by reason of the prior sale of the stock to a third person for nonpayment of an assessment levied thereon. The complaint then avers that the seventy shares were of the par value of $100 each, aggregating $7,000, and that plaintiffs had received and accepted them in exchange at their par value. This latter allegation is denied by the defendants in their answer. There is also an allegation that plaintiffs had offered to return the asserted worthless certificates to the defendants, the tender having been refused. Defendants introduced no evidence, but rested after their motion for a nonsuit, made at the close of plaintiffs' case, had been denied. Finding all of the allegations of the complaint to be true and those of the answer to be untrue, the trial court gave judgment for the plaintiffs as prayed for.

[1] The parties disagree as to the nature of the action. Appellants insist that it is an action for rescission, or the equivalent thereof, and that in the absence of a return or tender of everything received under the contract respondents are not entitled to judgment. Respondents, on the other hand, state that it is neither an action for rescission nor an action for damages for breach of contract, but, rather, an action for breach of implied warranty of title, or, otherwise stated, an action "to recover the amount paid for * * * shares of stock, for which the respondents gave a valuable consideration, and which was totally lost to them [respondents] because of failure of title." Whatever title be assigned to the action, it definitely appears from the averments of the complaint that the respondents are merely seeking to recover that which they assert was paid by them for seventy shares of stock, title to which they never received. In such an action it is essential, in order to determine the damage occasioned to the plaintiff by the nondelivery of the article sold, that he establish, among other things, the purchase price or consideration paid therefor. In the absence of such proof the detriment suffered by the vendee is incapable of calculation.

[2, 3] The record is destitute of evidence to support the allegation to the effect that the seventy shares of stock had been turned into the exchange at their par value, and in this particular appellants are correct in asserting that the findings are without support. During the course of the trial respondents offered no evidence as to the detriment incurred by reason of appellants' alleged failure to pass title to the shares of stock, but confined their proof solely and exclusively to the allegation that appellants were without right, title, or interest in or to said stock at the time of the purported transfer. It is the settled rule that the burden of proving the extent of his damage is on the plaintiff. Parke v. Frank, 75 Cal. 364, 370, 17 P. 427; Weichers v. Dehail, 41 Cal. App. 547, 549, 183 P. 187; 8 Cal. Jur. 895, § 131. This is not an action for tort, where the amount of recovery is within the sound discretion of the trier of the facts, but, on the contrary, is an action to recover the actual and proximate damages caused to the respondents by appellants' failure to pass title to certain shares of stock as agreed, viz., the purchase price or consideration given in exchange therefor. It is a paramount principle that the person injured shall receive a compensation commensurate with his injury, and no more. By reason of appellants' failure to transfer title to the shares of stock if, in fact, they did fail in this regard, appellants became liable for the full amount of damages resulting therefrom. It was for the respondents, however, to prove the extent of their loss with reasonable certainty.

[4] In the absence of proof that the shares had been turned into the exchange at their par value, as alleged—which proof, if supplied, would have definitely fixed respondents' loss at $7,000, and would have warranted judgment for that amount—the respondents, in an attempt to overcome the deficiency in the proof as to damages, rely on the rule, which finds some support in the authorities, that, in the absence of evidence, the par value of stock is, prima facie, its actual value. Peek v. Steinberg, 163 Cal. 127, 134, 124 P. 834. This rule can be of little assistance to respondents for they are not here seeking to recover the actual value of the stock, but the sum which they assert was paid therefor. In the absence of reasonably certain proof fixing such purchase or exchange price, it is impossible to properly determine the loss suffered by the respondents. To presume, under certain circumstances, that the par value of stock is, prima facie, its actual value does not warrant a presumption, in an action to recover the purchase price thereof, that stock was, in fact, purchased or accepted in trade at its par value. That the rebuttable presumption now relied on by respondents as evidence fixing the extent of their damage does not accord with the verity of the situation is admirably demonstrated by the statement of respondents' counsel in the trial court that this was an action to recover the par value of the stock, and that if appellants attempted "to show the real actual value of this stock we will object to it on the ground that this is not an action for damages for a breach of the contract to recover the value of the stock, but to recover what was paid for it, to-wit, the par value." By this statement respondents disprove the very presumption now relied on by them, viz., that at the time of transfer the par value and the actual value of the stock were one and the same thing. The presumption referred to might well be set up as evidence in an action for the conversion of stock, or for breach of an agreement to deliver stock, for in either case the plaintiff would merely be seeking to recover the loss proximately occasioned to him, namely, the value of the stock at the time of dispossession, or breach of agreement, as the case may be; and, in the absence of definite proof as to the value of the stock, the trial court might well presume, subject to the defendant's right to controvert the same, that the par value was, prima facie, its actual value. But where, as here, a plaintiff alleges that certain property was purchased or turned into an exchange at a certain definite figure or sum, which he paid and seeks to recover, the burden is upon him to establish that the property was, in fact, purchased or turned in at said figure or sum. In the absence of such proof, any determination of the issue is necessarily without support in the evidence. In passing, it may be said that the impropriety of giving effect in this case to the presumption relied on is borne out by the fact that stock of the par value of $100 was permitted to be sold for a delinquent assessment of $3.50 a share. The conclusion we have reached necessitates a retrial of the cause, and for this reason we will not consider the remaining contentions of the parties.

The judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE v. DAVIS.

Cr. 3352.

Supreme Court of California.

Oct. 27, 1930.

1. Criminal law $\S$ 507½.

In prosecution of deputy district attorney for receiving bribe, testimony of prosecuting witness held to show he was accomplice required to be corroborated (Pen. Code, $\S$ 1111).

The testimony of the prosecuting witness was to the effect that the deputy district attorney asked the prosecuting witness to ask a defendant in a criminal prosecution to give attorney bribe money, and that the bribe, when paid, was paid by such defendant through the prosecuting witness to the deputy district attorney.

2. Criminal law $\S$ 511(1).

Evidence corroborating accomplice must be effective for more than merely raising suspicion of defendant's guilt (Pen. Code, $\S$ 1111).

3. Criminal law $\S$ 511(2).

Corroborating evidence is sufficient to support conviction if it, of itself, tends to connect defendant with offense (Pen. Code, $\S$ 1111).

4. Criminal law $\S$ 696(3).

Refusal to strike out testimony offered to show consciousness of guilt by conduct in face of accusation held error, it not being shown that defendant understood he was accused of criminal act.

5. Criminal law $\S$ 407(2).

Before failure to deny statement can be received as evidence of admission of guilt, it must appear that accused understands he is accused of criminal act.

6. Criminal law $\S$ 683(1).

Where witness testified concerning conversation with another over defendant's objection, refusing to permit the other to deny conversation held error.

7. Criminal law $\S$ 511(1).

In prosecution of deputy district attorney for receiving bribe, corroboration of accomplice held insufficient to support conviction (Pen. Code, $\S$ 1111).

8. Criminal law $\S$ 814(3).

Submitting case on theory evidence would authorize conviction of asking for bribe held erroneous, there being no evidence to support theory.

9. Criminal law $\S$ 1186(4).

Errors occurring in prosecution of deputy district attorney for receiving bribe held to require reversal, evidence being weak and unsatisfactory (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

10. Criminal law ☞1186(4).

Where errors have been committed and it is doubtful whether without errors defendant would have been convicted, errors require reversal (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

11. Criminal law ☞742(2).

Whether go-between or intermediary respecting asking or receiving bribe was acting as agent or accomplice of both bribe giver and bribe receiver presents question for jury.

12. Criminal law ☞511(1).

Evidence corroborating that of accomplice in order to warrant conviction must do more than raise grave suspicion of defendant's guilt.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Emmet H. Wilson, Judge.

Harold L. Davis was convicted of crime of asking, agreeing to receive, and receiving a bribe, and he appeals.

Reversed.

For opinion of District Court of Appeal, herewith adopted, see 288 P. 95.

Jerry Giesler, Bourke Jones, Paul B. D'Orr, and Thomas A. Reynolds, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Frank Richards, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Buron Fitts, Dist. Atty., and Robert P. Stewart, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Los Angeles, for the People.

PER CURIAM.

This case was transferred to this court for hearing after decision by the District Court of Appeal for the reason that we desired to give further consideration to several of the points raised by the Attorney General, particularly in reference to the question as to whether the case as written conflicted with the reasoning to be found in the recent case of People v. Negra, 208 Cal. 64, 280 P. 354. For reasons later made to appear, it is our opinion that the reasoning of the District Court of Appeal is not in conflict with the reasoning of the Negra Case, and it is likewise our opinion that the decision of the District Court correctly states the law applicable to this case. We, therefore, adopt as part of the opinion of this court the decision of the District Court of Appeal, Second Appellate District, Division 1, written by Presiding Justice Conrey, and concurred in by Justices Houser and York, which is as follows:

In the indictment it is charged, and the record shows, that at the times to which the indictment refers the defendant was the duly appointed, qualified, and acting chief deputy district attorney of the county of Los Angeles; that at and during said time there were pending undetermined in the superior court of said county two certain criminal actions wherein the defendants were charged with the commission of felonious crimes; that the defendant Davis, as such chief deputy district attorney, was charged with the duty of prosecuting said criminal actions; and that one E. H. Rosenberg was one of the defendants in each of said criminal actions. In one of these actions, No. 31043, the defendants, S. C. Lewis, E. H. Rosenberg, Jacob Berman alias Jack Bennett, were accused of the crime of conspiracy to obtain money by false pretense, and of the crime of conspiracy to violate the corporate securities act. In the other of said actions, No. 31044, I. L. Rouse, E. H. Rosenberg et al., were charged with the crime of conspiracy to violate the act to regulate the interest of money, known as the Usury Law. The indictment against Davis charges that on or about the 15th day of August, 1927, said Davis knowingly, etc., did ask, agree to receive, and did receive from the said E. H. Rosenberg, also known as Ed Rosenberg, charged as a defendant in said actions 31043 and 31044, and from one Ben Getzoff, a bribe, to wit, the sum of $7,500, with a corrupt intent, and an agreement thereupon then and there made that the action of him, the said Davis, as chief deputy district attorney, would be knowingly, willfully, unlawfully, corruptly, and feloniously influenced thereby, in that he, the said Davis, then agreed that as such chief deputy district attorney, he would control and direct the prosecution of each and both of said causes so pending, to the end and in the manner that in so far as each and both of said causes related to the said E. H. Rosenberg, that each and both of said causes would be disposed of in such manner as to result in the discharge of the said E. H. Rosenberg without conviction. Upon trial of this cause before a jury, defendant Davis was found guilty as charged in the information. Pursuant to that judgment he has been sentenced to imprisonment for the term prescribed by law. He appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

There is no evidence of any direct negotiation or transaction between appellant and Ed Rosenberg in relation to the alleged crime of appellant. If there were any such negotiations or transactions, they occurred between appellant and one Ben Getzoff acting as some kind of agent or go-between in said negotiations and in the alleged payment of the bribe. The prosecution is in no position to claim that the defendant ever did anything to comply with his supposed corrupt agreement; for if any of the evidence for the prosecution could be given that construction, it would follow that the court erred in refusing the offered evidence concerning his actual conduct, some of which defendant was not allowed to produce. The first and foremost contention of appellant is based upon the proposition that Ben Getzoff, according to his testimony, was an accomplice in the commission of the crime charged against appellant. It is further contended by appellant that "the evidence is legally insufficient to sustain the verdict of guilty as there is no legal corroboration of Ben Getzoff, the only witness who testifies to any of the essentials of the crime charged, and who is an accomplice, according to his own testimony."

In order to obtain a clear understanding of the most important elements of fact in the case, and as a basis for consideration of the various errors alleged to have been committed at the trial, it is necessary to have before us the testimony of Ben Getzoff. We shall here summarize that testimony as we find it in the record. In making this summary it should be understood that we are not quoting his exact words, except where they are placed within quotation marks. Ben Getzoff said: For some years I have been engaged in the tailoring business in the city of Los Angeles. In the year 1925 the defendant Davis was introduced to me by Asa Keyes, the district attorney. Thereafter I met Davis at my places of business on Spring street, including my latest location at 609 South Spring street; also at his office in the Hall of Justice. I have known Ed Rosenberg for five or six years. He was introduced to me by his brother Jack Rosenberg. I have visited in the homes of the Rosenbergs and in the home of defendant Davis. In the year 1927 the Rosenbergs were engaged in the sale of stock of the Julian Petroleum Company. In May, 1927, the Julian Company was in financial difficulties. In May, 1927, I called on Davis in his office. He asked me, "What seems to be the trouble?" I told him the trouble was that Ed and Jack Rosenberg were subpoenaed before the grand jury. The defendant said: "You can talk to me about it. I have full charge of the case of the Julian Petroleum." I said, they don't want to be indicted. He said that he believed that they would be indicted. He promised that if there was any possible way he would stop the indictment, at least against Jack Rosenberg. I told him, "If you do anything for them they will appreciate it." He said, "All right, I will see what I can do."

In June there were two indictments returned against Ed Rosenberg and other defendants. That evening Davis called me up and said he had saved Jack, but Ed is indicted but not to worry about it. The next day I phoned him, and he told me to come over at 2 o'clock that day, which was Saturday. I was in his office at 2 o'clock; no one else was there. He asked me if it was really true that Ed Rosenberg is worth $3,000,000. I said, I don't know, but I do know they are wealthy. I said, what are you going to do with the indictment? He said: "It is too early in the game. Public sentiment is too strong against it right now to do anything." Later we will see what we can do. During July, 1927, I saw Davis at my place, 609 South Spring street, perhaps twice, and also saw him at his office. When I went to his office I would meet Mrs. Barrett, his secretary.

In August, 1927, Davis came to my store and told me to come to his office at 2 o'clock, which I did. When I came into his office, he asked me whether I had seen Ed Rosenberg and whether he was worried. I said yes, and he wants to know what you are going to do for his dismissal. He said, "I sure would love to dismiss Ed's case but it is time yet, don't have to worry." Then I asked him, "Buddy, is that true, you are going to run for district attorney?" And he asked me who told me, and I told him Asa Keyes told me that. He said, "That is correct." And he said, "Do you realize, Ben, it would cost me between $35,000 and $50,000 to make the run" for his office. I said "Does it take that money, Buddy?" He said, "Yes." He said, "It will take every penny of it, but," he said, "I have some friends, if they only come through with it." Then he told me, "Ben," he says, "if I want to make myself $100,000 or $200,000, I can do it right now, but," he said, "a man in my position you have got to be very careful with whom you do business."

Q. Well, what else was said, if anything?

A. Then I told him, I said, "Buddy," I said, "I will tell you what I will do, I will talk to Ed Rosenberg, and I am sure that he is going to do his share." He said, "What do you mean, money?" I said, "Yes." He said, "You think he is going to come through with anything?" I said, "He is not a cheap piker, he will come through." I said, "Now, Buddy, I want to tell you something, I am going to talk to Ed as soon as I get back to the store." He picked himself up from the chair, and he says, "Do you realize, Ben—do you think, Ben," he said, "that he will come through with $10,000?" I says, "I do." He says, "That ought to be worth to him $10,000." I says, "If you will dismiss that case, Buddy," I said, "he will give you more than that, and I am sure of it."

Q. Anything else about that matter? A. Then I told him, "As soon as I get back to the store, I will get in touch with Ed Rosenberg," and I did.

After I left Mr. Davis' office I had a talk with Ed Rosenberg. Then I called up defendant Davis and said to him, "I have got what you asked for." He told me to meet him in the basement of the Hayward Hotel. A few minutes later he met me there, in the basement between the telephone booths. I said to him, "I have got for you $5,000." He said he wanted me to ask Ed Rosenberg for $2,500 more as a loan; that he had to make good on some stock he had bought on margin. I said, "All right, you can have the $5,000, and tomorrow I will get you the balance of $2,500." He said: "No I wouldn't need it tonight. You can get that tomorrow, the whole thing." Then I left and telephoned to Ed Rosenberg, and he came to my place of business. The next morning I telephoned to Buddy Davis and told him I have got the balance what he wanted. He said, "I will meet you in the same place." Later in the day he telephoned me, and we did meet in the same place, in the basement of the Hayward Hotel. (This was next door to Getzoff's tailor shop.) When I left the store I spoke to my son David, who was working in the store. I went to the appointed place. I said to Davis: "I have got the balance of $2,500 for you. That makes $7,500." I had received that sum from Ed Rosenberg. It was in seven single $1,000 bills and one $500 bill. I handed it over to Buddy Davis. He said, "The first thing tomorrow I am going to get in touch with Asa, and tell Ed not to worry anything about it, as I will take care of it." He said: "You know what I done for Jack, Ed's brother. I prevented his indictment. He knows I will do the right thing by him." I said I thought it was Asa that prevented the indictment. He said, "Asa was a liar." While we were talking there, my son came down and told me that there was an urgent call from Ed Rosenberg. Then I went out through the Spring street side, and Davis went out through the Sixth street side.

In September I saw Davis at his office, when he got back from up north. I was up to see him the morning when Jack Bennett came. We were figuring he was going to dismiss the case in September, and Ed and I were supposed to leave town for a vacation. Davis told me he doesn't get any help from Asa Keyes. That he believed that Keyes feels that Ed is guilty. I saw Davis again the following day. He said that Ace was yellow and had no backbone. After that I left Davis alone entirely. I next saw him in January. In November I went to Chicago with Mr. Keyes. We got back the latter part of November. After we got back I saw Davis again. That was in November or December. He said he was unable to fix it. "I am going to send Ace a letter of resignation, and that will bring him to time." I did not see Davis again until the trial was on, not until the day before Keyes was to deliver his argument before the jury. The trial of the case in which Ed Rosenberg was defendant ended some time in May, 1928. A day or two after the trial ended, Keyes and Davis and Jack Bennett and Ed Rosenberg and myself met in my office. They were having a few drinks and congratulating one another on the outcome of the trial. It was on Saturday. Keyes left first, then Jack Bennett, then Ed Rosenberg. Then Harold Davis said to me, "Is Ed going to come through with the balance of the $2,500?" I said to him: "You have an awful lot of nerve to ask him for the $2,500. If you want the $2,500 you have got to ask him yourself." He said, "According to the circumstances, Ben, I have done the best that I knew how to do." I had a man named Joseph Sherman working for me at the time. His cloth table was right near the window outside the office. When he worked at the cutting table he stood just by that window.

On cross-examination of the witness Ben Getzoff, he said:

"Defendant Davis visited my house on Christmas eve, in December, 1926. He and his wife and Forrest Murray came to my apartment at Wilshire and Shatto Place. Prior to May, 1927, I had been to his house twice. I had been there in the summer of 1926. My son David took me over there. Mrs. Davis was there. Davis had been to my place and asked me if I had a bottle of whiskey. He gave me his address. I went over there and gave the bottle of whiskey to him. Again I went to Davis' house. I think it was in the spring of 1927, on a Sunday. Nobody was home. My son went with me. I brought a reading lamp. I went there and left it right in that little hallway. I was there again in May or June. Jack Rosenberg's brother drove me there and I delivered some booze. Davis was not at home. His wife was at home and she accepted it. Again I was at Mr. Davis' home in 1928. It was at night. I went there with Mr. Keyes. Davis was there but not Mrs. Davis. Again I went there and delivered a piece of white flannel for his wife's skirt. That was in 1927. Jack Rosenberg drove me over there. He did not go in with me. I took two pieces of white flannel. I gave them to Davis. Mrs. Davis was there. When I first talked with Davis, in his office, in May, 1927, I told him, 'The Rosenbergs will do the right thing by you.' The lamp which I took out to Mr. Davis' house was a tall standing lamp with a shade for reading. I got the lamp from my son-in-law, who manufactures lamps. I took one to Asa Keyes the same Sunday. When I took the lamp to Davis' house I left it in the alcove in front of the house. 'There is a neighbor who lives upstairs, and the door is opened and I am going in the house, and Forrest Murray came out from the house and he says to me, Ben, you can leave the lamp stand right here in the little hall.' Also a man upstairs told me the same thing. Asa Keyes and E. H. Rosenberg and I were convicted of the crime of bribery in the Superior Court a few months ago." (Date of present testimony being July 3, 1929.)

"Q. Now, the first time that you ever told this story about having paid Mr. Davis money in consideration for his promising to do something for Ed Rosenberg was after you had been convicted of bribery in the Superior Court; isn't that true? * * * A. As soon as we were indicted for accepting or giving a bribe and when we had received our transcript, and when I read in that transcript where Buddy Davis has deliberately committed perjury, before the grand jury * * * so that is the time that I was ready * * * to go to the district attorney and tell him the whole story."

During the time of the trial before I was convicted "I told Buron Fitts (district attorney) that it doesn't make no difference whether it will be a conviction or a hung jury or an acquittal, I will tell him all about the whole transaction, and even told him about Buddy Davis, and so I done this right after we were convicted * * * and I told him the whole history of it." That was the following day after my conviction.

[1] According to the testimony of Ben Getzoff, the defendant Davis, through Getzoff, asked Rosenberg to give him bribe money. Likewise, according to that testimony, the bribe, when paid, was paid by Rosenberg, through Getzoff, to Davis. There is no evidence whatever of the asking for a bribe to be given by Getzoff, or the agreeing to receive or the receiving of a bribe from Getzoff. Undoubtedly, the testimony of Getzoff places him in the category of an accomplice. "A conviction cannot be had upon the testimony of an accomplice unless it be corroborated by such other evidence as shall tend to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense; and the corroboration is not sufficient if it merely shows the commission of the offense or the circumstances thereof. An accomplice is hereby defined as one who is liable to prosecution for the identical offense charged against the defendant on trial in the cause in which the testimony of the accomplice is given." Pen. Code, § 1111. Upon the statement of facts contained in the testimony of Ben Getzoff, he was liable to prosecution for the identical offense charged against Davis. Pen. Code, §§ 31 and 971; People v. Anderson, 75 Cal. App. 365, 374, 242 P. 906.

[2, 3] The evidence relied upon to corroborate the testimony of an accomplice must be effective for more than merely the raising of a suspicion of the defendant's guilt. But the corroborating evidence is sufficient if it, of itself, tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense, although it is slight, and entitled, when standing by itself, to but little consideration. People v. Kempley, 205 Cal. 441, 456, 271 P. 478.

David Getzoff, twenty-eight years old, is a son of Ben Getzoff. During the year 1927, David was associated with his father in the tailoring business at 609 South Spring street. He testified substantially as follows:

In August, 1927, I returned from a vacation which I had taken during that month. One or two weeks after I came back from my vacation, an incident occurred with which the defendant and my father were concerned. This incident occurred in the basement of the Hayward Hotel. My father spoke to me and then went out of the store. After that I received a telephone call. Then I went to the basement of the hotel to call my father. At that place, in a little corner between the telephone booths, I saw Mr. Davis and my father. I told my father there was a phone call for him. He asked who it was, and I told him it was Ed Rosenberg. I said, "How do you do Mr. Davis," and he said, "Hello, Dave."

"Q. Did you see anything occur at that time between your father and Harold Davis as you walked toward them? A. My father handed Mr. Davis some money.

"Q. Could you tell how much it was? A. No, sir.

"Q. Could you see it? A. I saw it was money.

"Q. What did Mr. Davis do with it? A. I don't recall."

I left immediately. I did not stay there.

The foregoing testimony of David Getzoff is evidence which, if believed, would be sufficient to corroborate the testimony of Ben Getzoff upon the single fact that, at the stated time and place, money passed from the hands of Ben Getzoff to the defendant. But in view of the fact that there was in this case no evidence (other than the testimony of the accomplice) that any bribe was asked for, agreed upon, or paid—and no evidence, even in Ben Getzoff's testimony, that the defendant ever asked him, the said Ben Getzoff, for a bribe—it cannot reasonably be said that the testimony of David Getzoff had any force as evidence tending to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense. First, there must be the offense, the crime, the corpus delicti. If there had been evidence produced (other than that of the accomplice) that Ed Rosenberg, defendant in the criminal action then being prosecuted by Davis, had delivered money into the hands of Ben Getzoff, for payment to Davis (or, perhaps, even for some not reasonably explained purpose), then the further evidence that Ben Getzoff thereafter paid money to Davis might be sufficient to support the theory of a corrupt purpose, and so connect Davis therewith. In the absence of any evidence (other than that of Ben Getzoff) of any connection of Ed Rosenberg with the transaction, there remains no ground for claiming that the transaction said to have been observed by David Getzoff had any connection whatever with the payment of a bribe. In the absence of any corroborating evidence connecting Ed Rosenberg with the transaction, the mere delivery of "some money" (as stated by David Getzoff) by Ben Getzoff to Davis was not evidence of guilt. To make such an act criminal there must be legally sufficient evidence connecting the act with a criminal transaction, intent or purpose. "The corroborating evidence is sufficient if it, of itself, tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense." People v. Kempley, 205 Cal. 441, 271 P. 478, 484. But it must do that much.

What other evidence has been produced that could support a verdict against the defendant in this case? Ben Getzoff testified, as we have seen, concerning a visit of appellant and appellant's wife at his home, and certain other visits of himself at the home of Davis. He further testified to certain presents made by him to Davis, or to the wife of Davis. All of these are denied both by Davis and by his wife. Mr. Forrest Murray says that he never visited the home of Ben Getzoff in company with defendant and Mrs. Davis or at all, and that he never, at any time, saw Ben Getzoff come to the house of Davis with a lamp. Mrs. Davis denies the alleged visit said to have been paid by her and the defendant to the Getzoff home. She denies the incident relating to the lamp, and denies that she has ever had such a lamp. She denies the alleged present of the white flannel goods and denies that she ever had any such materials coming from Ben Getzoff. She denies that he was ever in her home or that she ever was in his home. But let it be assumed that these incidents, or some of them, as related by the witness Ben Getzoff, did take place. They had no evidentiary force concerning the crime charged, more than to create an atmosphere of suspicion.

[4] Besides the testimony of David Getzoff, to which we have referred, the evidence offered by way of corroboration is found in the testimony of Joseph Sherman, of Mrs. Jessie Barrett, and of John J. Kessler and his wife. Sherman testified that his place of work in the Getzoff shop was not more than five feet away from a window of the office; that in June, of 1928, several days after the verdict returned in the Rosenberg case, he overheard a conversation between defendant Davis and Ben Getzoff in which he heard Davis say to Getzoff: "Why doesn't he come across with the money? I am waiting too long." Cross-examined about the date of this occurrence, Sherman said that it was several days after the verdict, "Either about two weeks or three weeks; I can't remember exactly the date." Mrs. Barrett testified that she was secretary to the defendant in his office of chief deputy district attorney during the months of May, June, July, August, and September, 1928; that she knew Ben Getzoff during that time; that he came to the office frequently and would ask for Mr. Davis and be admitted to his office; that she also made telephone connections between the defendant and Getzoff on frequent occasions.

The testimony of John J. Kessler and his wife is the only other testimony claimed to have corroborative value. That of Mrs. Kessler requires no separate mention, since that of her husband more fully covers the same matters. Apparently the purpose of this testimony was to prove that in the face of an accusation personally made by Kessler to defendant Davis, the conduct of Davis in response to that accusation was such as to show a consciousness of guilt. It appears that at some time prior to the trial of the Rosenberg case there had been a transaction between Mrs. Kessler and Jack Rosenberg, in which Jack Rosenberg received from Mrs. Kessler 200 shares of Julian stock, and that she had been unable to obtain from him any accounting therefor. Kessler testified to an interview which he had with Davis in the office of Davis, on May 17, 1928. He went there with Mrs. Kessler and asked Davis to take Jack Rosenberg before the grand jury for an investigation of that transaction. He said that he had found out that Jack Rosenberg had sold the stock of Mrs. Kessler, and he had told Jack that if he (Jack) did not return the money to Mrs. Kessler that he (Kessler) would go to the district attorney and swear to a warrant, and "you will be arrested, just like your brother."

"Q. Is this what you told Mr. Davis? A. Yes, I told Mr. Davis everything. He started to laugh. He said, 'I am not afraid. The Julian case is fixed by Mr. Getzoff.'"

Further on it appeared that what the witness meant to say was that in response to Kessler's threat of arrest, Jack Rosenberg laughed and said: "I am not afraid. The Julian case is fixed by Mr. Getzoff." Further on, Kessler said, "Mr. Davis, when I told him that—I said, 'Jack Rosenberg says he is not afraid, because the case is fixed.' He says, 'John, don't worry; wait until the trial will be over, and I will get you the money.'" Davis said that.

At the conclusion of the direct examination of Mr. Kessler, defendant moved to strike out said testimony as not illustrative of any of the issues in the case and not tending to prove anything in the indictment. Strenuous but unsuccessful efforts had been made by counsel for defendant to have this witness confine his statements to his conversation with Davis and to exclude direct statements of the conversation that he had had with Jack Rosenberg. The motion of defendant to strike out the testimony was denied. Upon a very similar record of the testimony of Mrs. Kessler, similar objections and motions made by defendant were overruled.

[5] The testimony of the Kesslers was offered as showing an accusatory statement made to the defendant, and showing consciousness of guilt as exhibited by the conduct of defendant in the face of such accusation. The statement made by Kessler to Davis, in the form of an alleged quotation from Jack Rosenberg, was not an accusation directed personally to Davis. The record shows that in the then pending trial of the Rosenberg case the district attorney and several deputies other than Davis were also actively connected with the prosecution. There was also the possibility that any "fixing" of the case had been effected through contact with jurors. Before the failure of a person to deny a statement of fact can be received as evidence of an admission of guilt or of consciousness of guilt, it must appear that he understands that he himself is accused of the criminal act. Wharton on Criminal Evidence (10th Ed.) vol. 2, § 680, p. 1407; People v. Hartwell, 37 Cal. App. 799, 175 P. 21. We are of the opinion that the court erred in denying the motions to strike out said Kessler testimony.

[6] Another error of the court in relation to the Kessler testimony occurred at a later point in the trial. Jack Rosenberg was called as a witness for the defendant, and was asked whether he had a conversation with Kessler during the trial of the Rosenberg case, in which he told Kessler that he wasn't afraid of being taken before the grand jury because the case had been fixed by Getzoff. The district attorney objected to this question upon the ground that it was irrelevant and immaterial and that the conversation testified to by Kessler was a conversation of Kessler with Davis. The objection was sustained. If in fact the testimony of Kessler had been confined to his conversation with Davis, the objection to the question addressed to Jack Rosenberg would have been properly sustained for the reason that the question whether or not there had actually been such prior conversation with Jack Rosenberg would have been immaterial. But in fact Kessler had been permitted to testify and had testified, notwithstanding objections thereto, concerning a previous conversation with Jack Rosenberg, and had given a statement of that conversation. If the defendant had been permitted to produce the testimony of Jack Rosenberg denying the conversation, it would have been to that extent an impeachment of the Kessler testimony. The evidence of such prior conversation should not have been received by the court as against the defendant's objections, without permitting the defendant to produce testimony contradicting the same. The general rule, which excludes evidence in rebuttal of testimony concerning an immaterial matter, is based upon the fact that controversies about such matters are likely to "lead to endless confusion." Donnelly v. Curran, 54 Cal. 282; People v. Mitchell, 62 Cal. 411. In the cases last cited, the irrelevant evidence had been received without any objection thereto. Moreover, the testimony which appellant sought to contradict was closely connected with the principal fact, to-wit, the supposed accusation. Without such contradiction, the defendant stood helplessly prejudiced before the jury.

[7] Taking the testimony of the several witnesses offered in corroboration of the story told by Ben Getzoff, it is exceedingly doubtful whether any of it, or all of it together, in and of itself amounts to corroborative evidence tending to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime charged. In order to give it effect even as tending in that direction, it seems at every point necessary to interpret and explain this "corroboration" in the light of the testimony of Ben Getzoff. It requires the testimony of Ben Getzoff to give it direction to the alleged crime, before it can be said to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime. But the law requires that such testimony offered in corroboration of the testimony of an accomplice shall of itself tend to connect the defendant with the offense charged. The following quotation seems appropriate: "As to all of the claimed corroborative evidence the prosecution must fail, for it does not even show 'the commission of the offense or the circumstances thereof' within the rule laid down in section 1111 of the Penal Code, and must further fail under the well-established rule approved in People v. Robbins, 171 Cal. 466, where, at page 470, 154 P. 317, 319, it is said that—'Where the circumstances when proved, taken separately or collectively, are consistent with the innocence of the accused, there is no corroboration, and a verdict of conviction thereon will be set aside.' Therefore, eliminating, as we must, the evidence of the accomplice in order to determine whether the other evidence is sufficient to connect the defendants with the crime of bribery, we conclude that such other evidence falls far short of the legal requirements to constitute corroboration." People v. Kempley, 205 Cal. 441, 461, 271 P. 478, 487. The Attorney General suggests that the statements contained in the foregoing quotation should not be accepted as authority for the proposition that the corroborative evidence must show the commission of the crime. The general rule no doubt is that the corpus delicti, such as, for instance, that a certain man was murdered, may be established by testimony of an accomplice showing that the man was found dead under described circumstances indicating murder. In such case it would be only that part of his testimony implicating the defendant that would have to be corroborated by other evidence. But in the case of a prosecution of a public officer on a charge of bribery, the fact that the crime was committed and the connection of the defendant therewith are of a single inseparable nature. In such case to hold that the testimony of the accomplice alone may be accepted as sufficient proof of the corpus delicti would wholly destroy the rule requiring corroboration of the testimony of an accomplice, as that rule is set forth in section 1111 of the Penal Code.

[8] Counsel for the people claim that the defendant "was convicted of the crime of asking a bribe of Ben Getzoff." This is true, because this was a part of the crime charged by the indictment, and the jury found the defendant "guilty of asking, agreeing to receive, and receiving a bribe, a felony, as charged in the indictment." Under instructions 23 and 26, reading them together, the court presented the case to the jury upon the theory that there was evidence which, if believed by the jury, would authorize them to find the defendant guilty of asking for a bribe, and upon the theory that this corrupt solicitation might be one occurring solely between defendant and Ben Getzoff. This theory was erroneous, because there was no evidence that the defendant asked a bribe of Ben Getzoff.

[9, 10] And even if it be assumed that the so-called corroborative testimony is technically sufficient to prove the asking, agreeing to receive, and receiving a bribe from Ed Rosenberg, nevertheless it leaves the case in that weak and unsatisfactory condition in which errors become important, because in such case they much more easily lead to a miscarriage of justice than in those cases where there is abundance of reliable evidence of the defendant's guilt. Section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution was not intended to mean that the mere fact that the evidence may legally be able to stand up under the weight of the judgment is sufficient reason in all cases for refusing to set aside the judgment. The phrase "miscarriage of justice," used as descriptive of that condition of a cause which justifies the reversal of a judgment, has no hard and fast definition. It seems assured, however, that where errors have been committed, and where the appellate court finds that upon the record it is seriously doubtful that without such errors the defendant would have been convicted, then it may well be that errors which otherwise would not be considered to be seriously prejudicial, will require a reversal. See People v. Adams, 76 Cal. App. 178, 186, 244 P. 106, and numerous cases there cited.

There are numerous assignments of error, other than those to which we have referred. We do not find it necessary to elaborate upon them here. Let it be assumed that none of them would be sustained, or that if sustained they would not be of great importance. The fact that the verdict rests upon the testimony of a self-confessed accomplice in the crime of bribery (a crime which necessarily impeaches the integrity of one who takes part in its commission), the fact that there is evidence indicating that the accomplice had interested motives for testifying against the defendant, the fact that the so-called corroborative evidence is of that inconclusive character which appears in the record, and the fact that these errors occurred to which we have given attention—these things together have left the cause in a condition which entitles the appellant to a new trial.

In answer to the contentions made on petition for hearing in this court, we add the following observations:

[11] The Attorney General contends, in effect, that since the testimony of Ben Getzoff, summarized by the District Court of Appeal, clearly shows that Getzoff was the accomplice of Rosenberg in the offering or giving of a bribe, he could not therefore be the accomplice of Davis in the asking or receiving of a bribe; and that it therefore follows that Getzoff's testimony did not have to be corroborated. This result is non sequitur. It is undoubtedly true, as the evidence shows, that Getzoff was an accomplice of Rosenberg in the giving or offering of a bribe, punishable under section 67 of the Penal Code. It is likewise true that since 1915, under the amendment of that year to section 1111 of the Penal Code providing that an accomplice is one who is liable to the prosecution for the identical offense charged against the defendant on trial, the giver and receiver of a bribe are no longer accomplices one to the other (although that was formerly the law of this state, People v. Coffey, 161 Cal. 433, 119 P. 901, 39 L. R. A. (N. S.) 704), inasmuch as the asking or receiving a bribe is made a separate offense from offering or giving a bribe, under section 68 of the Penal Code. However, when the bribe is accomplished through the medium of an agent, or go-between, or intermediary, the mere fact that the evidence is conclusive that such emissary is the agent or accomplice of one of the parties does not necessarily determine that such emissary is not likewise the agent or accomplice of the other party to the transaction. We can see no impossibility, legal or otherwise, in a person acting as the agent or accomplice of both the bribe giver and the bribe receiver. Each case, of course, must turn on its own facts and circumstances, and, if there is any doubt as to the proper status of the emissary, the question is one, under proper instructions, for the jury. 8 Cal. Jur. 277, § 337. From the instructions given in this case, and from the testimony of Ben Getzoff himself, it seems reasonable to infer that the jury must have found that Getzoff was an accomplice of Davis; in fact, any other finding would be contrary to the evidence.

The Attorney General strenuously contends that the law as stated, supra, in reference to the amount of evidence necessary to corroborate an accomplice, while following the rule of People v. Kempley, supra, is contra to the rule enunciated by this court in People v. Negra, supra. We find no inconsistency in the two cases. In the Negra Case, at page 69 of 208 Cal., 280 P. 354, 356, the rule is stated as follows:

"While the jury may consider the circumstance that a witness is an accomplice, in passing upon his credibility as a witness (People v. Clough, 73 Cal. 348, 354, 15 P. 5), his testimony is not to be rejected merely because he is an accomplice, and if there is other evidence which measures up to the requirement of the Code (supra), tending to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime charged, then such testimony of the accomplice is to be considered by the jury, as is any other testimony, and must be given the weight to which the jurors may conclude that it is entitled. People v. Hoosier, 24 Cal. App. 746, 142 P. 514. The evidence tending to connect a defendant with the commission of the crime may be slight and, when standing by itself, entitled to but little consideration. People v. McLean, 84 Cal. 480, 24 P. 32. The law does not require that the evidence necessary to corroborate the testimony of an accomplice shall tend to establish the precise facts testified to by the accomplice; and strong corroborative testimony is not necessary to support a judgment of conviction founded on the testimony of an accomplice. Even though circumstantial and slight, the evidence is, nevertheless, sufficient if it tends to connect the accused with the commission of the offense. People v. Martin, 19 Cal. App. 295, 125 P. 919. The defendant's own statements and admissions, made in connection with other testimony, may afford corroboratory proof sufficient to sustain a verdict. People v. Armstrong, 114 Cal. 570, 46 P. 611; People v. Sullivan, 144 Cal. 471, 473, 77 P. 1000. It is not necessary that the corroborating evidence should go so far as to establish by itself, and without the aid of the testimony of an accomplice, that the defendant committed the offense charged. People v. Solomon, 6 Cal. Unrep. Cas. 305, 58 P. 55." (Italics added.)

[12] By the last sentence quoted above it was not intended to hold that the corroborating evidence is sufficient if it merely raises a suspicion of defendant's guilt. Any such rule would be directly contrary to the mandatory provisions of section 1111, Penal Code, which provides, in part, that the corroboration must be of such a nature "as shall tend to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense; and the corroboration is not sufficient if it merely shows the commission of the offense or the circumstances thereof." The corroborating evidence must do more than raise even a "grave suspicion" of defendant's guilt. People v. Kempley, supra, page 456 of 205 Cal., 271 P. 478; citing People v. Robbins, 171 Cal. 466, 470, 154 P. 317; People v. Woodcock, 52 Cal. App. 412, 417, 199 P. 565; People v. Janssen, 74 Cal. App. 402, 407, 240 P. 799. As already stated, supra, the corroboration relied upon in this case, after excluding the accusatory statement of the Kesslers, in no way corroborates the evidence of Ben Getzoff that Rosenberg paid money to Getzoff for Davis, and that, in fact, such money was so paid; nor is there any corroboration of Getzoff that Davis asked for and received such money. The most that can be said is that the corroborating testimony raises a suspicion of defendant's guilt, and this, as we have seen, is not sufficient.

The judgment and the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial are reversed.

DAVIS v. CHIPMAN. S. F. 13122.

210 Cal. 609

Supreme Court of California.
Oct. 30, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 24, 1930.

1. Brokers ⇐42.

Agent merely furnishing names of persons with whom he has dealt for sale of property is not "broker" within license statute (St. 1919, p. 1252, §§ 2, 20).

St. 1919, p. 1252, § 2, defines real estate broker as person who, for compensation, sells, or offers for sale, buys, or offers to buy, or negotiates purchase or sale of real estate, and section 20 requires such person, in order to recover compensation, to prove possession of license when cause of action arose.

2. Brokers ⇐42.

Person dealing with another for sale of property held to be "broker" within license statute, defining broker as one who offers for sale (St. 1919, p. 1252, §§ 2, 20).

3. Brokers ⇐42.

That one dealing with third person actually offered to sell only to syndicate, intended to include such person, was immaterial under statute requiring broker's license for one who offers for sale (St. 1919, p. 1252, §§ 2, 20).

4. Brokers ⇨42.

Broker, not procuring license until after sale, but before commissions became due, held unauthorized to recover commissions (St. 1919, p. 1252, §§ 1, 2, 17, 20).

5. Appeal and error ⇨1122(1), 1176(3).

For appellate courts to make new findings, and direct judgment thereon, it must appear that on no theory could unsuccessful party make further substantial showing.

6. Brokers ⇨42.

Services, being prohibited by statute requiring broker's license, could not be ratified by owner, or obligate him for commissions (St. 1919, p. 1252, §§ 2, 20).

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by Harry F. Davis against W. F. Chipman, as trustee of the estate of Josephine A. Phelps, deceased. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Reversed.

Rehearing denied; SHENK and PRESTON, JJ., dissenting.

Superseding opinions of the District Court of Appeal in 282 P. 992 and 286 P. 429.

W. C. Sharpsteen, Cushing & Cushing, and William H. Gorrill, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Fred L. Berry and Dozier & Kimball, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

CURTIS, J.

The defendant, as trustee under the last will and testament of Josephine A. Phelps, deceased, was on the 24th day of April, 1924, the owner of certain described real property situated in the county of San Mateo and comprising 1,400 acres of land or thereabouts. On said last-named day, defendant gave to Thomas B. Dozier, Jr., an option to purchase said real property for the sum of $250,000, which said option is, in so far as the same is necessary for the purposes of this action, in the following words and figures:

"It is hereby agreed that I will sell and convey to you or your assignee, at any time within three (3) months from this date, unless previously sold or agreed to be sold, all of the property described in that certain agreement dated March 21st, 1923, made and entered into by and between myself, as Trustee of the Estate of Josephine A. Phelps, Deceased, under the terms of the Last Will and Testament of said Josephine A. Phelps, Deceased, the party of the first part, and California Homes

Association, a Corporation duly and regularly organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the State of California, and having its principal place of business in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, the party of the second part, and recorded in Volume 75, at page 492, Official Records of San Mateo County, excepting therefrom such portions thereof as have been sold since the above date, for the total sum of Two Hundred Fifty Thousand Dollars ($250,000.00) in cash. * * *

"The price for the several parcels into which the said property is divided aggregates a sum largely in excess of the price quoted to you in this option to purchase. I reserve the right to sell or to agree to sell any portion of said property before you exercise this option to purchase. In the event that you exercise this option to purchase, the net sum for which said property is sold will be credited to your account on said purchase price.

"Anything contained in this agreement is not to bind me as an individual but solely as said Trustee.

"Yours very truly,

"(Signed) W. F. Chipman,

"Trustee of the Will of Josephine A. Phelps, Deed."

On the same date, and it would seem as part of the same transaction, although this is not a matter of material importance, the defendant executed and delivered to the plaintiff a certain written agreement, of which the following is a copy:

"Harry F. Davis, Esq., Attorney at Law, Hobart Building, San Francisco, California.

"Dear Sir: Enclosed please find copy of option to purchase, dated April 24th, 1924, from W. F. Chipman, Trustee of the Estate of Josephine A. Phelps, Deceased, under the terms of the Last Will and Testament of said Josephine A. Phelps, Deceased, to Thomas B. Dozier, Jr., Esq., First National Bank Building, San Francisco, California. Thomas B. Dozier, Jr., has requested me to send you this copy of the above option to purchase, as he states that such option to purchase was secured through your efforts, and that you interested him in the property from a purchase standpoint.

"I hereby agree, if Thomas B. Dozier, Jr., or his assignee or assignees, exercise the above option to purchase, or any modification or change therein which is effected by mutual consent of the parties thereto, to pay you a commission on the sale of the property of Ten per cent. (10%) of the purchase price of same, such commission to be due, and payable ratably and proportionately if, as and when such purchase price is received by me, and such commission to be due and payable only if a sale of this property is effected under such option to purchase, or any modification or change thereof which is effected by mutual consent.

"It is further understood and agreed that, on or before the expiration of said option to purchase, both Mr. Dozier and yourself are to furnish me with the complete names and addresses of all parties with whom you are or have been dealing for the sale of said property under said option to purchase, and that no commission will be due or payable to you except it is effected within one (1) year of said expiration of said option to purchase and with one of the parties whose name and address has been previously furnished by one or both of you, and it is further understood that any party to whom a sale of the property is effected through your efforts must be a party with whom there have been no negotiations heretofore in connection with said property.

"Anything contained in this agreement is not to bind me as an individual but solely as trustee.

"Yours very truly,

"(Signed) W. F. Chipman,

"Trustee of the Will of Josephine A. Phelps, Decd."

Mr. Dozier failed to exercise his option to purchase said real property within the time fixed therein. He did, however, in conjunction with Mr. Davis, prior to the date of the expiration of said option, furnish to the defendant the names and addresses of certain parties with whom, they stated in said notice, they had been dealing for the sale of said property under said option. Among the names so furnished the defendant by the plaintiff and Mr. Dozier were those of V. M. Price and the Municipal Properties Company, the address of each of these parties being given as Santa Fe Building, San Francisco, Cal.

It is conceded that the option expired on July 24, 1924. On July 29, 1924, the plaintiff met the said V. M. Price on Market street, in the city of San Francisco. It might be said here that V. M. Price was then and at all times mentioned herein the president of the Municipal Properties Company, a corporation, and in all his dealings with the parties hereto or with Mr. Dozier he acted for said company. At the time of the meeting of the plaintiff and Mr. Price, as just related, the latter inquired of plaintiff how things were with the Phelps estate, to which the plaintiff replied, "Not so good, our option is up." Mr. Price then asked plaintiff to introduce him to the defendant, and at the same time said, "I wonder if he will accept improvements in lieu of a heavy down payment?" To which plaintiff replied, "I don't know but I will cheerfully introduce you." The two then went to defendant's office, and the plaintiff introduced Mr. Price to the defendant. As a result of this meeting Mr. Price, for the Municipal Properties Company, entered into an agreement with defendant for the purchase of the real property described in the option. The terms of the agreement provided for a payment of $2,500 down and the balance over a period of years, with the agreement on the part of Mr. Price that he and his company, who was the real purchaser, would put in certain improvements on the property such as streets, sewers, and water mains, and would grade the land in order to make it suitable for subdivision purposes. This agreement between the defendant and the Municipal Properties Company was executed on August 1, 1924. Before the defendant would accept Mr. Price's offer, or enter into any agreement of sale with him or his company, he secured an agreement from the plaintiff and Mr. Dozier waiving interest on commissions to be paid them. Upon this point Mr. Dozier testified as follows: "He told me that he would not accept that offer [Price's offer] unless Mr. Davis would waive the interest on his commission. * * * I told him I would take the matter up with Mr. Davis on the following morning and he asked me to write him a letter to confirm the arrangement if it was satisfactory to Mr. Davis and for both Mr. Davis and myself to sign the letter." As a result of this conversation the following letter was signed by the plaintiff and Mr. Dozier and delivered to the defendant:

"July 30, 1924.

"W. F. Chipman, Trustee, 525 Market Street, San Francisco, California.

"Dear Mr. Chipman: In regard to the matter of the Option to Purchase, dated April 24, 1924, between yourself and Thomas B. Dozier, Jr., and the Agreement for Commission on Purchase and Sale of Real Property, dated April 24, 1924, between yourself and Harry F. Davis, we desire to advise you that we are willing to accept a commission of ten per cent. (10%) of each payment on the purchase price on any sale by you to Virgil M. Price or the Municipal Properties Company of the property at San Carlos, such commission to be payable to us out of and from each payment on the purchase price if, as and when received by yourself, without interest.

"Trusting that this confirms our understanding of yesterday, and with kindest regards, we are "Very respectfully,

• "(Signed) Thomas B. Dozier, Jr.

"(Signed) Harry F. Davis."

On August 7, 1924, the defendant mailed to plaintiff and Mr. Dozier his check for $250, being 10 per cent. commission on the first payment of $2,500, made by Mr. Price on the purchase of said real property. The letter accompanying said check is in part as follows:

"Gentlemen: Herewith my check, as trustee of the last Will of Josephine A. Phelps, deceased, in your favor for $250, being 10% commission of the first payment of $2,500 made by Virgil M. Price, pursuant to agreement for the purchase and sale of real property by and between W. F. Chipman, Trustee, and Virgil M. Price, dated August 1, 1924.

"This payment to you is in accordance with your letter of July 30, 1924, a copy of which I enclose, wherein you confirm the understanding between us prior to the execution of the agreement for purchase above referred to.

"As you will recall, the new proposition made by yourselves in behalf of Mr. Price for the purchase of the properties differed so radically in the matter of payments that it was only entertained by myself and Mr. Sharpsteen because of several advantages that we believed would benefit the Estate.

"Among those advantages was the provision for immediate improvements on the premises at a cost of $50,000.00, the payment of commission to you if when and as received without interest, and other features that convinced Mr. Sharpsteen and myself that such a contract would be desirable.

"Attached to the enclosed check for $250.00 please find vouchers in duplicate which kindly sign and return to me promptly.

"Sincerely trusting that the agreement between Mr. Price and me may have most beneficial and satisfactory results for all concerned.

"With kind regards,

"Yours respectfully,

"(Signed) W. F. Chipman, Trustee."

Thereafter the defendant made the following payments on account of commission on payments made by Mr. Price on the purchase price of said real property: August 7, 1924, $125; January 17, 1925, $145; and January 31, 1925, $105.

Defendant refused to make any further payments under his said agreement, although prior to the institution of this and the companion case of Dozier v. Chipman, 293 P. 47, Mr. Price had paid to defendant the full purchase price of said real property. Prior to the commencement of said actions the plaintiff, on or about July 28, 1924, assigned to the said Thomas B. Dozier, Jr., one-half of his claim against the defendant, and the court found that said assignment was with the knowledge and consent of the defendant. Plaintiff instituted this action to recover of the defendant the sum of $12,125, being one-half of the commission of 10 per cent. of $250,000, the full purchase price of said real property, less the sum of $375, paid thereon by defendant. An action for a like amount against defendant was also instituted by the said Thomas B. Dozier under his assignment from plaintiff. The two actions were tried on the same evidence. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiffs therein and against the defendant for the full amount sued for. The defendant has appealed from the judgment in each action.

The basis of defendant's refusal to pay the claim of the plaintiff was that plaintiff was not at the time defendant wrote the letter of April 24, 1924, in which he agreed to pay plaintiff said commission, nor at the time of the sale of said real property, on August 1, 1924, to the said V. M. Price, a licensed real estate agent or broker, and therefore plaintiff had no legal claim to said commission, or any part thereof.

Appellant now makes the same contention in this court that was made by him in the trial court—that is, that plaintiff, not having been a licensed real estate broker during any of the time he was dealing with the defendant, cannot recover for his services rendered under the agreement set forth in the letter of April 24, 1924.

Section 2 of the act, which we will refer to as the Real Estate Brokers' Act (St. 1919, p. 1252), as it stood at the time of the transaction involved, defined a real estate broker as follows: "A real estate broker within the meaning of this act is a person, copartnership or corporation who, for a compensation, sells, or offers for sale, buys, or offers to buy, or negotiates the purchase or sale or exchange of real estate, or who, for compensation, negotiates loans on real estate, leases, or offers to lease, rents, or places for rent, or collects rent from real estate, or improvements thereon, for others as a whole or partial vocation."

Section 20 of the same act provided that no person acting in the capacity of a real estate broker shall bring or maintain any action for collection of compensation "for the performance of any of the acts mentioned in section two hereof without alleging and proving that such person * * * was a duly licensed real estate broker * * * at the time the alleged cause of action arose."

Turning now to the letter of April 24, 1924, upon which the plaintiff relies in support of his claim for a commission on the sale of the property mentioned therein, we observe that in the first place it contains an agreement on the part of the defendant to pay the plaintiff a commission of 10 per cent. on the purchase price, "if Thomas B. Dozier, Jr., or his assignee or assignees, exercise the above option to purchase" said real property. This letter, which was addressed to the plaintiff, in its opening paragraph stated that "Thomas B. Dozier, Jr., has requested me to send you this copy of the above option to purchase as he states that such option to purchase was secured through your efforts, and that you interested him in the property from a purchase standpoint." As we read these two paragraphs together their meaning is clear. If Dozier, Jr., either personally or through others, exercised his option to purchase said property, defendant was to pay plaintiff a commission on such sale in consideration of the services rendered by plaintiff in interesting Dozier in said property. The conditions of this agreement it is conceded were not met by plaintiff. Dozier did not exercise his option, nor was any agreement for the sale of said property effected during the life of said option. We may dismiss this agreement, therefore, from any further consideration. The sale which was entered into with Price was made after the expiration of the option. Accordingly plaintiff cannot claim under this agreement any commission for making such sale.

The third paragraph of the letter, however, contained a further agreement. This agreement was, in effect, that the plaintiff and Dozier, on or before the expiration of said option, were to furnish to defendant the names and addresses of all parties with whom they had dealt for the sale of said property under said option, and if the property, within one year after the expiration of said option, should be sold to one of the parties whose name and address had been previously furnished to defendant, then and in that event he would pay to the plaintiff a like commission on the sale of said property as that provided in the previous paragraph of said letter. It is under this paragraph of the letter that the plaintiff contends that he is entitled to recover in this action. Under the agreement set forth therein it was necessary before plaintiff was entitled to claim a commission for three acts to be performed. First, plaintiff or Dozier must have dealt for the sale of the property with the person to whom the property was subsequently sold. Second, they must have sent to defendant the name and address of said party on or before the date of the expiration of the option. Third, the property must have been sold within one year to one of the parties whose name plaintiff or Dozier had sent to the defendant as a party with whom they had dealt for the sale of said property under said option.

[1, 2] It is questionable whether, under the terms of this agreement, plaintiff or Dozier were required to bring about a sale of said property, after the expiration of said option. Their part was fulfilled, we think, when they had performed the first two conditions of this agreement. They were required, however, first to deal for the sale of said property under the option with the person who thereafter purchased it, and, secondly, they were to furnish the name of such purchaser to the defendant on or before the expiration of the option. For these services the defendant agreed to pay a commission on the sale of said property. Of course, the mere furnishing of the names of the parties with whom they had dealt for the sale of the property is not the performance of any act mentioned in section 2 of the Real Estate Brokers' Act, and such services could be performed and compensation collected therefor by one not a licensed real estate broker. But we hardly think we can say the same thing regarding the act of dealing with a party for the sale of the property. It is not easy to perceive how a person could deal with another for the sale of property without offering to sell the property to such person. If, therefore, the plaintiff, acting as the agent of the defendant for a compensation, offered to sell said property to Price, then he was performing an act expressly mentioned in section 2 of the Real Estate Brokers' Act as one which could be legally performed only by a licensed real estate broker.

However, the plaintiff contends that while he dealt with Price for the sale of the property he did not offer to sell said property directly to Price but simply attempted to interest Price in joining a syndicate which would take over Dozier's option and purchase the property. The evidence shows that Price was interested in the purchase of the property during the life of the Dozier option, and approached the plaintiff and Dozier with that end in view, but that both plaintiff and Dozier refused to entertain any offer from Price for the purchase of the property, and sought to interest him in their scheme to form a syndicate to purchase the property. Price was not interested in the syndicate plan, and declined to become a party to it, and there the matter was dropped, so far as Price was concerned, until after the option expired. Under this state of facts, did plaintiff offer to sell the property?

[3] Plaintiff contends, as stated already, that while he dealt with Price for the sale of the property he did not offer to sell the property to Price. That plaintiff's dealings with Price contemplated and involved a sale of the property, we think, there can be no question. Under no other theory can it be held that plaintiff dealt with Price for the sale of the property. These negotiations with Price contemplated a sale of the property. The fact that the sale was not to be made to Price directly, but to a company or syndicate of which Price was to be a member, was not material. In either event the dealings of the parties contemplated a sale of the property, and if a sale, then, necessarily, there must have been an offer to sell the property, either to Price, individually, or to him as a member of the syndicate. As an offer to sell property by an agent for a compensation cannot legally be made except by a person holding a license as a real estate broker, it follows that the act of plaintiff in making said offer was illegal, and will not support a promise to pay for said services. Wise v. Radis, 74 Cal. App. 765, 242 P. 90; Haas v. Greenwald, 196 Cal. 236, 237 P. 38, 57 A. L. R. 1493.

We do not think the case of Shaffer v. Beinhorn, 190 Cal. 569, 213 P. 960, 961, is applicable to the facts of this case. There all that the plaintiffs, who were not licensed real estate brokers or licensed real estate salesmen, were required to do in order to be entitled to compensation for their services was to "find any one interested in the purchase of such a ranch, to whom the said defendant would be able to negotiate a sale thereof," or to "introduce to said defendant any one to whom the said defendant would be able to negotiate a sale thereof." The court held that a complaint predicated upon such an agreement stated a good cause of action. "The acts of plaintiffs, therefore, as alleged in the complaint, fall short of those defined by the Real Estate Brokers' Act, as constituting either a real estate broker or real estate salesman." In that case the plaintiffs were not required to do anything except to find a person interested in the ranch and introduce him to defendant. They were not required to sell the ranch or to offer it for sale, or to deal with any person for the sale thereof, or to take any part in negotiating its sale. In the present action, while the plaintiff may not have been required to do anything towards effecting a sale of the property after the expiration of the option, yet during the option he was required to deal with the subsequent purchaser for the sale of the property, and this, as we have already stated, he could not do without either directly or indirectly offering to sell him the property.

[4] While plaintiff had no license to act as a real estate broker at or before the sale of said real property to Price, he did secure such a license on July 24, 1925, and from this last-named date continuously to the commencement of this action (except for the month of January, and the first 27 days of February of 1926) held a license to act as a real estate broker. While the plaintiff was thus the holder of a valid broker's license, there was paid to defendant on the purchase price of said real property approximately the sum of $190,000. It is now contended by the plaintiff that he is entitled to recover the commission provided for in the agreement with defendant on all payments made on account of said purchase price during the time he held such license.

Plaintiff bases this contention upon the provisions of the Real Estate Brokers' Act (section 20), which provides that no recovery for commission on sale of real estate by a real estate broker can be had unless it is alleged and proven that such person was a licensed real estate broker at the time the action arose. In Houston v. Williams, 53 Cal. App. 267, 200 P. 55, the broker had no license required by said act at the time the commission contract was executed, but at the time he obtained a purchaser for the property he had the proper license. These facts were alleged in the complaint and found to be true by the court. A judgment in favor of the broker was sustained by the appellate court. In this action the court held that the cause of action arose when plaintiff obtained a purchaser for the property. In discussing the question the court said, after quoting section 20 of the Real Estate Brokers' Act (page 271 of 53 Cal. App., 200 P. 55, 56): "Manifestly the Legislature herein undertook to prescribe an essential condition of recovery, but limited its operation to the time when the cause of action arose. By implication any earlier period was excluded. It is a reasonable construction of the act to hold that it is unlawful for any one to engage in the business of a real estate broker without having secured a license, but he is not precluded from recovering compensation for his services if he had such license at the time his cause of action arose, although his contract may have been executed prior to that time when he had no license. Herein, manifestly, the cause of action arose when plaintiff obtained a purchaser for the property, and it is not disputed that then he had the proper license, and it was so alleged in the complaint."

We find no decisions of our courts that have extended the rule beyond that enunciated in that case. To adopt plaintiff's construction of the statute would be to defeat the whole object and purpose of the Real Estate Brokers Act. In Riley v. Chambers, 181 Cal. 589, 185 P. 855, 856, 8 A. L. R. 418, this court held that the primary purpose of the Real Estate Brokers Act was to require the real estate brokers and salesmen to be "honest, truthful and of good reputation." In Houston v. Williams, supra, the appellate court held that: "It [the Real Estate Brokers Act] was designed * * * to protect the public against unscrupulous operators." Under plaintiff's version of this statute a person without a license to act as a real estate broker might enter into contracts for the payment of a commission for the sale of real property, might interest prospective purchasers in the purchase of said property, might actually effect a sale of said property for the owner, in fact, he might do anything that a licensed broker might do, and then by having his contract provide for the payment of his commission at a future date, collect his commission, provided he secured a license on or before the date his commissions became due. We are satisfied that the Legislature never intended the act should receive any such construction.

Then again the results that would follow from such a construction indicate its fallacy. The act provides that it shall be unlawful for any person to act as a real estate broker without first obtaining a license therefor. Section 1. It declares that the violation of this provision of the act shall be a penal offense punishable by imprisonment in the state prison or the county jail, or by a fine not to exceed $2,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment. Section 17. If the courts were to place the construction upon this act contended for by the plaintiff, a person might be prosecuted in the criminal court for the violation of this statute and convicted, suffer fine and imprisonment in the state prison for such act, and at the same time, but on the civil side of the court, might recover judgment for the same services for the doing of which he was then suffering punishment under the judgment of conviction entered against him in the criminal action. We cannot bring ourselves to believe that such contradictory and inconsistent results were ever contemplated by those responsible for the enactment of the Real Estate Brokers Act. In many instances, no cause of action arises in favor of a person for the performance of an act made illegal by statute. This is particularly true when the statute is one enacted for the purpose of regulating a particular business for the protection of the public. Wood v. Krepps, 168 Cal. 382, 143 P. 691, L. R. A. 1915B, 851. The Real Estate Brokers Act belongs to this class of statutes. Riley v. Chambers, supra.

In Houston v. Williams, supra, it was held that a limitation upon this rule was made by section 20 of the act, and that the rule in all its rigor should not apply to a person holding a broker's license at the time he consummated a sale of real property, even though he had no such license at the time he entered into a contract with the owner to pay him a commission. The court there held that a reasonable construction of the act would permit such a holding. While agreeing with the appellate court in this ruling, we are further of the opinion that it would be a most unreasonable construction of the statute to hold that it permitted an action to be maintained as in the present proceeding where the plaintiff had no license at the date the sale of the property was effected, or during any of the time during which he rendered the services for which he seeks to recover, and only secured such a license practically a year after the sale was effected. As plaintiff held no broker's license at the time the sale involved herein was consummated, he is not entitled to recover compensation for his services, all of which were rendered prior to his securing any license.

[5] We are asked by defendant in case we should reverse the judgment appealed from to make new and additional findings of fact and direct that judgment be entered in favor of the defendant. We are satisfied from a study of the findings that a judgment in favor of the defendant based thereon would not be proper, that the findings of the trial court would not support a judgment in favor of the defendant. Therefore, in order for us to direct the entry of a judgment in favor of the defendant, it would be necessary for this court to reverse the judgment and make new findings of fact. In Tupman v. Haberkern, 208 Cal. 256, 280 P. 970, 976, this court defined the powers of appellate courts in cases like the present action as follows: "And if new findings be made as a basis of a reversal, with directions to the trial court to enter a judgment for the appellant, it must appear from the record * * * that on no theory grounded in reason and justice could the party defeated on appeal make a further substantial showing in the trial court in support of his cause." In view of the rule so recently promulgated by this court, we are of the opinion that the present action is not one in which we should exercise our power to make new findings and base thereon an order reversing the judgment and directing the trial court to enter a judgment in favor of the defendant. For this reason we are of the opinion that the order of this court should be limited to a simple reversal of the judgment.

[6] We reverse the judgment in this action reluctantly. The equities of the case are all in favor of the plaintiff. Even the defendant during the trial conceded that from an equitable standpoint plaintiff was entitled to recover for his services. During the negotiations between Price and the defendant which led up to the sale of the property to Price, defendant delayed acceptance of Price's offer until he could have an agreement with plaintiff and Dozier regarding their commission, and, after the sale to Price had been effected, defendant wrote the letter of August 7, 1924, in which he confirmed his agreement to pay a commission and acknowledged his liability to plaintiff and Dozier for their services. Not only that, but defendant actually paid to plaintiff and Dozier a commission upon the first and two subsequent payments on the purchase price of the land sold to Price. If it were in the power of the defendant to ratify his agreement with plaintiff and Dozier, he surely accomplished such a ratification by his letter just referred to. But the acts of plaintiff for which he seeks to recover compensation, having been expressly prohibited by statute, were beyond ratification by the parties.

It should be said, however, in explanation of the defendant's position in this matter, that he is not acting for himself, but as the trustee of trust property. He, therefore, cannot be governed by the equitable considerations of this transaction, but can be held accountable to the beneficiaries of his trust to a strict legal performance of his duties. It is apparent, therefore, that should he, as such trustee, expend any of the trust funds which may come into his hands for any purpose not permitted by some express provision of law, he could be held liable for such expenses to the beneficiaries of the trust, and could be forced by them to restore from his own private means all money thus illegally expended by him. There can be no criticism of the position taken by the defendant, and none is intended by anything that we have said in this opinion regarding his failure to comply with his written agreement.

The judgment is reversed.

Application by Thomas F. McCue to review an order of the Committee of Bar Examiners of the State Bar of California denying petitioner's application for admission to practice law on certificate from another state.

Application for admission granted.

Rehearing denied; WASTE, C. J., and SHENK and PRESTON, JJ., dissenting.

Clarence G. Atwood, of San Francisco, for applicant.

Fitzgerald, Abbott & Beardsley, of Oakland, for respondent.

PER CURIAM:

The applicant herein, Thomas F. McCue, in the month of December, 1927, filed in due form with the state bar of California his application to practice law in this state, basing the same upon his certificate to practice law in the state of Montana. This application was by the board of governors of the state bar referred to the committee of bar examiners. At a hearing held before said committee on February 24, 1928, the application of the said Thomas F. McCue for permission to practice law in this state was denied "on the ground that he does not possess the necessary qualifications."

On October 7, 1929, applicant requested permission of the board of governors of the state bar to renew his application. Before acting on this request of applicant, the board of governors appointed a special committee consisting of three of its own members, to wit: Judge M. C. Sloss, a former member of this court; Francis V. Keesling; and Joe G. Sweet, to examine the facts and circumstances involved in McCue's application. This special committee called a meeting at which the applicant was present and at which time he was fully interrogated by the members of the special committee as to his past life and as to his activities in the practice of law in the state of Montana and elsewhere. Upon the conclusion thereof, the special committee reported to the board of governors the facts developed at said hearing. Thereafter and on February 21, 1930, the board of governors, after considering the report of this special committee, passed the following resolution:

"Whereas, the application of T. F. McCue for recommendation that he be admitted to practice law in California has heretofore been denied by the Committee of Bar Examiners; and

"Whereas, the Board of Governors has been requested by said applicant to review the action of the Committee of Bar Examiners, and said Board of Governors, through a special committee of three of its members, has examined the facts and circumstances of the application; and

"Whereas, in the opinion of this board, the facts developed by the further inquiry of said special committee, together with the lapse of time since the original denial of the application of said McCue, make it proper and advisable that the applicant should now be recommended for admission; and

"Whereas, this board recognizes that the Committee of Bar Examiners is vested with final authority to decide whether an application for recommendation should be granted or denied;

"Now be it Resolved, That this board, approving and supporting the action heretofore taken by the Committee of Bar Examiners, recommends to said committee that it reconsider said application of T. F. McCue and that, on such reconsideration, and on the basis of the report made to this board by its special committee, said Committee of Bar Examiners recommend said McCue for admission to the practice of law in California."

Acting, no doubt, in response to this resolution, a subcommittee of the committee of bar examiners was appointed and held a meeting for the purpose of determining whether the committee of bar examiners would reconsider the application of T. F. McCue to practice law in this state. Mr. McCue was summoned before said meeting and interrogated. His examination, however, was limited to his course of conduct after taking up his residence in the state of California some time in December, 1927, and particularly as to whether he had pursued the practice of law in this state without a license so to do. Upon the evidence taken before said subcommittee, the committee of bar examiners refused to reopen Mr. McCue's case and again expressly denied his application.

Whereupon the applicant moved this court, on July 8, 1930, for an order admitting him to practice law in this state. Notice of said motion had been previously served on the committee of bar examiners, and counsel representing said committee appeared at the hearing of said motion and resisted the granting of the same. At this hearing the matter was argued and submitted upon the oral arguments of counsel and briefs of the respective parties then on file.

While it does not appear that the original order of the committee of bar examiners of date, February 24, 1928, denying Mr. McCue's application, was based upon a finding of the committee that the applicant was not a person of good moral character, the only argument advanced by counsel to sustain said order is predicated upon the showing made before the committee as to McCue's moral character. We think it must be, and is, admitted by the committee that McCue, at the date of his application, possessed "the necessary qualifications of learning and ability to practice before the courts of this state." The record before us shows that applicant was then fifty-eight years of age; that he was a graduate of the law department of the University of Northern Indiana; that he had been admitted to practice law before the Supreme Court of each of the states of Iowa, North Dakota, and Montana; that he practiced law nineteen years in the state of North Dakota before going to Montana on account of his wife's health; that he was admitted to practice law before the Supreme Court of Montana in 1918 and practiced in that state continuously up to the year of 1926 excepting comparatively short intervals when he was out of the state on legal business; that he was Attorney General of the state of North Dakota for a term of two years; and that since coming to California he had been employed in a number of cases pending before the United States District Court of the Northern District of California. His application was accompanied by a certificate from Chief Justice Calloway of the Supreme Court of Montana that applicant was a member of the bar of that state in good standing and that he had been engaged in the practice of law in the courts of that state for a period of three years within the period of seven years preceding the date of said certificate. The certificate bore date December 8, 1927.

We have recited the foregoing facts, not that there is any controversy regarding McCue's qualifications as to learning and ability, but that they might serve as a proper background to the discussion of the only seriously contested point in the case, and that is whether the applicant is possessed of the good moral character required by the laws of this state to entitle him to practice law.

[1] That the proceeding in this court by motion to be admitted to practice law is a proper proceeding has been held by this court in Brydonjack v. State Bar, 208 Cal. 439, 281 P. 1018, 63 A. L. R. 1507, and in Harrington v. State Bar, 292 P. 456.

Accompanying applicant's petition to the board of governors of the state bar there were filed numerous recommendations, letters, and certificates from prominent judges and attorneys and former clients of applicant residing principally in the state of Montana. These were not, however, confined to persons residing in said last-named state, but some of said letters were from persons occupying high official positions in our own state. These testimonials all stated that applicant was trustworthy, honorable, and a man of good moral character, or used words equally laudatory. There can be no question but that the showing made by applicant in respect to his good moral character was sufficient unless it was counteracted by adverse evidence as to his character. This adverse evidence consisted of charges which were made against applicant before the Supreme Court of the state of Montana and upon which it was sought to disbar him from practicing law in that state. It is not necessary for us to state these charges in any detail for the reason that they are fully set out in the opinions of the Supreme Court of the state of Montana when the same were considered by that court. We deem it sufficient to say at this time that, when said charges were preferred against applicant in the Supreme Court of Montana, the court appointed a former member of the district court of that state to act as a referee and to take the testimony that might be offered bearing upon said charge and to report to the court his findings and conclusion in the matters before him. The referee held a hearing at which McCue was not present in person or by counsel. At the conclusion of said hearing the referee made findings sustaining said charges and reported the same to the Supreme Court. Thereupon that court reviewed the report of the referee, approved the same, and ordered that McCue be disbarred from the practice of law in that state. In re McCue, 77 Mont. 47, 248 P. 187.

[2] Thereafter McCue, who was absent from the state of Montana at the time of the hearing of said charges by the referee and during the time his disbarment proceedings were pending before the Supreme Court, returned to the state of Montana and asked that the judgment of disbarment against him be set aside on account of lack of notice to him of the pendency of such proceeding. The showing made by him in that respect was deemed sufficient by the court, and accordingly it made an order setting aside said judgment of disbarment, and permitted McCue to file an answer to the charges which were set forth in an amended complaint filed in said court. The matter was reset for hearing before the same referee on issue joined in each specification (four in number) contained in the amended complaint. Later the Attorney General was permitted to add thereto a fifth specification, which was duly denied by McCue. At the second hearing before the referee all of the evidence introduced on the first hearing was by stipulation considered as given on the second hearing, supplemented by further depositions and oral testimony on behalf of each of the parties to the proceeding, including the testimony of McCue. On July 11, 1927, the referee filed in the Supreme Court of Montana his report of said proceedings, including his findings of fact on each of the specifications on which testimony was introduced, his conclusion therefrom, and his recommendation that the proceedings be dismissed, "as on no one of the charges made had sufficient evidence been produced to warrant the disbarment of the accused." Upon this report of the referee the Supreme Court of Montana held a hearing, and, after the matter had been argued by counsel and exhaustively considered by the court, it adopted the report and approved the recommendation of the referee and dismissed the proceeding against the accused. In re McCue, 80 Mont. 537, 261 P. 341. It may be said, however, that the decision was by a divided court, three justices joining in the judgment of dismissal while two justices dissented therefrom. A transcript of the testimony taken before the referee at each of said hearings was filed with the committee of bar examiners at its hearing held for the purpose of considering McCue's application, and the same has been certified to this court and is before us for all purposes.

[3, 4] Applicant contends, however, that we are precluded from going behind the judgment of the Supreme Court of Montana in this matter and are prohibited from considering any evidence which might tend to sustain any of the charges considered by the court in said proceeding. In other words, the applicant contends that the question as to his good moral character in so far as the same was affected by the charges filed against him in the Supreme Court of the state of Montana has been judicially determined in his favor by the judgment of said court, and that the questions there raised and determined cannot be again considered by this court. In this we think the applicant is in error. The judgment of the Supreme Court of Montana in the disbarment proceeding against McCue binds all persons who were parties to said proceeding and their privies. But neither the people of this state nor any of its officers or agencies were parties to said proceeding, or had any interest therein, or any right to be heard therein. Upon well-established rules of law they would not therefore be bound by any adjudication that might be rendered by said court. 34 C. J., § 1405.

[5] While we have the power to go behind said judgment and examine and consider the evidence offered in support of the charges which were then before the Montana court, we doubt whether, if we did so, we should arrive at any different result than that at which the Supreme Court of Montana arrived in said hearing. In the first place, there is no original evidence before us in support of the charges determined by the Supreme Court of Montana. All there is before us, and all that the committee of bar examiners had before it when passing upon McCue's moral character, was a transcript of the evidence taken before the referee appointed by the Supreme Court of Montana to take the testimony in the proceedings against McCue. The referee had the advantage of seeing the witnesses before him, of observing their manner while testifying, and of judging of their credibility. The referee was a former district judge of Montana, and it is in the record that he was not entirely satisfactory to McCue, who objected to his acting as referee. This objection was overruled, but this fact goes to show that the referee was not prejudiced in favor of McCue. Nevertheless, his findings were all in favor of McCue. The Supreme Court of Montana reviewed these findings and found that there was substantial evidence before the referee to sustain them. Under these circumstances we question the propriety of this court, or of any of its administrative agencies, assuming a contrary position or arriving at a different determination from that of the Supreme Court of Montana in its judgment dismissing said proceedings against McCue.

We are further influenced in this conclusion by the action of the board of Governors of the state bar. As we have already seen, upon McCue's application to reopen his case, the board appointed a special committee from their own membership consisting of distinguished members of the bar of this state. This special committee reviewed the proceedings before the committee of bar examiners and held a hearing, at which McCue was interrogated in regard to his connection with the matters involved in the charges against him in Montana, and upon this special committee's report to the board of bar governors the latter body passed the resolution of February 21, 1930, hereinbefore set out in full, in which the board expressed as the opinion of its members that the evidence placed before them by its special committee made it proper and advisable that the applicant should be recommended for admission.

With this record before us we are not disposed to hold that applicant has not made a proper and sufficient showing as to his good moral character so far as the Montana charges are concerned.

The further claim is made, however, that the conduct of applicant since coming to this state, and particularly as to his activities in practicing law in this state, presents a sufficient reason and good cause for the denial of his application. These facts were brought out at the hearing before the subcommittee of the committee of bar examiners, held on April 7, 1930, and after the board of bar governors had passed the resolution of February 21, 1930, in which it expressed its opinion that the facts before it made "It proper and advisable that the applicant should be recommended for admission." After this hearing and on April 21, 1930, the committee of bar examiners again denied the application of McCue. In the resolution passed by the committee in denying said application, the committee set forth the following recital, or finding, which appears to be the basis upon which it made its order of denial: "Whereas a further hearing was held on his application on April 7th, 1930, at which evidence was produced by both the applicant and by a representative of The State Bar, and whereas it appeared from said evidence that said applicant has been holding himself out to practice law in the state of California by the continued insertion of his name as an attorney-at-law in the telephone and city directories circulated in the city and county of San Francisco, and also by allowing his name to appear as a lawyer among the names of licensed attorneys-at-law on the entrance door of the offices occupied by him and them together, and by taking part in several trials in the superior court of the state of California, and in other respects. * * *

McCue came to the state of California in December, 1927, with the intention of engaging in the practice of law. He immediately filed his application with the board of bar governors, in which he called attention to the proceedings previously taken against him in the Montana Supreme Court. This application was denied by the committee of bar examiners on February 24, 1928. On October 7, 1929, McCue made application before the board of governors to renew his application. It does not appear in the record before us when the board of governors took action upon this application, but, after the board had appointed the special committee to examine into the facts and circumstances of said application and said special committee had made its report, the board of governors on February 21, 1930, passed its resolution in which it gave as its opinion that McCue should be recommended for admission. Thereafter and on April 7, 1930, the subcommittee of the committee of bar examiners held the hearing of which mention has already been made and at which hearing there was given evidence of McCue's activities in practicing law in this state without a license. It is contended by the committee of bar examiners that the evidence produced at this hearing, showing that between the date of McCue's first application and the date of said hearing last mentioned McCue had practiced law in this state without a license, furnishes ample support of the order of the committee of bar examiners denying his application.

The evidence in this respect may be grouped under three heads: (1) Evidence of his practicing law in the federal courts; (2) evidence of his practicing law in the state courts; and (3) evidence that during this time he held himself out as an attorney at law and entitled to practice law in this state.

[6, 7] Appellant admits that since coming to California under a license so to do he has frequently appeared in the federal courts of this district in the trial of cases. He stated to the committee that he had acted as attorney in some twenty different cases in said federal courts. In our opinion this was not a violation of any law of this state. The State Bar Act (St. 1927, p. 38, as amended) and other statutes enacted for the purpose of regulating the practice of law in this state are applicable to our state courts only. The federal courts are governed entirely by federal enactment and their own rules as to admission and professional conduct. This state, should it attempt, and we do not think it has, to regulate the practice of law in the federal courts or to place any restrictions or limitations upon the persons who might appear before the federal courts within this state, would be acting entirely without right and beyond its jurisdiction. It follows, therefore, that applicant's activities before the federal courts of this district were not subject to criticism, nor do they furnish any legal reason why he should be refused admission to practice in the courts of this state.

[8-10] The evidence taken before the subcommittee of the committee of bar examiners shows that McCue appeared, when first coming to this state, as a foreign attorney and with the consent of the court in a case pending at Woodland in Yolo county; that made a like appearance in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco before Judge Goodell and with Judge Goodell's consent; he was not the leading counsel in this case, but was asked by Mr. Barfield, who was the attorney of record, to accompany him to the courtroom and appear in the case; that he filed the necessary papers in a case begun in the superior court of this state to have it transferred to the federal court of this district; that in a case on trial before Judge Cabaniss of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco the judge, who was personally acquainted with the applicant, asked what he thought about the question of law then under consideration by the court, and applicant, who had done preliminary work in the case, arose in court and gave his answer to the question propounded by Judge Cabaniss, and that his reply might be called an argument; that in one instance, at the request of the attorney in the case and without compensation, he appeared at the taking of a deposition, but that said deposition had never been used in court. None of these acts of the applicant, nor all of them together, show any flagrant violation of the rules and regulations governing the conduct of attorneys in this state. It is common practice, and one sustained by general usage in all of the states of this Union, we believe, to permit upon request an attorney holding a license to practice law from one state to appear in the courts of a sister state and there take part in the trial of an action pending in said courts. This is all the applicant did when he appeared in the trial of the action in Woodland, and before Judge Goodell. The same may be said with regard to applicant's participation in the trial in the court presided over by Judge Cabaniss. It appears that the part he took in this latter instance was at the request of Judge Cabaniss and consisted merely of answering a question propounded to him by the trial judge. We do not deem the action of applicant in having a case properly within the jurisdiction of the federal court, but begun in the superior court, transferred from the latter court to the proper jurisdiction to be a matter of any great or serious consequence. The proceeding to have the case transferred from the state court was merely an incident to the defense and trial of the action in the federal court. If an attorney held a license to practice in the federal court, as well as a license from a foreign state, and could therefore represent his client in the trial of the case in the federal court, we think his appearance in the state court merely to have the action removed to the proper forum might well be considered within the rights and privileges accorded him by his said licenses. His appearance before the officer before whom a deposition was being taken at the request of the attorney of record is a practice not to be commended. This proceeding, even though held without the court, was in fact a proceeding in court. Applicant was not within his rights in appearing at said hearing, and the fact that he was acting without compensation does not furnish any justification for his actions. He had no consent from the court to appear at said hearing, and he was clearly violating the ethics of his profession as well as the laws of his adopted state by acting as an attorney in said matter without a license. However, we do not consider this conduct on his part as in any way involving his moral character, or that it is sufficient in itself to deprive him of his right to a license to practice law in this state.

[11] Finally, we will consider the acts and conduct of applicant which, it is contended by the committee of bar examiners, show and prove that McCue since coming to this state had held himself out as an attorney at law and entitled to practice law in this state. We have carefully examined the evidence bearing upon the conduct of applicant in the respect just mentioned, and we are of the opinion that it cannot be given the severe construction contended for by the committee. It is true that he maintained an office in the city of San Francisco at which he carried on his practice which grew out of those actions in which he was retained and which were pending in the federal courts. He had printed cards and other stationery, but on all of these it was distinctly stated that his practice was confined exclusively to cases before the federal courts. He testified that he invariably refused to be consulted in regard to cases before the state courts, and declined employment in all such cases. His name was on the door leading to his office, together with other persons occupying the same suite of offices with him. This door was described by a witness as follows: "Well, the number appears, then 'Law Offices', then the name of Clarence G. Atwood, with two bars under the name 'Atwood,' then Thomas F. McCue, Clifton Hildebrand, then W. W. Chapin." It appears that Mr. Atwood and Mr. Hildebrand were attorneys, but that Mr. Chapin was not. It must be conceded that the meaning of the lettering on the office door is somewhat uncertain and to a certain extent the lettering is deceptive. Whether it was intended that the names of the persons under the two bars were to be understood as the names of persons who were attorneys may not be entirely clear, but certainly it would be so understood by the general public.

The name Thomas F. McCue appears in the telephone directory and in the city directory, followed by the words "attorney-at-law," as well as his address. He states that he did not authorize the insertion of his name in either publications, and that, if it was there, it was the work of one of his associates. While it would appear that applicant has not been as punctilious as he should have been in observing the niceties of professional ethics, and while it would have been much more in keeping with good taste for him to have refrained from the commission of some of the acts enumerated above until he had been regularly licensed to practice law in this state, we cannot bring ourselves to hold that his conduct has been such as to merit a denial of his right to practice law in the state in which he is now making his home. We cannot approve of his actions in every particular, but it is our judgment that they are not of such a serious nature as to be a bar to his right to practice his profession, for which in many respects he has shown himself to be so well qualified.

It is therefore ordered that applicant, Thomas F. McCue, be and he is hereby admitted to practice as an attorney and counselor at law, authorized to practice in all the courts of this state, and the clerk of this court is hereby directed to issue and deliver to him a certificate of such authority upon his taking the prescribed oath and signing the roll of attorneys.

MORRISON et ux. v. SMITH BROS., Inc., and three other cases.S. F. 13361, 13362, 13169, 13170.

Supreme Court of California.

Nov. 3, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 28, 1930.

1. Municipal corporations ⇨2.

"Municipal utility district" is "public corporation," within meaning of statute (Civ. Code, § 284).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Public Corporation, see Words and Phrases.]

2. Municipal corporations ⇨745½.

Municipal corporations are not liable for torts of agents while acting in governmental capacity.

3. States ⇨112.

States or subdivisions are not liable for torts of agents while acting in governmental capacity.

4. Municipal corporations ⇨745½.

Municipal corporation proper, i. e., incorporated city or town, is liable for torts of agents committed while acting in proprietary capacity.

5. Drains ⇨19.

Waters and water courses ⇨228¾.

Irrigation districts and reclamation districts are state agencies performing governmental functions, and hence, subject to certain exceptions, not liable for torts of agents.

6. Municipal corporations ⇨266.

Term "municipal corporation," within meaning of constitutional provision empowering municipal corporation to establish public works for supplying certain public services, held to include municipal corporations proper and quasi municipal corporations (Const. art. 11, § 19, as amended in 1911).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Municipal Corporation," see Words and Phrases.]

7. Municipal corporations ⇨723.

Municipal utility district is "quasi-municipal corporation" and subject, as regards tort liability, to same rules as municipal corporation proper (St. 1921, p. 245; Const. art. 11, § 19, as amended in 1911).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Quasi Municipal Corporation," see Words and Phrases.]

8. Municipal corporations ⇨745.

Municipal utility district, engaged in construction project, as part of plan for conveyance and distribution of waters, held liable for agents' negligence in permitting water of creek to invade tunnel and connected workings, resulting in death of certain persons by drowning (St. 1921, p. 245).

Appeals from Superior Court, Alameda County; John J. Allen, Judge.

Actions by Angus Morrison and wife, by Methyl A. Larson and another, by Anna B. Anderson and another, and by Leona Hall and another, against Smith Brothers, Incorporated, and the East Bay Municipal Utility District. From judgment of dismissal in favor of the district, respective plaintiffs appeal.

Reversed.

L. R. Weinmann and W. E. Licking, both of Oakland, Fred S. Herrington, of San Francisco, and Frank W. Hooper and Donald McClure, both of Oakland, for appellants.

Everett J. Brown, Thomas J. Ledwich, T. P. Wittschen, and Brown & Ledwich, all of Oakland, for respondent.

Butcher & Haines, Maxwell Nichols, and Robertson & Crawford, all of Santa Barbara, amici curiæ for appellants.

Heaney, Price & Postel and Harold A. Parma, all of Santa Barbara, amici curiæ.

WASTE, C. J.

These several actions were commenced to recover damages for the alleged wrongful death of certain named persons. Briefly, and in substance, the complaints allege that the defendant district, organized under and pursuant to the provisions of the Municipal Utility District Act (St. 1921, p. 245), and while acting within the scope of the powers therein conferred, had adopted and entered into a project known as the "Mokelumne River Project" as a part of its plan for the conveyance, sale, and distribution of water to the inhabitants of the district; that in furtherance of said project it had entered into a contract with its codefendant, Smith Bros., Inc., for the construction of a certain tunnel and settling basin or diversion chamber; and that by reason of the negligence of said defendants the waters of San Pablo creek flowed into and through said tunnel and connected workings, causing the death by drowning of four named persons. The defendant district demurred generally to the several complaints, and the court below sustained each demurrer without leave to amend. From the judgment of dismissal thereafter entered in favor of the district, the respective plaintiffs appealed to this court. The causes have since been consolidated.

In sustaining the demurrers, the trial court concluded that a district formed under the provisions of the above-entitled act was not answerable in damages for the negligence of its officers and agents. The appellants contend, in effect, that the court erred in so concluding, inasmuch as districts formed under said act are municipal or "quasi-municipal" corporations enjoying many of the rights and privileges of cities and whose duties and liabilities should therefore be measured by the same standard; in other words, that the respondent district, like a municipality, is liable to suit when injury results from the negligence of its officers or agents exercising powers in reference to matters not purely governmental but of a proprietary character. Respondent, on the other hand, urges that it is to be dealt with as an agency of the state, that is, as a separate and distinct governmental entity whose purposes, activities, and functions are necessarily public or governmental in character. Respondent concedes that incorporated cities and towns have been held liable in tort and have been held to be acting in a proprietary character when engaged in activities similar to those designated by the statute under which it was formed, but argues that this does not in any sense make the same activities proprietary when engaged in by a corporation such as it declares itself to be.

The Municipal Utility District Act, supra, among other things, provides that any municipal utility district formed thereunder shall have power to have perpetual succession, to sue and be sued, except as otherwise provided therein or by law; to adopt and alter a seal; to acquire, hold, and dispose of real and personal property necessary to the full and continued exercise of its powers; to acquire, construct, own, operate, control, or use works for supplying the inhabitants of the district with light, water, power, heat, transportation, telephone service, or other means of communication, or means for the disposition of garbage, sewage, or refuse matter, and to do all things necessary or convenient to the full exercise of the powers granted by the act. It is given power when there is a surplus of water, light, heat, or power above that required by the inhabitants of the district, to dispose of the surplus outside the district to any purchaser. It also may exercise the right of eminent domain for the condemnation of private property for public use, and may construct its works across or along any street or highway, or over the lands and property of the state. It may borrow money and issue bonds or other evidence of indebtedness within certain limitations, levy and collect, or cause to be levied and collected, taxes for the purpose of carrying on its operations and paying its obligations, and may make contracts, employ labor, and do all acts necessary or convenient for the full exercise of the powers granted to it, which are to be exercised by a board of directors elected by the voters in the district.

[1-4] The tort liability of such a corporation has never been determined by the appellate courts of this state. Such a corporation is clearly a public corporation within the meaning of section 284 of the Civil Code. Within the general class of public corporations, this court has already distinguished between two different species of such corporations, as far as liability for tort is concerned. On the one hand there are incorporated cities and towns, usually referred to as municipal corporations. In reference to this type of public corporation the rule is well settled that their liability for tort depends on the nature of the work being done at the time the tort is committed. If the agents were acting in a governmental capacity, no liability attaches to the corporation, under the elementary rule that the state or its various subdivisions are not liable for the torts of their agents while acting in a governmental capacity. But it is equally well settled that an incorporated city or town is liable for the torts of its agents committed while acting in a proprietary capacity. Chafor v. Long Beach, 174 Cal. 478, 484, 163 P. 670, L. R. A. 1917E, 685, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 106; Davoust v. Alameda, 149 Cal. 69, 70, 84 P. 760, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 536, 9 Ann. Cas. 847. This type of public corporation will be referred to in this opinion as a municipal corporation proper.

[5] The other type of public corporation upon whose tort liability this court has already passed is typified by irrigation, reclamation, or drainage organizations, whose main purpose is to assist the state in reclaiming, improving, and aiding the productivity of farm lands. In reference to this type of organization the law is well settled that, subject to certain exceptions not important in this case, they are not liable for the torts of their agents, upon the theory that they are state agencies, performing a governmental function. Whiteman v. Anderson-Cottonwood Irr. Dist., 60 Cal. App. 234, 236, 212 P. 706; Nissen v. Cordua Irr. Dist., 204 Cal. 542, 269 P. 171. It is somewhat difficult to determine the exact nature of this type of organization, due to some rather loose language used in describing them. In the leading case of In re Madera Irrigation District, 92 Cal. 296, 318, 28 P. 272, 675, 14 L. R. A. 755, 27 Am. St. Rep. 106, such organizations were referred to as "public corporations" for "governmental purposes," and, at page 317 of 92 Cal., 28 P. 272, 276, as "the agents or representatives of the state in the particular locality in which they exist." In Nissen v. Cordua Irr. Dist., supra, at page 545 of 204 Cal., 269 P. 171, 173, and in Lindsay-Strathmore Irr. Dist. v. Superior Court, 182 Cal. 315, 335, 187 P. 1056, they are referred to as "public agencies." In Jenison v. Redfield, 149 Cal. 500, 501, 87 P. 62, they are called "public corporations." In Turlock Irr. Dist. v. White, 186 Cal. 183, 187, 198 P. 1060, 1062, 17 A. L.

R. 72, it was said "that such a corporation is not a municipal corporation, but a 'public corporation for municipal purposes.'" In People v. Reclamation Dist., 117 Cal. 114, 120, 48 P. 1016, 1017, it was said that "if these districts can be said to be corporations at all, I think they are properly called 'public corporations for municipal purposes.' That phrase means no more than that they are state organizations for state purposes." In Whiteman v. Anderson-Cottonwood Irr. Dist., supra, at page 237 of 60 Cal. App., 212 P. 706, 708, it is said: "As to the character of irrigation districts as organized under our statute, it must be conceded that they are public corporations or public agencies, but not 'municipal corporations,' as that term is usually understood." And in Western Assurance Co. v. Sacramento, etc., Drainage Dist., 72 Cal. App. 68, 76, 237 P. 59, they are referred to as "governmental agencies of the state." For the purposes of this opinion such organizations will be referred to as state agencies.

[6] Organizations of the nature of respondent are of relatively recent origin in this state. They will be referred to in this opinion as quasi-municipal corporations. In 1911, article 11, section 19, of the Constitution was amended to read, in part, as follows: "Any municipal corporation may establish and operate public works for supplying its inhabitants with light, water, power, heat, transportation, telephone service or other means of communication. * * *" That the term "municipal corporation," as above used, was not intended to be limited to municipal corporations proper, as defined in this opinion, but was intended to include quasi-municipal corporations similar to respondent, is well settled. Immediately after the adoption of the above constitutional provision, the Legislature amended the Municipal Water District Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 1290, amendment, Stats. 1911, Ex. Sess., p. 92), which permitted the creation of districts similar in many respects to respondent. In the case of Henshaw v. Foster, 176 Cal. 507, 169 P. 82, the constitutionality of this act was attacked. At page 511 of 176 Cal., 169 P. 82, 84, this court said:

"By the law and under its sanctions the people of one or more municipalities with the adjacent territory may unite for the joint benefit of all forming a municipal corporation through which they may accomplish that which it would be impossible for any one of the constituent municipal or suburban units to perform. * * *

"Respondents take the position that the act in question violates the above-quoted sections 12 and 13, because 'it delegates to some one other than the corporate authorities the power to assess and collect taxes for city and municipal purposes.' This argument, like the other objection discussed herein, is based in part upon the supposed exclusive authority conferred by section 19 of article 11 upon cities. But, as we have seen, that article applies not merely to cities and towns but to all municipal corporations, and power to acquire and sell water may be given to municipalities larger in territory and including within themselves cities and towns or similar corporations." (Italics added.) Thus, from the very first, the courts have recognized that the above constitutional provision has created a new type of public corporation very similar to municipal corporations proper, but radically different from the state agencies above discussed.

The next step in the development of this new type of municipal corporation came with the passage of the County Water District Act of 1913 (St. 1913, p. 1049). This act was closely patterned on the Water District Act of 1911, except that it applied to unincorporated territory. In 1921 the Legislature, which had hitherto limited the new type of municipal corporation to water districts, decided to extend the same to the operation of other utilities. As a result, there was passed the Public Utility District Act (St. 1921, p. 906), and also the Municipal Utility District Act (St. 1921, p. 245), the two acts being similar in nature, except that the former applies only to unincorporated territory, while the latter has application to incorporated territory alone or in combination with unincorporated territory. It is under the latter act that respondent is incorporated. These two acts were closely patterned on the 1911 act above mentioned. In the case of In re Orosi Public Utility District, 196 Cal. 43, at page 56, 235 P. 1004, 1009, a case strongly relied on by both parties, it is said: "It is significant that, when the Legislature came to pass the act extending to the inhabitants outside of incorporated cities and towns, the privileges in regard to the acquisition and use of their own public utilities that are granted by the state Constitution to municipalities, it should have followed so closely the language of the constitutional amendment of 1911 in the statement of the purposes for which the districts may be created. We are convinced that it was its intention to provide for the creation of public corporations of a quasi municipal character, with power to carry on the particular functions committed to them." (Italics added.) The court in that case clearly and unequivocally held that such quasi-municipal corporations differ from state agencies as above defined, and are similar to municipal corporations proper. At page 52 of 196 Cal., 235 P. 1004, 1008, the court thus distinguishes between state agencies and quasi-municipal corporations:

"The purposes for which the Orosi District was formed, the appellant contends, are not municipal, and a district formed for such purposes does not possess the essential characteristics of a municipal corporation. If the authorities cited by him were strictly in point, there would be an end to the controversy; but they are not. They deal with questions arising in connection with districts formed for the purpose of draining, irrigating, reclaiming, or otherwise directly benefiting the lands affected thereby. [Citing cases.] When related to that class of districts, the cases cited are clearly in point. The improvements contemplated by the acts under which they were formed cannot be considered 'municipal purposes.' * * * One of the distinguishing features of such districts is that they are created for the purpose, generally, of some special local improvement, and may exercise only such powers as may be conferred by the Legislature in the line of the object of their creation. They are merely special state organizations for state purposes, created to perform certain work which the policy of the state requires or permits to be done, and to which the state has given a certain degree of discretion in making the improvements contemplated. The other distinguishing feature is that the exactions which such districts may enforce in order to carry out their purposes are in the nature of assessments or taxes for local benefits, to be spread on the property in the districts in proportion to the peculiar advantage accruing to each parcel from the improvement. * * *

"Districts of the nature just discussed are not municipal corporations in the contemplation of the Constitution."

The final act in the development of this new type of quasi-municipal corporation came in 1927 with the passage of the Metropolitan Water District Act (St. 1927, p. 694), an act closely patterned on the other acts herein mentioned, and permitting the creation of a district which, for all practical purposes, is the same as respondent district. In the case of Pasadena v. Chamberlain, 204 Cal. 653, 269 P. 630, it was directly held that such a district, for all practical purposes, was a municipal corporation. At page 663 of 204 Cal., 269 P. 630, 634, it is said: "Municipal corporations, whether organized under special charters or general laws, derive these particular powers from the same legal sources as those which provide for the organization of quasi municipal corporations such as that provided for in this act, and we can perceive no real distinction between the organization of a municipal corporation, strictly so-called, for the carrying forth of the purposes usually committed to such governmental agencies and the organization under legislative sanction of such other governmental agencies as municipal water districts or public utility districts or metropolitan water districts, which, while these may not exercise all of the functions committed to municipal corporations, strictly so-called, are empowered to exercise certain of these functions which have come to be recognized as at least quasi governmental in character."

Thus, from 1911 to date, there has been developed a new type of public corporation, resembling in many respects municipal corporations proper, and radically different in nature from irrigation and reclamation districts. The case of Henshaw v. Foster, supra, clearly recognized the distinction, holding that such quasi-municipal corporations were municipal corporations within the meaning of article 11, section 19, of the state Constitution. Unless the court had so found a distinction, it could not have upheld the delegation to a board of directors of the general taxing power. In the Orosi Case, supra, the court again found a distinction between irrigation districts and quasi-municipal corporations. The court there pointed out that the purposes and means of operation are different. It stated that these quasi-municipal corporations pay their way, first, out of charges for services supplied, and, second, out of taxation by general assessment in the same manner as municipal corporations proper. State agencies, on the other hand, assess their costs according to the benefits conferred upon the individual property affected. In the Chamberlain Case, supra, the close similarity to municipal corporations proper of this new type of organizations was emphasized.

[7, 8] We feel that sufficient has been said to show that such quasi-municipal corporations as respondent more closely resemble municipal corporations proper than they do state agencies, such as irrigation and reclamation districts. Under such circumstances we deem the better rule to be that, so far as tort liability is concerned, such liability is to be governed by the same rules as are applicable to municipal corporations proper. No good reason occurs to us why those districts should be cloaked with the immunity that respondent claims when acting in a purely proprietary capacity; and, in fact, many reasons exist why the same rule that applies to municipal corporations proper should apply to respondent. It would certainly be an anomalous situation if a municipality engaged in a proprietary function, such as running, operating or constructing waterworks, would be liable for the torts of its agents, but if that same municipality should join with other municipalities and organize a municipal utility district it would thereby immunize itself from all such liability. Such a rule does not appeal to our sense of justice nor to our reason. The rule excluding state agencies from liability for tort is an exception to the general rule which we are not inclined to extend. In so far as liability for tort is concerned, the respondent district is to be governed by the same rules as govern municipal corporations with reference to the same question—that is, respondent is liable for the torts of its agents if said torts are committed while the agents are acting in a proprietary capacity. It therefore follows that the trial court was in error in sustaining the general demurrers without leave to amend. Whatever defects may appear in the complaints may easily be corrected by amendment.

For the foregoing reasons the judgments of the trial court are reversed.

RICE et ux. v. HANRAHAN CO. et al.
S. F. 13341.

Supreme Court of California.
Oct. 31, 1930.

1. Municipal corporations ⇨269(1)—Proceedings where work is done on street not acquired at time are not invalid, if land is acquired before judgment is entered (Improvement Act 1911, § 26, as amended by St. 1923, p. 117, § 5).

Under Improvement Act (St. 1911, p. 730) § 26, as amended by St. 1923, p. 117, § 5, where work is done on street or right of way not lawfully dedicated or acquired at time, proceedings are not invalid provided land is lawfully dedicated or acquired at any time before judgment is entered in suit involving such proceeding.

2. Constitutional law ⇨289—Inclusion of undedicated strip in street improvement does not deny property owners due process of law (Improvement Act 1911, § 21).

Inclusion of undedicated strip in street improvement proceeding does not deny property owners within assessment district due process of law, since if because of failure to acquire necessary rights their property shall be subjected to an invalid assessment, property owners have their legal remedy under Improvement Act, § 21 (St. 1911, p. 743), and general rules of law applicable.

3. Municipal corporations ⇨294(3)—Street improvement proceeding held not invalidated by slight departure from statutory requirement as to lettering of notice of improvement.

Street improvement proceeding held not invalidated by slight departure from statutory requirement as to lettering of heading "Notice of Improvement," in that some of letters fell slightly below statutory standard.

4. Municipal corporations ⇨294(4)—Notice of street improvement held not defective because of failure to state work was to be chargeable upon a district and failure to describe district, since Improvement Act, § 5 (St. 1911, p. 734), makes no such requirement, and, where resolution gave detailed description of district to be benefited and made subject to assessment, notice, with its reference to resolution, thus afforded necessary information.

5. Municipal corporations ⇨339(1)—Award of street improvement contract held not objectionable where contractor had reasonable discretion to vary somewhat proportions of sand and rock in order to fill all voids.

Award of street improvement contract, in which specifications for concrete pavements called for one part of Portland cement, two parts of sand, and four parts of broken rock or stone by measure, with proviso that proportions might be changed by contractor whenever voids in materials used were not filled by use of ingredients in specified proportions, held not objectionable, since discretion of contractor to vary somewhat proportions of sand and rock in order to fill all voids was reasonable.

6. Municipal corporations ⇨339(2)—Specifications in street improvement contract held not defective because of clause declaring contractor, if requested, should furnish tests of cement made by reliable chemist, such tests to conform to specifications required by American Association of Civil Engineers.

Specifications in street improvement contract held not defective because of clause in relation to cement for use in concrete pavements, declaring that contractor, if requested by engineer, should furnish tests of cement made by some reliable chemist, such tests to conform to specifications required by American Association of Civil Engineers, where specifications required that all cement should be Portland cement, and should be delivered as specified and be kept dry.

7. Municipal corporations ⇨339(1)—In specifications of street improvement contract, details regarding implements used and material to cover pavement held properly left to engineer's judgment.

In specifications of street improvement contract, details of implements for mixing materials and regarding material to be used in covering concrete pavements during curing process held properly left to expert judgment of engineer as supervising officer.

8. Municipal corporations ⇨339(2)—Provision of street improvement contract requiring concrete pavements to be not less than thickness shown in plans held not invalid.

Provision of street improvement contract requiring concrete pavements to be "not less than thickness shown in plans, after being thoroughly tamped," held not invalid, where contractor was required to keep upon the work a copy of plans and specifications available at all times to engineer.

9. Municipal corporations ⇨339(2)—Clause of specifications in street improvement contract requiring contractor to furnish work or material unintentionally omitted in description but necessary held not objectionable.

In specifications of street improvement contract, clause stating that "any work or material which may have been unintentionally omitted in description of work, but which is clearly necessary for proper prosecution of contract, shall be furnished by contractor, the same as if it had been specified" held not objectionable.

10. Municipal corporations ⚡318—Objections to specifications not presented to town council in protest against proceeding with street improvement were waived (Improvement Act 1911, § 16).

Objections to specifications not made in protest presented to town council under Improvement Act, § 16 (St. 1911, p. 737), against proceeding with street improvement, were waived, and injunction to restrain work would not issue upon grounds not stated in protest.

11. Municipal corporations ⚡331—Notices inviting sealed bids on street improvement held sufficient, where streets were named and reference was made to resolution of intention for further particulars (Improvement Act 1911, § 9).

Notices inviting sealed bids on street improvement held sufficient, where streets were named and specific reference was made to resolution of intention for further particulars and description of work, and resolution contained all information necessary, since Improvement Act, § 9 (St. 1911, p. 735), makes reference to resolution sufficient for purposes of description.

12. Municipal corporations ⚡335(2)—Notice of award of contract for street improvement held sufficient, though not naming one of streets to be improved (Improvement Act 1911, § 11).

Notice of award of contract for street improvement held sufficient under Improvement Act, § 11 (St. 1911, p. 736), though not naming one of streets to be improved, where notice referred to bid and resolution.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; F. B. Brown, Judge.

Action by Samuel Wallace Rice, also and usually known as and called S. W. Rice, and wife, against the Hanrahan Company and others, to enjoin the performance of street work. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiffs appeal.

For opinion of District Court of Appeal, herewith adopted, see 285 P. 414.

R. M. F. Soto, of San Francisco, and Kirkbride & Gordon and Kirkbride, Wilson & Brooks, all of San Mateo, for appellants.

Albert Mansfield, of Redwood City, and D. T. Jenkins, of San Jose, for respondents.

PRESTON, J.

This cause involves the validity of certain street improvement proceedings in Los Gatos, had under the Improvement Act of 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 730) and the Improvement

Bond Act of 1915 (Stats. 1915, p. 1441). The only serious point urged on the appeal is that a certain small area included in the improvement was private property. There is, however, no proper record upon which to found this contention.

Appellants recite a portion of an opinion of the railroad commission rendered some four months after judgment in the case before us, and upon this showing alone assert the invalidity of the whole street proceedings. The learned District Court of Appeal treated the point as properly before them and disposed of it contrary to appellants' contention. We are entirely satisfied with the opinion and conclusion of said court and hereby adopt same as the opinion of this court herein, as follows, to wit:

This is an action to enjoin performance of street work at Los Gatos, pursuant to a contract made on May 4, 1928, with the defendant Hanrahan Company under the Improvement Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 730), supplemented by the Improvement Bond Act of 1915 (St. 1915, p. 1441). The trial court gave judgment in favor of defendants, and from that judgment appeal was taken by plaintiffs, who are the owners of property within the district assessable for the work. Plaintiffs contend that the proceedings leading up to the award of the contract were insufficient to confer jurisdiction upon the town council to proceed with the improvement.

Among the streets designated for improvement in the resolution of intention and in the notices preceding the award were Royce street, Gray's lane, and Elm street, Gray's lane lying between the other two streets, and all three running from University avenue on the east to Santa Cruz avenue on the west. The three streets are crossed by tracks of the Southern Pacific Company; and, after the contract had been awarded, the town applied to the railroad commission for an order authorizing the widening and improvement of the crossings at the intersection of these streets and the railroad tracks. The commission gave the desired permission for improvement of the crossing at Elm street, but denied the application as to the other two crossings, upon the ground that the volume of traffic at those points did not justify expenditure by the railroad company to the extent involved in the installation of an improved type of crossing.

In such work the railroad company bears the expense of the improvements within lines set two feet outside of the outermost rails; and both the resolution of intention and the notices described the proposed improvement so as to exclude from the public contract awarded to the Hanrahan Company the crossing work within the lines drawn as just stated. It appears, however, that at Gray's lane some widening of the street will be necessary, and that, in addition to the land already dedicated for street purposes, the city will need to acquire and has included in the portion of Gray's lane, as described in the contract, a strip 5.7 feet wide by 27.6 feet long, said to belong to the railroad company.

It is contended that the inclusion of this strip in the public contract renders the contract void, and it is further contended that certain alleged defects in the legal notices and certain alleged shortcomings in the specifications were serious enough to deprive the town council of jurisdiction to charge upon property owners the expense of the proposed improvements.

[1, 2] So far as the undedicated strip of land is concerned, it is quite possible that the town may acquire the necessary rights there-to either by dedication or otherwise before any assessment is imposed. And under section 26 of the Act of 1911, as amended in 1923 (St. 1923, p. 117, § 5), though work is done on a street or right of way not lawfully dedicated or acquired at the time, the proceedings are not to be held invalid, provided the land is lawfully dedicated or acquired at any time before judgment is entered in the suit involving such proceeding. If, because of failure to acquire the necessary rights, plaintiffs' property shall be subjected to an invalid assessment, plaintiffs will have their legal remedy under section 21 and the general rules of law applicable under such circumstances. The inclusion of the undedicated strip does not result, therefore, in denying to plaintiffs due process of law. Chase v. Trout, 146 Cal. 350, 359, 80 P. 81; Watkinson v. Vaughn, 182 Cal. 55, 58, 186 P. 753; Noyes v. Chambers, 202 Cal. 542, 544, 261 P. 1006.

It appears further that the plaintiffs did not deem this objection to be of sufficient merit to receive specific mention in the notice which they filed with the council under section 16 of the act, protesting against the award of the contract. In that notice plaintiffs contented themselves with the general objection that the council never acquired jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the proceeding.

Plaintiffs rely upon Spaulding v. Wesson, 115 Cal. 441, 47 P. 249, and Hall v. Fairchild Co., 66 Cal. App. 615, 227 P. 649. The former, having been decided long before the amendment of 1923, is not now applicable to the situation found here, and in the Hall Case the area in question formed part of a public park which could not legally be withdrawn for highway purposes. Accordingly the assessment in that case was beyond cure.

We are of the opinion that the legal rights of plaintiffs are fully protected under the provisions of the act as it read at the time of the proceedings in question.

[3] Another objection made relates to the heading of the posted "Notice of Improvement." The law requires such heading to be in letters of not less than one inch in length. Some of the letters fell slightly below this standard, but the trial court found that the letters were of sufficient height and size so that the words "Notice of Improvement" could be easily read by a person of average eyesight, at a distance of 45 feet (about the width of a street), and that there was a substantial compliance with the legal requirement in that particular. All the letters in this case were larger than those in Coleman v. Spring Construction Co., 41 Cal. App. 201, 182 P. 473, where the notice, being found sufficiently legible, was held to be in substantial compliance with the law. So also in McCaleb v. Dreyfus, 156 Cal. 204, 210, 103 P. 924, stress is laid on legibility rather than on literal compliance with the statute. In view of the finding of the trial court, we conclude therefore that the proceedings were not invalidated by the slight departure from the statutory requirement as to the lettering. Beck v. Ransome-Crummey Co., 42 Cal. App. 674, 682, 184 P. 431.

[4] It is urged further that the notice of improvement was defective because of failure to state that the work was to be chargeable upon a district and to describe the district. Section 5 of the act makes no such requirement. It directs that there shall be a brief statement of the work proposed, with reference to the resolution of intention for further particulars. The resolution gives a detailed description of the district to be benefited and made subject to assessment. The notice, with its reference to the resolution, thus afforded the necessary information.

[5] An additional objection to the award of the contract is based on the ground that the specifications are defective because of indefiniteness in requirements concerning materials and also because of unlawful discretion conferred upon the contractor. The specifications for concrete pavements call for one part of Portland cement, two parts of sand, and 4 parts of broken rock or stone by measure, with the proviso that the proportions may be changed by the contractor whenever the voids in the materials used are not filled by use of the ingredients in the specified proportions. But it is also stated that a cubic yard of concrete in place shall contain not less than 6 sacks of cement. And the specifications contain likewise detailed provisions concerning the kind, quality, and condition of the sand and stone, and the sizes of the meshes through which those materials must be screened to assure general uniformity.

It thus appears that the contractor is required to furnish materials definitely described and to mix them ordinarily in the fixed proportions with a view to having a serviceable pavement with all voids filled. It was recognized, however, that occasionally, in order to fill all voids, it might be necessary to vary somewhat the proportions of sand and rock so as to procure the right density and make a durable pavement. The contractor has no discretion to depart from the specifications determining the condition and quality of the materials, and since the purpose is to assure, through intelligent exercise of discretion, an admixture making a pavement free of the voids which are apt to occur in any such work because of occasional variation in uniformity of one or another of the ingredients, there is not that vice in the specifications which the law condemns. It is, of course, desirable to have all details precisely fixed so far as reasonably possible, but allowance must be made in practice for contingencies bound to arise in every piece of actual construction. Some modicum of discretion must therefore in sound reason be conceded, and, though a measure of practical judgment is exercised by the contractor, the property owners are safeguarded by the requirement of fulfillment of the contract under the direction, and to the satisfaction, of the city engineer. There is nothing to indicate that the discretion authorized will have any bearing on the cost of the work proposed or any appreciable effect upon the assessments. Public contracts, as well as private contracts, must be dealt with in a practical way. They are intended to get beneficial results, and, while the property owners' rights must be protected by due legal procedure and such definiteness and certainty in plans and specifications as will guard against jerry-building and dishonesty, the tendency to strain at gnats is to be deprecated. The discretion authorized in this instance is reasonable, and is justified by the views expressed in Mill Valley v. Massachusetts Bonding Co., 68 Cal. App. 372, 380, 229 P. 891; Chase v. Trout, 146 Cal. 350, 364, 80 P. 81; Haughwout v. Hubbard, 131 Cal. 675, 679, 63 P. 1078; Thoits v. Byxbee, 34 Cal. App. 226, 234, 167 P. 166; Burnham v. Abrahamson, 21 Cal. App. 248, 258, 259, 131 P. 338; Burns v. Casey, 13 Cal. App. 154, 168, 109 P. 94.

[6] Defectiveness in the specifications is charged also because of a clause, in relation to the cement for use in concrete pavements, declaring that the contractor, if requested by the engineer, shall furnish tests of cement made by some reliable chemist, such tests to conform to specifications required by the American Association of Civil Engineers. This, however, is not the only provision concerning such cement. Immediately preceding the clause criticized appears the following: "All cement shall be Portland Cement. It shall be delivered in original unbroken barrels or bags, with the name and brand of the manufacturer plainly marked. It must be perfectly dry and free from lumps, and when stored must be protected from the weather and moisture of the ground." Portland cement is a standard commodity, and the products of the different manufacturers are known to builders and engineers. There is nothing in the language used making it mandatory upon the engineer to demand tests, but as a matter of precaution the contractor is obligated to furnish tests if called for. In relation to cement for use in the construction of sidewalks and curbs, the provision is that "The cement used must be Portland Cement meeting the requirements and tests of the Standard specifications for Portland Cement adopted by the American Society of Testing Materials." There is nothing in the record to indicate that the specifications of the organizations mentioned are not commonly accepted as trustworthy standards, and there is no good reason why general trade usages should not enter into public contracts as well as private. If the engineer may satisfy himself by tests "made by some reliable chemist," and those tests are "to conform to specifications required" in the one case by the American Association of Civil Engineers and in the other by the American Society of Testing Materials, it is fair to conclude that "reliable chemists" in general, as well as engineers and contractors, are thoroughly familiar with the specifications intended. We find no merit in the objection.

[7] The specifications are assailed further because the type of implements for mixing materials is made subject to the approval of the engineer. There is a provision that materials shall be mixed in a batch mixer or a pug mill mixer approved by the engineer, and that, if the latter sort is used, the paddles shall be of the number and type approved by the engineer. Such matters are mere operative details properly committed to the judgment of the engineer as the supervising officer. Thoits v. Byxbee, 34 Cal. App. 226, 234, 235, 167 P. 166; Burns v. Casey, 13 Cal. App. 154, 158, 109 P. 94. The same may be said concerning the attack upon the provision in relation to the curing of concrete pavements, which on being laid are to be covered with not less than two inches of earth or other material approved by the engineer, and kept wet for at least ten days. The "other material" does not enter into construction any more than the earth, if used. It is a mere temporary protective device, and the substitution may properly be left to the expert judgment of the engineer. Mills v. City of Elsinore, 93 Cal. App. 753, 769, 270 P. 224.

[8] Another provision which is said to make for invalidity is that in relation to the concrete pavement, which is required to be "not less than the thickness shown in the plans, after being thoroughly tamped." This is a hypercritical objection. The specifications refer repeatedly to the plans on file, and the plans and the specifications are to be read together; the contractor being required to "keep upon the work a copy of the plans and specifications" available at all times to the engineer.

[9] Under the head of "General Requirements," the specifications contain a clause stating that "any work or material which may have been unintentionally omitted in the description of the work, but which is clearly necessary for proper prosecution of the contract, shall be furnished by the Contractor, the same as if it had been specified." Criticism is leveled, not at the purpose or effect of the clause, but at the use of the words "unintentionally omitted," without designation of an arbiter. The clause is merely included as a general rule of interpretation of the plans and specifications; the clear intent being to declare that all the incidents to the performance of a workmanlike job are to be deemed incorporated, whether expressly mentioned or not. We apprehend that similar provisions are included in almost every such set of specifications as a precaution against disputes over trivial matters. The provision cannot justly be condemned.

[10] Though plaintiffs presented to the town council, under section 16 of the act, a protest against proceeding with the improvement, none of the various objections now made to the specifications was included in their protest. Therefore, according to the express provision of the section, the objections were waived, and injunction to restrain the work will not issue upon grounds not stated in any protest. Blake v. City of Eureka, 201 Cal. 643, 648, 258 P. 945; Brydon v. City of Hermosa Beach, 93 Cal. App. 615, 624, 270 P. 255.

[11] All preliminary proceedings having been duly had, the council acquired jurisdiction to order the improvement. It thereupon passed a resolution to that effect, ordering at the same time posting and publication of notices inviting sealed bids. It is contended, though not seriously, that these notices were deficient in their indication of the character of the work to be done and the district to be affected. The streets were named and specific reference was made to the resolution of intention for further particulars and a description of the work. The resolution contained all the information which plaintiffs would have included in the notices, and section 9 of the act expressly makes reference to the resolution sufficient for purposes of description of the improvement and the assessment district. The notices therefore complied with the law.

[12] Hanrahan Company, having been the lowest bidder, received the award of the contract. Notice of the award was then given, but in the notice one of the streets to be improved, Wilder avenue, was, through inadvertence, not named. The notice of award, referred, however, to the bid on file, to the resolution of award, and also to the resolution of intention for a description of the work and the particulars thereof. Section 11 of the act makes no specific requirement as to the contents of the notice of award, and, since it was not essential that such notice should recite the names of the streets, we are of the opinion that the reference to the resolutions previously adopted and the bid of the successful contractor charged the property owners with notice of the extent of the work actually included in the contract as awarded.

This objection was really the only one now made which was specifically embodied in the protest presented by plaintiffs to the council, and reliance is placed upon the decision in McNutt v. Los Angeles, 187 Cal. 245, 201 P. 592, dealing with the concurrent improvement and change of grade of a tunnel and adjacent streets under the act of 1913 (St. 1913, p. 954). Under section 3 of that act, however, it was made the express duty of the city clerk to mail to each property owner in the assessment district a notice of the passage of the resolution of intention "with the name of the street to be improved and between what streets located." There being in the act of 1911 no such mandatory direction to name streets in the notice of award, the case cited is inapplicable.

We have given consideration to the several objections urged by plaintiffs, notwithstanding the fact that these objections, with one exception, had all been waived by failure to present them in the protest to the town council. Our conclusion is that the notices given were in substantial compliance with the law; that the specifications possess legal definiteness and certainty; that the council was invested with jurisdiction to order the work; and that the contract therefor was legally awarded and made.

The judgment is affirmed.

SHENK, J.

I dissent. I cannot subscribe to that portion of the main opinion which holds that the city authorities had jurisdiction to institute and carry forward the street assessment proceedings in the face of the admitted fact that the improvement was to be made in part on privately owned property. Since the cases of Spaulding v. Bradley, 79 Cal. 449, 22 P. 47, and Spaulding v. Wesson, 115 Cal. 441, 47 P. 249, the law has been uniform that private property may not be improved under a street assessment proceeding, and that a proceeding which attempts to do so is void. Section 26 of the act of 1911 was amended in 1923 (Stats. 1923, p. 117) to provide that no proceedings taken under the act should be held invalid on the ground that the right of way on which the work is to be done has not been lawfully dedicated or acquired, "provided the same is lawfully dedicated or acquired at any time before judgment is entered in the suit involving such proceeding." The present suit unquestionably is one involving such proceeding. It is conceded on all hands that a portion of the property to be improved is privately owned property, and that no dedication thereof for public use took place before the entry of judgment herein. Furthermore, section 21 of the act affords no protection to the plaintiffs if, because of the failure to acquire the necessary right of way, the plaintiff's property be subjected to an invalid assessment. The question is one of jurisdiction, and that section, in my opinion, does not afford protection or relief in such a case.

KRAUSE et al. v. RARITY et al.
S. F. 13320.

Supreme Court of California.
Oct. 31, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 24, 1930.

1. Appeal and error ⇨1002.

Jury's finding of railroad's negligence on conflicting evidence as to whether statutory signals were given on approaching highway where automobile was struck would not be disturbed.

2. Railroads ⇨327(12).

Guest in automobile was under no legal obligation to warn driver of presence of tracks or of approaching train.

3. Railroads ⇨350(21).

Contributory negligence of guest injured when automobile driven by one-eyed man was struck by train held for jury.

4. Automobiles ⇨245(24).

In action for death of guest, negligence of driver of automobile struck by train at crossing held for jury.

5. Automobiles ⇨244(36).

Railroads ⇨348(2).

Evidence warranted jury's finding that collision between automobile and train in which guest was injured occurred through concurrent negligence of automobile driver and railroad.

6. Negligence ⇨93(1).

Negligence of automobile driver could not be imputed to guest.

7. Automobiles ⇨246(60).

In action for guest's death, instruction that, if jury found facts therein stated, automobile driver was conclusively presumed to have been guilty of negligence in railroad crossing collision, held proper (St. 1927, p. 1436, § 30, amending St. 1923, p. 553, § 113).

The instruction was in substance that, if jury found facts indicated therein which would constitute grade crossing in question an obstructed railway crossing at grade, as contemplated by California Vehicle Act, § 113 (St. 1923, p. 553), and if it should further find that driver was traveling at rate in excess of 15 miles per hour as he came on crossing, then automobile driver was conclusively presumed to have been guilty of negligence at time of collision. The facts indisputably pointed to negligence of automobile driver, and compelled conclusion that he was guilty of negligence as matter of law on establishment of facts called for in instruction.

8. Death ⇨99(4).

$35,000 for death of man 42 years old, earning $4,000 to $5,000 yearly, and contributing $250 to $350 monthly to wife and children, held not excessive.

9. Negligence ⇨136(9).

Court properly denied motion for nonsuit and directed verdict, where evidence for plaintiff and reasonable inferences therefrom tended to establish defendant's negligence.

10. Death ⇨31(5).

Right of heirs to sue for death of guest in automobile was statutory right (Code Civ. Proc. § 377).

11. Constitutional law ⇨105.

Action for death depending solely on statute is not vested right protected by Constitution (Code Civ. Proc. § 377).

12. Death ⇨9.

Statute did not abolish right of action for death or injury of guest in automobile, but merely changed proof required to permit recovery (St. 1929, p. 1580, adding § 141¾ to St. 1923, p. 517).

13. Negligence ⇨11.

"Gross negligence" is want of slight diligence; an entire failure to exercise care, or exercise of so slight a degree of care as to justify belief there was indifference to things and welfare of others.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Gross Negligence," see Words and Phrases.]

14. Negligence ⇨136(14).

Where liability attaches only for gross negligence, jury under proper instructions determines whether such negligence exists.

15. Automobiles ☞6.

Death ☞9.

Statute relating to action for injury or death of guest in automobile did not repeal prior statute, but simply changed degree of negligence required to permit recovery (St. 1929, p. 1580, adding § 141¾ to St. 1923, p. 517; Code Civ. Proc. § 377).

16. Statutes ☞263.

Statute will not be given retrospective effect unless legislative intention to do so clearly appears.

17. Automobiles ☞6.

Death ☞9.

Statute respecting action for injury or death of guest in automobile held not retroactive (St. 1929, p. 1580, adding § 141¾ to St. 1923, p. 517).

18. Automobiles ☞6.

Death ☞9.

Statute respecting action for injury or death of guest in automobile, not being retrospective, had no effect on litigation pending when it was enacted (St. 1929, p. 1580, adding § 141¾ to St. 1923, p. 517).

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Stanley Murray, Judge.

Action by Betty K. Krause and another, minors, by their guardian ad litem, Lena Krause, and Lena Krause individually, against John W. Rarity and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal.

SHENK, J.

On September 12, 1927, William Krause was killed when the automobile in which he was riding as a guest was struck by a locomotive of the defendant railway company. The plaintiffs are the heirs of the deceased, and the defendant Rarity was the driver of the car. A verdict was rendered against both defendants as joint tort-feasors, and from a judgment entered thereon the defendants have presented separate appeals.

Central avenue is a paved rural highway extending east and west from Del Rey to Malaga in the county of Fresno. The defendant railway company maintains a spur track known as the Mattei spur crossing Central avenue at right angles and at grade. The accident occurred at about 6 o'clock p. m. on a clear day when the automobile approached and entered upon the railway crossing from the east at a speed of 30 to 35 miles per hour and when a locomotive and tender of the railway company reached the crossing from the north at a speed of about 10 miles per hour.

The country surrounding the scene of the accident is practically level. The railway track is flush with the pavement on the highway. North of the highway and east of the track is a vineyard, the tops of the grapevines rising from 5 to 6 feet above the highway. About 70 feet east of the track, and on the north line of the highway, stands a tree about 20 feet high, and with a spread of about 12 feet. There are no other obstructions north of the highway and east of the track for more than 700 feet. On the south line of the highway, east of the tracks, is a row of olive trees extending to within 28 feet of the track; 12 feet east and 7 feet north of the paved portion of the highway is a standard railroad crossing sign, consisting of an upright post 10 feet high, painted white, and at the top of which are two cross-arms painted white with the words "Railroad Crossing" painted in large black letters. About 300 feet east of the crossing on the northerly side of the pavement is a smaller sign, called a target sign, which is a disc 2 feet in diameter, on a post 6 feet high, on which the letters "R. R." are painted in black letters with a white background.

The defense of the railway company was, first, that it was not guilty of any negligence in the operation of its engine and tender, and, secondly, that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence. On this appeal the railway company advances the same contentions and complains of certain instructions given and refused and certain rulings of the trial court.

[1] The evidence on the issue of the negligence of the railway company need not be recounted at length. It consisted of testimony of the several witnesses as to whether the statutory signals were given by the engine crew upon approaching the highway. This evidence was substantially in conflict on this point, and may not now be disturbed.

On the issue of the contributory negligence of the deceased, it appears beyond dispute that the defendant Rarity was totally blind in his left eye, and that the deceased knew that fact, having been acquainted with him rather intimately for some years; that the deceased was riding in the back seat as the automobile approached the crossing holding a conversation with O. E. Orr, who was also a guest of the defendant Rarity and riding in the front seat; that the railway crossing signs above described were within the view of the deceased as the automobile approached the crossing, and that the deceased said nothing to Rarity about the nearby railway crossing, nor did the deceased do anything to protect himself against a possible accident. It also appears that the persons in the automobile were not familiar with this particular grade crossing and knew nothing thereof except such information in the way of warning as was imputed to them by the railway signs above described.

[2, 3] From the foregoing facts it is contended that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. There is no evidence that the deceased exercised, or had the right to exercise, any control over the driver Rarity, and he was under no legal obligation to warn the driver of the presence of the tracks or of an approaching train. Marchetti v. Southern Pac. Co., 204 Cal. 679, 269 P. 529. Nor did the fact that the deceased knew that Rarity was a one-eyed man convict the deceased of contributory negligence as matter of law. The loss of one eye does not necessarily prevent a person from operating an automobile with due caution and circumspection. The evidence on this issue, tendered by the plaintiffs and joined by the defendant railway company, clearly presented questions for the jury to determine.

[4-6] The defense of the defendant Rarity was that he was operating his automobile without negligence. In this connection he offered evidence to show that he did not see or hear the approaching locomotive; that he was intently watching the highway in front of him; that his vision was obscured by the sun shining in his face; and that he did not see the railway signs as he approached the crossing. The evidence further showed that the crossing in question was an obstructed steam railroad grade crossing as contemplated by section 113 of the California Vehicle Act in effect at the time (St. 1927, p. 1436), and which it was unlawful to cross at a greater rate of speed than 15 miles per hour. By his own admission he was traveling at least 30 miles per hour at the time of the accident. Unquestionably he was guilty of negligence, and the accident occurred, as found by the jury within its province, through the concurrent negligence of both defendants. Under the law the negligence of Rarity may not be imputed to the deceased. Irwin v. Golden State Auto Tour Corp., 178 Cal. 10, 171 P. 1059; 19 Cal. Jur. p. 659.

struction only need be commented upon. That is an instruction given and of which the defendant Rarity complains. In substance it instructed the jury that, if it should find the facts indicated therein which would constitute the grade crossing in question an obstructed railway crossing at grade as contemplated by section 113 of the California Vehicle Act, and if it should further find that Rarity was traveling at a rate in excess of 15 miles per hour as he came upon the crossing, then "the defendant Rarity is conclusively presumed to have been guilty of negligence at the time of the collision." The words "conclusively presumed" are especially objected to. There is no merit in the contention. The facts indisputably point to the negligence of this defendant at the time, and compel the conclusion that he was guilty of negligence as matter of law upon the establishment of the facts called for in the instruction.

[8] One other contention is common to both defendants, and that is that the verdict in the sum of $35,000 is excessive. The evidence disclosed without conflict that the decedent was 42 years of age at the time of his death and had been in good health. His expectancy was 26.72 years. He was earning between $4,000 and $5,000 per year, and was contributing between $250 and $350 per month toward the support of his wife and children. His wife was 47 years of age, and the children were 14 and 9 years old, respectively. He was a kind and affectionate husband and father. A motion for a new trial was made on the ground of excessive verdict and denied. It cannot be said that the verdict is so plainly excessive as to suggest at first blush, that the same was the result of passion or prejudice or corruption rather than an honest and sober judgment on the part of the jury. Kelley v. Hodge Transportation System, 197 Cal. 598, 242 P. 76; 8 Cal. Jur. p. 834.

[9] Under familiar rules there was no error in denying the motions of the defendant railway company for nonsuit and a directed verdict when, as here, the evidence on behalf of the plaintiffs and the reasonable inferences to be drawn therefrom, disregarding evidence in conflict therewith, tended to establish negligence on the part of this defendant.

As to the other points made by the defendants with reference to alleged errors of the trial court in the admission and exclusion of evidence, we do not find sufficient merit therein to require discussion.

[10] One other point made by the defendant Rarity will be considered. The right of the plaintiffs to maintain this action is a statutory right under section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure. No such right existed at common law. Dickinson v. Southern Pacific Company, 172 Cal. 727, 730, 158 P. 183; Kramer v. Market Street Railroad Co., 25 Cal.

434; 8 Cal. Jur. p. 948. At the time the present cause of action arose, on September 12, 1927, it was and still is provided by section 2096 of the Civil Code that "a carrier of persons without reward must use ordinary care and diligence for their safe carriage." Nichols v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 178 Cal. 630, 174 P. 319. In 1929, the Legislature added section 141½ to the California Vehicle Act. St. 1929, p. 1580. It is therein provided in part: "Any person who as a guest accepts a ride in any vehicle, moving upon any of the public highways of the State of California, and while so riding as such guest receives or sustains an injury, shall have no right of recovery against the owner or driver or person responsible for the operation of such vehicle. In the event that such person while so riding as such guest is killed, or dies as a result of injury sustained while so riding as such guest, then neither the estate nor the legal representatives or heirs of such guest shall have any right of recovery against the driver or owner of said vehicle by reason of the death of the said guest. If such person so riding as a guest be a minor and sustain an injury or be killed or die as a result of injury sustained while so riding as such guest, then neither the parents nor guardian nor the estate nor legal representatives or heirs of such minor shall have any right of recovery against the driver or owner or person responsible for the operation of said vehicle for injury sustained or as a result of the death of such minor." The section then continues with the following proviso: "Nothing in this section contained shall be construed as relieving the owner or driver or person responsible for the operation of a vehicle from liability for injury to or death of such guest proximately resulting from the intoxication, wilful misconduct, or gross negligence of such owner, driver or person responsible for the operation of such vehicle."

The defendant Rarity contends that, by reason of the enactment of the foregoing statute, the cause of action of the plaintiffs has been wiped out, that section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure and section 2096 of the Civil Code have been repealed in whole or in part by the enactment of section 141½ of the California Vehicle Act, and that the rule of law to be applied is laid down in such cases as People v. Bank of San Luis Obispo, 159 Cal. 65, 112 P. 866, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 934, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1148; Wilcox v. Edwards, 162 Cal. 455, 123 P. 276, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 1392; Moss v. Smith, 171 Cal. 777, 155 P. 90; Freeman v. Glenn County Telephone Co., 184 Cal. 508, 194 P. 705, and Chenoweth v. Chambers, 33 Cal. App. 104, 164 P. 428. By those cases the rule obtaining elsewhere has become thoroughly established in the law of this state that, when a right of action did not exist at common law, but depends solely upon a statute, the repeal of the statute destroys the right, unless the right has been reduced to final judgment, or unless the repealing statute contains a saving clause protecting the right in pending litigation. In the case at bar the cause of action depended solely on the statute. There is no saving clause, and the action is still pending.

The plaintiffs rely first on the general rule that repeals by implication are not favored and are recognized only when there is an irreconcilable conflict existing between two or more legislative enactments. Railroad Commission v. Riley, 192 Cal. 54, 218 P. 415; 23 Cal. Jur. p. 694. They contend that there is nothing in section 141½ which has expressly repealed section 377 either in whole or in part, and such repeal is not necessarily implied. Secondly, they rely on the general rule that a statute should have prospective operation only unless it clearly appear that it was the legislative intention that the statute operate retrospectively (Cooley, Constitutional Limitations [8th Ed.] p. 772; In Matter of Cate, 207 Cal. 443, 279 P. 131; 23 Cal. Jur. p. 628); and, thirdly, that the new section 141½ could not operate retrospectively so as to deprive the plaintiffs of a right which they claim became vested in them under section 377 immediately upon the death of the deceased, citing Sutherland on Statutory Construction, § 671; James v. Oakland Traction Co., 10 Cal. App. 785, 103 P. 1082, and other cases.

[11] A disposition of the third contention of the plaintiffs will tend to confine the point within its proper limits. The present action unquestionably is one for damages for the death of one not a minor caused by "the wrongful act or neglect of another," as defined by section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure. This cause of action did not exist at common law. It depends solely on the statute, and the right was not a vested right protected by the state and Federal Constitutions. Under the authority of People v. Bank of San Luis Obispo, supra, and other cases to like effect, above cited, a repeal of the statute conferring the right, prior to final judgment, would abolish the right and place the parties in the same position as if the statute never existed.

If the present action were one brought by Krause, during his lifetime, for damages for personal injuries inflicted upon him while a guest of the defendant Rarity, such a cause of action would be one grounded on the common-law liability, and the right of action would be a vested right and survive a repeal of the statute. Callet v. Alioto (Cal. Sup.) 290 P. 438. The case of James v. Oakland Traction Co., supra, relied upon by the plaintiff, was one for damages for personal injuries inflicted upon the plaintiff therein. That case is illustrative of the numerous decisions holding that upon the wrongful infliction of the injury a vested right accrued to the party injured freed from any disturbance by subsequent legislative enactment.

In passing, it may be said that a recent statute of Connecticut similar in purport to section 141¾ was attacked on constitutional grounds, but the validity thereof was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States. Silver v. Silver, 280 U. S. 117, 50 S. Ct. 57, 74 L. Ed. 221.

[12] The question is therefore narrowed to this: Did section 141¾ work a repeal of section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure? If so, to what extent and when did such repeal become effective so far as the plaintiffs' cause of action is concerned?

It cannot be doubted that section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure and section 2096 of the Civil Code should be read together. When so considered with reference to the present controversy, they would mean that the heirs on September 12, 1927, had a cause of action against the defendant Rarity for the death of Krause, and that Rarity's liability would be tested by the rule of ordinary care. Suit was brought on November 2, 1927, alleging a cause of action under the then existing law on ordinary negligence which is the same as the want of ordinary care as provided in section 2096. Judgment on the verdict was entered September 22, 1928, and the notice of appeal was filed November 19, 1928. Pending the appeal and on August 14, 1929, section 141¾ of the California Vehicle Act was enacted.

It is apparent that, if the new section had been enacted without the proviso, the rule contended for by the defendant Rarity would apply, the plaintiffs' cause of action would have been wiped out, and no recovery could be had on the judgment against said defendant, for the reason that said judgment has not become final. In such case the Legislature would have been unrestrained by constitutional barriers, and its intention, in the absence of a saving clause, would have been conclusively manifest. But the Legislature did not stop with the enactment of the portions of the statute which would have worked a repeal irrevocably, but added the provision which in effect continued the right of action on account of the death of the guest. In other words, there has not been a moment of time since the enactment of section 377 to the present time when an action would not lie on behalf of the heirs on account of the death of the guest. The only change brought about by the new law was in the nature and character of the proof required in each case. There was no abolishment of the right or cause of action, but only a change in the proof required, not to maintain the action, but to permit a recovery.

[13-15] In many jurisdictions the division of negligence into degrees is not countenanced (20 R. C. L. 21); the concept being that such phrases as "gross negligence" and "slight negligence" are misnomers. In this state the degrees of negligence have been frequently recognized. The term "gross negligence" has been defined as "the want of slight diligence," as "an entire failure to exercise care, or the exercise of so slight a degree of care as to justify the belief that there was an indifference to the things and welfare of others," and as "that want of care which would raise a presumption of the conscious indifference to consequences." 19 Cal. Jur. p. 554; Coit v. Western Union Tel. Co., 130 Cal. 657, 63 P. 83, 53 L. R. A. 678, 80 Am. St. Rep. 153. Where liability attaches only for gross negligence, it is for the jury, under proper instructions by the court, to pass upon the question whether such negligence exists. Merrill v. Pac. Transfer Co., 131 Cal. 582, 63 P. 915; 19 Cal. Jur. p. 728. It must therefore be concluded that the enactment of section 141¾ did not repeal section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure in whole or in part, but simply changed the degree of negligence required to permit a recovery.

The statutes involved in the cases of Moss v. Smith, and others above cited and relied on by the defendant Rarity, will be found to have repealed entirely the statute conferring the right, without a saving clause, or to have so amended the prior law on which the cause of action was founded as to remove from the operation of the old law, either specifically or by necessary implication, certain parties who might theretofore have been subject to the litigation which was held to have terminated by reason of the amendment. Those cases are readily distinguishable from the case at bar. Here no driver has been relieved absolutely of liability to the heirs of his deceased guest, but is still liable, dependent on the degree of his negligence under the proof.

[16-18] The case, then, falls within the operation of the rule contended for by the plaintiff, namely, that, although the Legislature has the power to give a statute retrospective operation, if it does not impair the obligation of contracts or disturb vested rights, yet it is to be presumed that no statute is intended to have that effect, and it will not be given that effect, unless such intention clearly appear from the language of the statute. Pignaz v. Burnett, 119 Cal. 157, 51 P. 48. We find nothing in section 141¾ which would justify, much less compel, the conclusion that said section was intended to be retrospective. In such case the new law would have no effect on litigation pending at the time it was enacted. Estate of Benvenuto, 183 Cal. 382, 191 P. 678; State Commission in Lunacy v. Welch, 20 Cal. App. 624, 129 P. 974; 5 Cal. Jur., p. 750.

The judgment as to both defendants is affirmed.

WEHRLE v. BOARD OF WATER AND POWER COM'RS OF LOS ANGELES et al.
L. A. 12556.

Supreme Court of California.

Nov. 18, 1930.

1. Municipal corporations ⇨271.

Los Angeles board of water and power commissioners has power to determine whether acquisition of water rights appurtenant to land is needful or beneficial (Const. art. 11, §§ 6, 8, as amended in 1914).

2. Waters and water courses ⇨190.

Question of price city should pay for land and appurtenant water rights in light of all facts is entirely for board of water and power commissioners to determine.

3. Municipal corporations ⇨57.

Under Constitution, Los Angeles has authority to make laws and regulations in respect to municipal affairs, as citizens deem proper, subject to charter limitations (Const. art. 11, §§ 6, 8, as amended in 1914).

4. Waters and water courses ⇨190.

Under charter, Los Angeles board of water and power commissioners has authority to take necessary steps to acquire adequate water supply.

5. Municipal corporations ⇨271.

Supplying water to inhabitants is "municipal purpose."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Municipal Purposes," see Words and Phrases.]

6. Waters and water courses ⇨200(1).

City's contract for water supply, made under power possessed by city, may be overthrown by courts only for fraud, abuse or excess of authority, or inequity in terms.

7. Evidence ⇨12.

Supreme Court may take judicial notice of great increase in population of city of Los Angeles.

8. Evidence ⇨25(2).

Need of adequate water supply for Los Angeles is common knowledge.

9. Waters and water courses ⇨190.

Acquisition of lands and needful water rights by board for city of Los Angeles by direct purchase, though at appraisal higher than original appraisal, not charged to be fraudulent or in excess of authority, held justified (Const. art. 11, §§ 6, 8, as amended in 1914).

The proposed purchase involved more than 3,000 separate parcels of land, and the process of acquiring water rights appurtenant thereto by condemnation would be a very long and expensive proceeding, whereas an amicable settlement with all, or greater portion, of the property owners was greatly to be desired, and the acquisition of these valuable rights by direct purchase, without the necessity of legal steps being taken, was ample justification for the alleged action about to be taken by the board of commissioners.

10. Evidence ⇨83(2).

Presumption obtains that board of water and power commissioners of Los Angeles, in purchasing land and appurtenant water rights, considered wisdom and policy of whole plan in light of objects.

Action for injunction by Edward F. Wehrle against the Board of Water and Power Commissioners of the City of Los Angeles. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiff appeals.

WASTE, C. J.

Plaintiff, as a taxpayer, brought this action to enjoin the board of water and power commissioners of the city of Los Angeles from carrying out a proposed plan to acquire by purchase thirty-one hundred privately owned properties in the towns of Lone Pine, Independence, Big Pine, and Bishop in the Owens river valley in Inyo county. The complaint was demurred to on general and special grounds, and the demurrer was sustained with leave to amend. The plaintiff declining to amend, judgment of dismissal followed, from which judgment plaintiff appeals.

It is alleged in the complaint that, after a detailed survey and appraisalment of the properties involved, the board of water and power commissioners "arbitrarily, recklessly, improvidently, injudiciously, and unlawfully increased said appraised values by adding to the values so determined for each separate piece of privately owned property," in three of the locations named, certain percentages of value, making a total of $5,696,334 instead of $4,521,736.58, as originally fixed by the survey and appraisalment, and that the commission is proceeding to acquire the properties according to such increased valuations. A judgment is sought enjoining and restraining the board of water and power commissioners from purchasing or offering to purchase the properties in accordance with the adjusted prices referred to in the complaint, "or otherwise," and restraining the other defendants, who are officers of the city of Los Angeles, from carrying out certain designated details of the purchase.

The demurrer was properly sustained. The defendant board of water and power commissioners of the city of Los Angeles is a board duly organized pursuant to the provisions of the charter of that city, and has the management, charge, and control of the department of water and power of the city. In particular, the board has the management, charge, and control of what is known as the Los Angeles aqueduct, by means of which waters within the Owens river watershed in Inyo and Mono counties in this state are conveyed approximately two hundred and forty miles from a point in the Owens river valley to the city of Los Angeles for domestic, industrial, and other uses by the city and its inhabitants. These waters, consisting of the natural flow of the Owens river and of the underground waters already developed by the board by pumping operations at various points in the Owens river valley, are regarded, not only as of great importance, but almost of necessity in the development of the water supply of the city, and it is essential that its acquisition of the water rights in the valley be not interfered with.

[1-6] The charter of the city of Los Angeles empowers the department of water and power, of which the defendant board is the administrative and executive head, to acquire anything useful or convenient in connection with the exercise of the city's rights and powers, and to appropriate or use money in or belonging to the water revenue fund of the department for the purchase of lands, water rights, and other property, and for the necessary expenses of conducting and extending the business of the department pertaining to such works. It cannot be questioned that, under the law, the board has ample discretion and full power to determine whether or not it is needful or beneficial that the city of Los Angeles acquire water rights appurtenant to the land it is intending to purchase, as alleged in the complaint. Furthermore, it is not charged in the complaint that there was any fraud in the action of the board in securing the property by the method which it adopted. On the contrary, it is admitted there was no fraud. We think that the question of the price the city should pay for the lots of land and for the accompanying water rights, in the light of the needs of the city and the available water supply secured by the purchase, and all other facts in connection therewith, is a question which must be left entirely to the disposition and judgment of the board. Sections 6 and 8 of article 11 of the state Constitution, as amended in 1914, confer ample authority upon the citizens of the city of Los Angeles to make and enforce all laws and regulations in respect to its municipal affairs as they deem proper, subject only to the restrictions and limitations provided in the city charter. The provisions of the charter, in turn, confer ample authority upon the respondent board of water and power commissioners to take the necessary steps to acquire an adequate water supply. That the supplying of water to its inhabitants is a municipal purpose there can be no doubt. City of South Pasadena v. Pasadena L. & W. Co., 152 Cal. 593, 93 P. 490. And it is the general rule that when a municipal corporation possesses authority to enter into contracts for the supply of water for its own use and for the use of its inhabitants, such contracts, when entered into, may be overthrown by courts only in cases of fraud, abuse, or excess of authority, or inequity in the terms of the agreements. Marin, etc., Co. v. Town of Sausalito, 168 Cal. 587, 598, 143 P. 767.

[7-10] This court may take judicial notice of the great increase in the number of inhabitants of the city of Los Angeles, and common knowledge supplies the necessary information as to the need of an adequate water supply for the city and its people. It cannot be questioned that the process of acquiring the water rights appurtenant to more than three thousand separate parcels of land in the Owens river valley by condemnation would be a very long and expensive affair. On the other hand, an amicable settlement with all, or the greater portion even, of the property owners in the valley is a matter greatly to be desired; and the acquisition of these valuable rights by direct purchase, without the necessity of legal steps being taken, seems ample justification for the alleged action about to be taken by the defendants, particularly in view of the fact that it is not charged that such action is either fraudulent or in excess of the authority of the board.

It must be presumed that the board of water and power commissioners, in forming its judgment, considered the wisdom and policy of the whole plan it is here alleged to have adopted in the light of the objects to be attained. In re City and County of San Francisco, 191 Cal. 172, 185, 215 P. 549.

The judgment is affirmed.

MILLHOLEN v. RILEY, State Controller, et al.

L. A. 11805.

Supreme Court of California.

Nov. 3, 1930.

1. Courts ⇐1.

In absence of enactment to contrary, duty of court to function includes by implication power to properly apply funds appropriated for that purpose.

2. States ⇐67.

Statute requiring consideration by department of finance of contracts made by departments does not apply to judicial department (Pol. Code, §§ 654, 675a, as added by St. 1927, p. 455, § 1; Const. art. 6, § 1).

3. States ⇐67.

Word "department," in statute requiring consideration by department of finance of contracts entered into by departments relates to administrative departments created in aid of Governor in enforcement and execution of laws (Pol. Code, §§ 654, 675a, as added by St. 1927, p. 455, § 1).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Department," see Words and Phrases.]

4. Courts ⇐1.

Court set up by Constitution has within it power of self-preservation and power to remove all obstructions to its successful operation.

5. Constitutional law ⇐56.

Legislature may aid courts and may regulate their operation, so long as their efficiency is not thereby impaired.

6. Courts ⇐55.

Appointment and compensation of law secretaries is left to courts they serve (Pol. Code, §§ 654, 675a, as added by St. 1927, p. 455, § 1).

7. Courts ⇐55.

State controller and department of finance had power to audit claim of secretary of District Court of Appeal (Pol. Code, §§ 654, 675a, as added by St. 1927, p. 455, § 1).

8. Constitutional law ⇐61.

Legislature, in conferring authority upon court to fix in its discretion compensation of persons upon whom duty of carrying out authorized governmental object has been cast, is not thereby delegating legislative power.

Original proceeding in mandate by Madge Millholen against Ray L. Riley, State Controller, and others.

Bart F. Wade and H. C. Lillie, both of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and William F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondents.

PRESTON, J.

Original proceeding in mandate. Petitioner was on July 1, 1929, appointed a secretary of the District Court of Appeal, Second Appellate District, Division 2. Respondents are the state controller, the department of finance of the state of California, and the members thereof.

Petitioner received her appointment from the court she was serving, and her compensation for such services was fixed by the same authority at $225 per month. She served during the months of July and August, 1929. The court approved her demand for said sum as salary for each of said months, and ordered it paid from the treasury of the state. Petitioner thereupon made demand upon respondent department of finance for approval of said claims and upon the controller for the issuance of warrants in her favor in said amounts. Her request was refused. This proceeding followed; the issue being made by petition and answer. Admittedly ample funds appropriated by the Legislature for the support and maintenance of the court exist and are available for the liquidation of petitioner's claims.

In a budget proposed to the Legislature for the fiscal years from July 1, 1929, to June 30, 1931, pursuant to section 34 of article 4 of the State Constitution, an appropriation of $208,530 was requested for support of the Second District Court of Appeal, which included the following items for each of said years: Secretaries (law), $9,000; secretaries (10 months), $3,000. The budget was reduced by the Legislature, which appropriated a total amount of $202,330 for the support of said court, without specification of any kind as to the manner in which the money should be expended.

[1] If the authority to appoint and fix compensation of persons in the category of petitioner is not lodged elsewhere by some other provision of the law, it seems too clear for argument that the court itself, in aid of the duty enjoined upon it by law, has both the power of appointment and the power of fixing compensation. In other words, in the absence of any enactment to the contrary, the duty to function includes by implication of law the power to properly apply the funds appropriated for that purpose. Abundant authority exists to this effect. Rankin v. Colgan, 92 Cal. 605, 28 P. 673; Bateman v. Colgan, 111 Cal. 580, 587, 44 P. 238; Harris v. Gibbins, 114 Cal. 418, 46 P. 292; Lewis v. Colgan, 115 Cal. 529, 47 P. 357.

In the appropriation bill is found the following provision: "The officers of the various department, boards, commissions and institutions for whose benefit and support appropriations are made in this act are expressly forbidden to make any expenditure in excess of such appropriations, except the consent of the state department of finance be first obtained, and a certificate, in writing, duly signed by the director of said department, of the unavoidable necessity of such expenditure. * * * Stats. 1929, p. 98, § 5. This provision further confirms the conclusion above deduced.

[2, 3] This being true, we are required to search elsewhere to see if the power to fix the compensation of petitioner has been delegated to any other officer or bureau. The position of respondents is that the department of finance has that power abiding in it by virtue of sections 654 and 675a of the Political Code. Section 654 gives the department of finance general supervision over the financial and business policies of the state. Section 675a (Stats. 1927, p. 455, § 1), so far as here involved, reads as follows: "All contracts entered into by any state officer, board, commission, department, or bureau for the purchase of supplies, materials, or services, shall before the same become effective be transmitted with all papers, estimates and recommendations concerning the same to the state department of finance for consideration. If such department approve the same, the contract shall, from the date of such approval, be in force and effect. * * *"

At the time these two sections were enacted, a new article was added to the Political Code, which covers sections 654 to 685, inclusive (Stats. 1927, c. 251, pp. 449-459). In the margin opposite the statute (Stats. 1927, § 675a, p. 455) is found this annotation: "State departmental contracts." This article was added pursuant to the policy announced in part 3, tit. 1, c. 3, art. 2, of said Political Code, being sections 348 to 359b, inclusive, thereof. Section 348 then read: "It is the policy of this state to vest in the governor the civil administration of the laws of the state and for the purpose of aiding the governor in the execution and administration of the laws to divide the executive and administrative work into departments as provided by law."

Taking these provisions in the context where found, coupled with the objects and purposes for which the enactments were made as disclosed in the other provisions of the same title, we have no hesitancy in declaring that the said sections of the Code here invoked were intended to and do apply only to the executive department of the government and were not intended to and do not apply to the judicial department thereof set up by article 6, § 1, of the Constitution. The word "department" found in said sections simply relates to the administrative departments created in aid of the Governor in the enforcement and execution of the laws of the state.

A case practically on all fours with the one before us, where an able discussion of this identical question under a similar situation is found, is State v. Cunningham, 39 Mont. 165, 101 P. 962, 965. The statute there involved (section 262, Rev. Codes 1907) read: "The board of examiners may at any time when necessary, employ clerical help for any state officer or board, and no clerks must be employed by such officers or board without the authority of the board of examiners, and no such clerks must be employed by the board of examiners except when all the duties of the office cannot be performed by the officer himself." The court in part said: "Whatever application section 262, supra, may have to the help employed in the executive department, it cannot have, and was not intended to have, any application to the necessary employees attached to this court. This court, viewed as a department of the state government, is neither an officer nor a board, and therefore does not fall within the terms of this provision."

In fact, it may well be doubted whether the employment of petitioner is the making of a contract for personal services. Her duties partake more of the nature of a public office, and there seems to be no contractual relation in the holding of such a position. Mansfield v. Chambers, 26 Cal. App. 499, 147 P. 595; Mono County v. Industrial Accident Commission, 175 Cal. 752, 167 P. 377.

Another observation makes the conclusion above referred to manifest. Section 682 of the Political Code, a part of the same article (Stats. 1927, p. 458), provides in part: "The department of finance shall also be in possession and control of all records, books, papers, offices, equipment, supplies, moneys, funds, appropriations, land and other property, real or personal, now or hereafter held for the benefit or use of all of said bodies, offices and officers mentioned in the article. * * *

A literal interpretation of this section would require the judicial department of the state to transfer the possession of the court records and all its equipment to the said department of finance.

[4, 5] We may reach the same conclusion in another manner. A court set up by the Constitution has within it the power of self-preservation, indeed, the power to remove all obstructions to its successful and convenient operation. This arises from the fact that it is part of and belongs to one of the three independent departments set up by the Constitution, art. 6, § 1. This power is recognized, among other places, in sections 47 and 144 of the Code of Civil Procedure. While the above statement is true, there is this qualification thereof, which has been recognized at all times in this state, the Legislature may at all times aid the courts and may even regulate their operation, so long as their efficiency is not thereby impaired.

In Brydonjack v. State Bar, 208 Cal. 439, 281 P. 1018, 1020, 66 A. L. R. 1507, this court said: "Our courts are set up by the Constitution without any special limitations; hence the courts have and should maintain vigorously all the inherent and implied powers necessary to properly and effectively function as a separate department in the scheme of our state government. In re Garner, 179 Cal. 413, 177 P. 162; Nicholl v. Koster, 157 Cal. 416, 108 P. 302. * * * The sum total of this matter is that the Legislature may put reasonable restrictions upon constitutional functions of the courts provided they do not defeat or materially impair the exercise of those functions."

Admittedly, therefore, the Legislature, within the foregoing limitations, could in its wisdom provide the compensation that should be paid petitioner, and could delegate that duty to a bureau of the executive department thereof. As is said in Nicholl v. Koster, 157 Cal. 416, 423, 108 P. 302, 305: "The Legislature may indeed provide for the appointment of such assistants of the court by the executive department, or by election of the people, and thus relieve the court of the burden of choosing such persons. But if the Legislature or the Constitution should fail to provide such persons, a court invested with jurisdiction would have all the powers necessary to its convenient exercise, and could appoint such assistants as might be required." For a profound discussion of the inherent power of the court under circumstances quite similar to the case at bar, see State v. Cunningham, supra.

[6, 7] But, as above noted, we have found that the Legislature has not reposed the power to appoint petitioner or to fix her compensation in any other officer or bureau. This, indeed, is as it should be. A law secretary is called upon to do work of a highly specialized and confidential character. Such a person must possess certain legal attainments as well as certain powers of discretion and discernment that may not be so readily recognized or appraised by another as by a member of the judiciary. Besides, such person necessarily must have advance knowledge of decisions and judgments of the court. For these and many other reasons that could be assigned we have no doubt that it was the intention of the Legislature to leave both the appointment and the compensation of law secretaries to the courts they serve. Of course, respondents have the power of audit of petitioner's claim, but this is far from being authorized to appoint her or to fix her compensation.

In the case of U'Ren v. State Board of Control, 31 Cal. App. 6, 159 P. 615, 618, the court had under consideration in a situation similar to the instant case, the duties of the state board of control, a predecessor of respondent department of finance, and there said: "The doctrine is well settled in numerous cases that where one official, board, or body is given authority by statute to create an obligation against a specific fund in the state treasury, and another official, board, or body is intrusted with the powers of an auditor in respect to claims generally against the state, the powers and duties of the latter in respect to such claims may be controlled by the courts and compelled by writs of mandate." Lewis v. Colgan, supra; Scott v. Boyle, 164 Cal. 321, 128 P. 941, and cases cited; Lawrence v. Booth, 46 Cal. 187; Sullivan v. Gage, 145 Cal. 759, 79 P. 537.

[8] It is now well settled that the Legislature, in conferring the authority upon a bureau, court, or officer to fix in its discretion the compensation of persons upon whom the duty of carrying out some duly authorized governmental object has been cast, is not thereby delegating legislative power to another, but in reality is authorizing but an executive act. Nicholl v. Koster, supra; Stephens v. Chambers, 34 Cal. App. 660, 168 P. 595; Tarpey v. McClure, 190 Cal. 593, 213 P. 983; Ryan v. Riley, 65 Cal. App. 181, 223 P. 1027. For a discussion of the general subject, see Davenport v. Elrod, 20 S. D. 567, 107 N. W. 833; State ex rel. Gubbins v. Anson, 132 Wis. 461, 112 N. W. 475. The doctrine found in Smith v. Strother, 68 Cal. 194, 8 P. 852, that is opposed to this holding, may now be held abrogated by these later and, we think, sounder views on the subject.

Let the writ issue as prayed.

PEOPLE v. SHEFFIELD et al.

Cr. 1950.

District Court of Appeal, Second Appellate District, Division 2, California.

Oct. 3, 1930.

As Modified on Denial of Rehearing Oct. 17,
1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court
Oct. 30, 1930.¹1. Bribery *§*1(1).

Substantive offense of agreeing to receive and receiving bribe includes elements of conspiracy.

2. Criminal law *§*814(5).

Where no conspiracy was charged, and bribery case was not tried on theory of conspiracy, held, instructions on law of conspiracy were error.

Charge against defendant and codefendant was that of agreeing to receive and receiving a bribe, which charge necessarily included the elements of a conspiracy, but no conspiracy was charged, and case was not tried on such theory.

3. Criminal law *§*814(3).

Instruction must be adapted to evidence and circumstances of case on trial.

4. Criminal law *§*1172(6).

Instruction having no bearing on evidence or circumstances of case, though containing correct statement of abstract legal principles, is reversible error, if prejudicial.

5. Bribery *§*14.

Intent being essential element of "bribery," held, requested instruction as to necessity of coexistence of intent and act should have been given.

6. Witnesses *§*274(1).

In bribery trial, permitting question to character witness whether by integrity of public officer he meant one who had sworn to support Constitutions held error.

7. Criminal law *§*1170½(5).

Misconduct of deputy district attorneys in cross-examining character witnesses on irrelevant matters beyond scope of direct examination, etc., held prejudicial, though in some instances questions were withdrawn.

In some instances the questions were withdrawn, in others the court admonished the jury to disregard the questions, and in still other instances defendant's objection was overruled. Alleged misconduct consisted of asking character witnesses on cross-examination as to qualities other than those asked on direct testimony, namely, honesty and integrity, in suggesting to defendant's counsel to put defendant on stand, etc.

8. Criminal law *§*1037(2).

Ordinarily, misconduct will not be reviewed, unless foundation was laid in trial court by objection and request to admonish jury to disregard matters complained of.

9. Criminal law *§*1037(2), 1129(1).

When entire record fairly shows misconduct could not, with reasonable probability, have been obviated by instruction, absence of assignment and request will not preclude review.

10. Criminal law *§*655(1).

Trial court should not inject personal views into trial directly or in manner in which he asks questions.

11. Criminal law *§*700.

It is district attorney's duty, not to obtain conviction, but fully and fairly to present to court evidence material to charge.

12. Criminal law *§*633(1).

It is trial judge's duty to see facts material to charge are fairly presented and defendant's constitutional guaranties neither violated nor infringed.

13. Criminal law *§*633(1).

Trial court should be alert to see that immaterial issues are not injected into trial.

14. Criminal law *§*1170½(1).

In bribery trial of police officer, permitting jurors to question witness relating to methods of police department held misconduct, not cured by instructions that police department was not on trial and relative to attitude of court.

15. Criminal law *§*1186(4).

Where conviction likely resulted from errors and misconduct shown by record, held, miscarriage of justice resulted, requiring reversal (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

16. Criminal law *§*742(1), 747.

There being conflict in testimony, it was for jury to determine credibility of witnesses, and facts.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Emmet H. Wilson, Judge.

Maceo B. Sheffield was convicted of bribery, and he appeals.

Rehearing denied; SCHMIDT, Justice pro tem., dissenting.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; SHENK, SEAWELL and CURTIS, JJ., dissenting.

Thomas P. White and Martin J. Burke, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., James S. Howie, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Buron Fitts, Dist. Atty., and William R. McKay, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Los Angeles, for the People.

SCHMIDT, Justice pro tem.

Appellant, Maceo B. Sheffield, by indictment returned by the grand jury of Los Angeles county, was charged jointly with Roscoe C. Washington and Richmond Dunn on twelve counts of bribery and twelve counts of extortion; it being alleged that appellant with his codefendants, while acting as police officers of the city of Los Angeles, accepted money and property from different underworld characters and bootleggers pursuant to an agreement upon the part of appellant and his codefendants that they, in return for the payment of said money and property, would not arrest or prosecute the bootleggers named in the indictment for violation of what is commonly known as the Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79).

On the opening day of trial the district attorney moved to dismiss all twelve counts involving extortion and all counts except 13, 15, 17, 19, 21, and 23, charging bribery, in relation to the alleged bribe givers, Mr. and Mrs. Hendricks. Defendants Washington and Dunn were acquitted on all counts. Appellant was acquitted on counts 15, 17, 19, and 21, and was convicted of the crime of bribery as charged in counts 13 and 23. Appellant moved for a new trial, which was denied, and he was sentenced to San Quentin for the period prescribed by law. From the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial the defendant Sheffield prosecutes this appeal.

I. Appellant claims the trial court erred in its rulings during the progress of the trial and in the giving and refusing to give certain instructions.

[1-4] (a) In five separate instructions the court instructed the jury fully and elaborately on the law of conspiracy, showing clearly, however, that these instructions were given upon the theory of a conspiracy existing between the defendants, as illustrated by one of the instructions: "If you believe from the evidence that the defendants * * * or any two of them, pursued by their acts the same object * * * the jury will be justified in the conclusion that such defendants so pursuing the same object were engaged in a conspiracy to effect that object." The charge against appellant and his two codefendants was that of agreeing to receive and receiving a bribe, which charge necessarily includes within the substantive offense the elements of a conspiracy; and, had the trial been had upon this theory, the instructions would have been proper. People v. Keyes (Cal. App.) 284 P. 1096; Id. (Cal. Sup.) 284 P. 1105. In this particular case these instructions on conspiracy should not have been given, because no conspiracy was charged, nor was the case tried on the theory that a conspiracy existed between the defendants. On the other hand, it was stated repeatedly throughout the trial that no conspiracy existed between the defendants. In such event the instructions went to an immaterial matter, and could only mislead the jury. Counsel for respondent contends that no error can be predicated in view of the fact that the instructions complained of constitute a correct pronouncement of the law. The law is well settled that instructions given to a jury must be adapted to the evidence and circumstances of the case on trial. To give instructions, even though they contain a correct statement of abstract legal principles, which are prejudicial will warrant a reversal of a judgment of conviction, and constitutes error. See People v. Savinovich, 59 Cal. App. 240, 210 P. 526, involving a prosecution for arson, yet quite parallel to the case at bar.

[5] (b) The court also refused to give the following instruction requested by appellant: "In every crime or public offense there must exist a union of intent and act or criminal negligence." Intent being one of the essential elements of the crime of bribery, the court should have given this instruction. The substance thereof was not contained in any other instruction given.

(c) There is no merit in the contention that the court erred in refusing to give certain other instructions asked by appellant.

[6, 7] II. Appellant claims error by reason of misconduct on the part of the deputies district attorney in the cross-examination of character witnesses produced by appellant, which character witnesses were asked on cross-examination as to qualities other than those asked on their direct testimony; namely, honesty and integrity. For instance, the witness Morgan T. White was asked on cross-examination if he had not heard the reputation of appellant as a brutal officer discussed, to which question objection was interposed but overruled by the court. The witness A. M. Rochlen, on cross-examination, was asked if he knew Will Anderson of the grievance committee of the bar association; whether he read the Bar Association Journal. He was then asked the question: "Don't you know that it was spread through the bar of this community by Mr. Anderson as one of the leading members of the bar, the analysis of the brutality of Mr. Sheffield?" When objection was interposed, the deputy district attorney stated: "All right, perhaps you are right on that." Again James E. Davis, formerly chief of police of the city of Los Angeles, one of the principal witnesses for the defense, was asked on cross-examination as to his familiarity with the arrest of the defendant. He was then asked the question: "As a matter of fact, don't you know that it was generally reported even among public officials that at the time of his arrest, he was arrested in possession of intoxicating liquor." Then, after strenuous objection and the assignment of same as misconduct, the question was withdrawn by the deputy district attorney, whereupon the deputy district attorney stated: "I withdraw it. Let me ask you this, Mr. Witness: You addressed your opinion as to his honesty as a public official. Do you believe that a public official whose duty it is to enforce the law who drinks liquor and has it in his possession is an honest man?" Upon objection of appellant the deputy district attorney stated: "I think the objection is good, and I withdraw the question." Again in connection with the cross-examination of William W. Ashe, called as a character witness for appellant, the following took place:

"Q. Well, you heard, did you, in 1927, that Mr. Sheffield owned an airplane? A. I never knew it until this date, Mr. Dennison.

"Q. You heard it discussed, didn't you, in the Federal Department? A. No, I never did.

"Q. You belong to the Secret Service, don't you? A. Yes sir.

"Q. Didn't you hear it discussed that he was using that airplane for the purpose of bringing narcotics from Mexico?

"Mr. White: Now, just a minute. We object—

"A. No, sir, I did not. We don't handle narcotics in our department.

"Mr. White: Just a minute—

"Q. By Mr. Dennison: I didn't ask you what you handled over there; I asked you if you had heard it discussed over there? A. No, I never did.

"Q. How long have you been over there? A. Been there seven years.

"Mr. White: Now, if the Court please, I desire at this time, first of all, to say that prior to asking the question of the witness as to whether he knew that Sheffield had an airplane which was being used for illegal purposes, that the witness answered Mr. Dennison that he had never heard that discussed; that, thereafter, to get it before the jury Mr. Dennison asked the witness if he had not heard it discussed, that he, Sheffield, had used this airplane for illicit purposes. I assign that as absolutely prejudicial misconduct on the part of the District Attorney; ask the court to admonish the jury to disregard that statement of the District Attorney, in view of the fact that the witness had prior to the District Attorney suggesting it, stated to the District Attorney that he had never heard it discussed.

"Mr. Dennison: I am quite certain that the jury will pass upon the answers of the witness and not the questions of the prosecutor.

"Mr. White: Then I would suggest, if that is the case, that the District Attorney stop thrusting in immaterial stuff such as that, which is highly prejudicial and of no intrinsic legal value, whatever, your Honor.

"Q. By Mr. Dennison: Do you know anything of the—"Whereupon the court instructed the jury to disregard the questions asked by the District Attorney, and take into consideration the answers only of the witness and qualified its admonition by stating 'The District Attorney has a right, of course, to ask questions of witnesses who are called upon to testify as to the reputation or character of a defendant, but the jury is instructed to disregard the effect of any questions as to rumors or reports unless the District Attorney afterwards connects those reports with the defendant.'

In connection with the witness W. C. Jaffke, a United States secret service agent, the following took place:

"Q. By Mr. White: It is agreed here between us, I think, that that Smoke Shop was closed about August 7, 1929. How did you come to make that investigation? A. Well, I was sitting in front of the station in a police machine, and Sheffield came up to me and asked me if we didn't have—

"Mr. Dennison: Just a moment. We object to what Mr. Sheffield said as calling for hearsay.

"Mr. White: If the Court please, we offer to prove what he said as showing and indicating to the fullest extent that he was responsible for the abating of this nuisance.

"Mr. Dennison: It is hearsay.

"The Court: It is calling for hearsay.

"Mr. White: We accept the challenge of the District Attorney to show that.

"Mr. McKay: By your own witness, you can show that, if you want to. Put your own witness on.

"Mr. Dennison: Put Mr. Sheffield on and give us a chance to cross-examine him.

"Mr. White: If the Court please, we intend to put him on, but the District Attorney has no right to make a suggestion to the defense counsel. I assign it as misconduct and prejudicial. He has no right to comment on that, and he knows it.

"Mr. McKay: We were not commenting on it.

"Mr. White: You said, 'Why don't you put him in the stand?'

"Mr. Dennison: We apologize and ask the Court to instruct the jury to disregard anything I said. It was only addressed to Mr. White; it was not for the jury.

"The Court: The jury is instructed to disregard the remarks of the District Attorney."

Again, in the examination of former Chief of Police Davis the following took place:

"Mr. Dennison: You testified, did you not, that the reputation of Mr. Sheffield for integrity was good? A. Yes.

"Q. And by the integrity of a public officer, you mean a public officer who has held his hand up to the God that created him and sworn to support the Constitution of the United States of America and the State of California don't you?

"Mr. White: Objected to on the ground it is incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial, not cross-examination.

"Mr. Burke: Further, it is argumentative.

"The Court: Overruled.

"Mr. Dennison: Do you mean that by the integrity of a public officer, that he has sworn to uphold the Constitution of the United States and the Constitution of the State of California? A. I believe that Mr. Sheffield has taken an oath to uphold the laws of the State of California.

"Mr. Dennison: That is not the question.

"The Court: That is not the question.

"Mr. Dennison: Just a moment. Your Honor, I move to strike that out. Do you feel that integrity means where a man has taken an oath to uphold the Constitution of the State of California, that he shall be obedient to that oath?

"Mr. White: Object to that on the ground it is incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial, not proper cross-examination.

"Mr. Dennison: I withdraw the question. What do you mean by integrity? A. That the man is honest, conscientious, a faithful public servant who obeys the laws laid down for his guidance."

Further in the examination of Chief Davis the following took place:

"Q. Well, Chief, Officer Randolph—you knew, did you not, that Officer Randolph went upon the stand in the trial of Maceo B. Sheffield and testified that his testimony given before the Grand Jury, in relation to that killing of Sam Faulkner, was false?

"Mr. White: That is objected to on the ground that it is irrelevant and immaterial, not proper cross-examination, and I assign the asking of the question as prejudicial error.

"The Court: Objection sustained. The jury is instructed to disregard any effect of the asking of the question.

"Mr. Dennison: I believe that is all."

Where objection was made to these respective lines of cross-examination, the court erred in overruling the objections, and even though, as occurred in some instances, the deputy district attorney withdrew his questions, we cannot say upon a reading of the entire record of the case the jury was not influenced by the conduct of the deputy district attorney.

III. Further error is predicated on alleged misconduct of the trial judge in examining witness Ex-Chief of Police Davis on incompetent matters. The record in this case shows a very lengthy interrogation of the witness Davis on immaterial matters, to much of which counsel for appellant failed to object, but finally did enter objections.

[8, 9] Although it is the general rule in California that, before the reviewing court will consider misconduct, a foundation must be laid in the trial court, by objection and a request of the court to admonish the jury to disregard the matters toward which complaint is made, however, there is (as was said in People v. Stafford [Cal. App.] 290 P. 920, 921) a well-recognized exception to this general rule: " * * * Where an examination of the entire record fairly shows that the acts complained of are of such a character as to have produced an effect which, as a reasonable probability, could not have been obviated by any instructions to the jury, then the absence of such assignment and request will not preclude the defendant from raising the point in this court. People v. MacDonald, 167 Cal. 551, 140 P. 256; People v. Edgar, 34 Cal. App. 459, 167 P. 891; People v. George [72 Cal. App. 124, 236 P. 934], supra; People v. Frank, 71 Cal. App. 575, 585, 236 P. 189."

[10-12] The court questioned Chief Davis as to whether police officers who have to do with the arrest of persistent violators of either prostitution, gambling, or liquor laws reported to the district attorney their prior convictions of the same offense; and, after answer given, the following took place:

"The Court: That doesn't answer my question."

After answer by the witness:

"The Court: That is not answering my question at all. My question was whether," etc.

And, after several more questions and answers on the same subject-matter, the court continued:

"Q. I only asked the question preliminary to another one," and then proceeded to interrogate the witness relative to the fact that there was only one police officer who made such reports to the district attorney—the officer assigned to the morals efficiency association.

The trial judge also questioned Chief Davis at length in regard to search warrants, and in particular about a general order of the police commission concerning search warrants in liquor cases. At another time, while the deputy district attorney was interrogating

Chief Davis, the chief finished his answer by stating:

"* * * In other words, he is an officer that, if the liquor had been sold to him, he would have gone directly into the premises, and he has probably kicked in a number of doors to get at the liquor supply without worrying about getting a search warrant. Now if that is done such individuals have civil recourse.

"Q. Well, that is true—

"Q. By the Court: If that is done he is violating the law too, isn't he, Mr. Davis?"

The interrogation continued, and the following questions and answers were had:

"Q. I say the officer; I am referring to the officer; he has violated the criminal law, hasn't he? A. He has not violated any law, that is, any criminal statute for which he can be prosecuted.

"Q. I didn't ask you that. I asked you if he was not violating the law to enter a place without a warrant. A. He has violated the constitutional provision, but that is one thing practiced by peace officers, and such evidence so obtained is admissible in court.

"Q. I don't care about any practice. I am asking you now about the law, under the Constitution, and the law that we have in the United States."

And again the witness was asked:

"Q. (By the Court): You claim the Constitution does not mean anything at all when it says that premises cannot be entered without a warrant?"

After the witness' answer the court said:

"That is not an answer to the question at all. It is a very nice lecture of what officers have been doing and possibly your reasons as to why they have done it, but I am asking you whether, as Chief of Police, you would instruct your officers to violate the Constitution in order to get evidence or to make arrests?"

The foregoing serves to illustrate the nature of the matters to which complaint is directed. To recite at length the voluminous pages to which complaint is directed would not answer any useful purpose. Most of these questions and answers given show that there was a dispute between the court and the witness concerning these immaterial matters upon which the witness was interrogated. Without doubt, questioning by the trial judge on these immaterial matters, coupled with the comments on the testimony, must have had its influence upon the jury as to the attitude of the judge towards the witness Davis, as well as towards appellant. The trial court should never inject his personal views into a trial either directly or in the manner in which he asks questions. As was said in People v. Soeder, 150 Cal. 12, at page 18, 87 P. 1016, 1019:

"Under our system, the trial judge is rigorously prohibited from action or words having the effect of conveying to the jury his personal opinion as to the truth or falsity of any evidence. The determination of questions of fact must be made by the jury free from the influence that knowledge of the trial judge's views thereon might have."

The attitude of the trial judge, so far as can be discerned from the cold record, was one of seeming prejudice against the police department as a whole—against Chief Davis, called as a witness in behalf of appellant, and against appellant, a colored police officer. The record in this case shows a seeming desire on the part of the deputy district attorney and the trial court to convict appellant at any cost, even to the violation of his constitutional right to a fair and impartial trial. It is the duty of the district attorney, not to obtain convictions, but to fully and fairly present to the court the evidence material to the charge upon which the defendant stands on trial, and it is the solemn duty of the trial judge to see that the facts material to the charge are fairly presented and the constitutional guaranties of a defendant neither violated nor infringed. There is nothing that arouses the conscience of the American public so much as interference with, or deprivation of, constitutional guaranties.

[13, 14] IV. In addition, the court permitted jurors to ask questions of the same witness, Chief Davis, whether the officers of the morals efficiency organization were regular police officers—whether the organization was a legally organized, incorporated institution or just "an association independent of all that"; whether it had any legal standing in court; whether the individuals thereof could be sued; whether they receive their pay through the city or police payroll; whether they dictated to the police department in that particular line in any way, and whether the chief was in the courtroom when a certain witness, Smith, testified, concluding his (this particular juror's) questioning with:

"I want to be fair with you. I want to know myself. I listened to the testimony yesterday. It was testified on the stand they went down to this place down there, they only took one of the employees, without making any effort to find where the liquor was sold; they knew liquor was around there, and they made no effort to find it, no effort to get the proprietor of the place at all, just got one of his runners, that is all. Now frankly, I looked at it, as the testimony came in, as just a grandstand play of your department. Now, is that the case?"

The objection by counsel for appellant was met with:

"The Court: Let the Chief answer the question."

It would seem that, in addition to trying appellant for bribery, fully as much time, if not more, was spent in trying the methods of the police department. The trial court should ever be alert to see that immaterial issues are not injected into the trial of a case.

From an examination of the entire record we cannot say that the instructions given the jury that the police department was not on trial, or the instructions relative to the attitude of the court, cured the misconduct to which complaint is directed. As was said in People v. Edgar, 34 Cal. App. 459, at page 471, 167 P. 891, 895, that where the misconduct "is so pronounced and pernicious that it is not in human nature to forget or disregard its prejudicial effect, then manifestly a mere admonition, or any number of admonitions, will not suffice to right the wrong done, and the only remedy remaining is to be found in a reversal of the judgment."

[15] V. From an examination of the very lengthy transcript of the proceedings in the lower court we are unable to determine whether appellant would or would not have been convicted but for the errors of the court and the misconduct set forth. Had the jury acquitted appellant, the verdict would have found abundant support in the evidence. We are of the opinion that the errors complained of have resulted in a miscarriage of justice. It is quite likely that the conviction of appellant was because of the errors and misconduct as shown by the record. Under such circumstances the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution may not be used in order to support a judgment of conviction. People v. Irby, 67 Cal. App. 520, 227 P. 920; People v. Alpine, 81 Cal. App. 456, 254 P. 281.

VI. Insufficiency of the evidence to warrant or sustain the conviction of appellant under either counts XIII or XXIII is further urged.

[16] As to count XIII this contention is not sustained. There being a conflict in the testimony, it was for the jury to determine the credibility of witnesses and to determine the facts in the case.

Concerning count XXIII, however, we are confronted with a novel situation. Had the jury believed the version of appellant as to the transaction about the diamond pin, it should have acquitted appellant. The jury, therefore, must have convicted upon the story as told by Sebe Hendricks. He was an accomplice. Section 31, Pen. Code; People v. Coffey, 161 Cal. 433, 119 P. 901, 39 L. R. A. (N. S.) 704. In addition, the testimony of Sebe Hendricks was a mere conclusion. Count XXIII involved the acceptance of a pin belonging to the complaining witness Sebe Hendricks, which at the time was in pawn, and, as the testimony showed, was redeemed from the pawn by appellant at an expense of $147.50 but no note or other papers were executed in connection with the transaction, and the said Sebe Hendricks, according to his own testimony, placed the stickpin in the necktie of appellant. He was then asked by the district attorney:

"Q. He was to hold the pin for a year, and then how much were you to pay? A. $247.50 with a 7 per cent. interest.

"Q. And what was the extra $100.00 for? A. It was for the back pay of the protection money which I hadn't paid him.

"Q. These weekly $25.00 a week payments? A. Right."

—which is substantially all of the testimony connecting appellant with the bribery in so far as count XXIII is concerned.

A reading of all the testimony on this count shows an absolute lack of corroboration of the testimony of Sebe Hendricks, the accomplice, as required by section 1111 of the Penal Code.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

DERMER v. PISTORESI et al.

Civ. 4006.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

Nov. 1, 1930.

1. Automobiles ⇨6.

Statute exempting owner or driver of automobile from liability for injury to guest, with certain exceptions, held inapplicable to cause of action accruing before effective date of act (St. 1923, p. 517, § 141¾, as added by St. 1929, p. 1580).

2. Automobiles ⇨240(1).

Plaintiff suing for death of guest riding in automobile held not required to plead or prove driver's gross negligence in view of inapplicability of statute (St. 1923, p. 517, § 141¾, as added by St. 1929, p. 1580).

3. Trial ⇨108½.

In action for death resulting when defendant's automobile overturned, questioning jurors on voir dire regarding interest in any insurance company held not error.

If any of jurors were officers or stockholders in insurance company which carried indemnity insurance on defendant's automobile, or in any other indemnity insurance company, they would not be presumed to be as free from bias as though they were not so interested.

4. Trial ⇨133(6).

In automobile death action, question by plaintiff's attorney regarding juror's free and open mindedness in matter after disclaiming interest in any liability insurance company, though improper, held harmless error, where stricken and cautionary instruction given.

Prospective juror on voir dire testified that he was not interested in any company insuring against liability for automobile accidents, whereupon plaintiff's attorney asked following question: "So, therefore, you are free and open-minded in this matter?" To which juror answered affirmatively. Question and answer were stricken on defendant's motion, and court clearly instructed jury that their verdict was to be based solely on merits of cause and that they were to disregard any question of indemnity insurance.

5. Appeal and error ⇨930(2).

Appellate court will not assume jury will deliberately disregard their oaths and explicit cautionary instructions to disregard evidence stricken out.

6. Appeal and error ⇨1031(5).

Appellate court will not presume prejudicial error from mere discovery of insurance company's interest in automobile death action, unless testimony disclosing insurance was unjustifiably elicited in bad faith.

7. Trial ⇨127.

Plaintiff suing for death of guest riding in automobile cannot be deprived of benefit of legitimate rebuttal to pretended defense, even though rebuttal may disclose insurance company interested in result.

8. Trial ⇨127.

In automobile death action, cross-examination of driver to lay foundation for impeachment, disclosing insurance man called after accident, held proper where apparently not conducted in bad faith.

Driver of automobile, in which plaintiff's intestate was riding at time he was killed, testified on direct examination that accident was caused by deceased's distracting his attention from highway by pulling at his sleeve to emphasize some point in a story which he was relating. Decedent's contributory negligence was an issue in the case. During course of cross-examination of driver to lay foundation for impeachment, driver testified that insurance man had called on him after accident, to whom he first disclosed that deceased had distracted his attention at time of accident as testified to in direct examination.

Appeal from Superior Court, Madera County; Stanley Murray, Judge.

Action by Simon Dermer against August Pistoresi and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Barcroft & Barcroft, of Madera, for appellants.

Conley, Conley & Conley, of Fresno, for respondent.

R. L. THOMPSON, J.

This is an appeal from a judgment rendered upon a verdict of $3,500 secured as damages on account of the death of plaintiff's son, which resulted from an automobile casualty while the boy was riding in the machine as a guest.

On November 25, 1928, at 7 o'clock p. m., Simon Dermer, Jr., the son of plaintiff, aged 19 years, was riding as a guest with the defendant August Pistoresi along the highway near Madera, in the Chevrolet automobile belonging to the defendant Creuffe Pistoresi. The machine was running at the rate of speed of about 30 miles an hour. It was dark. The headlights illuminated the highway 150 feet ahead of the car. Reaching a turn in the roadway, which the driver failed to see, the machine ran into the embankment at the side of the highway and overturned. Regarding this inattention and failure to observe the curve in the roadway, the driver testified: "I could have seen it, but I didn't see it. * * * I knew it was there, but I did not know I was there with the car yet." Simon Dermer, Jr., was caught beneath the overturned car and sustained fatal injuries, from which he died two days later. An action for damages was instituted. A jury trial resulted in a judgment of $3,500 in favor of the plaintiff.

A reversal of the judgment is sought upon two grounds. It is asserted that section 141½ of the California Vehicle Act (St. 1929, p. 1580) is retroactive in its effect and that it, therefore, precludes the recovery of damages from the owner or driver of a machine for death or injury of a guest who was riding therein, except upon proof that the death or injury was sustained as a result of the "intoxication, wilful misconduct or gross negligence" of the owner or driver of the vehicle. It is also claimed the attorney for plaintiff was guilty of prejudicial misconduct by disclosing to the jury in the course of the trial the fact that the defendants were protected against loss from such an accident by indemnity insurance.

[1, 2] It now appears to be the settled law of California that section 141½ of the California Vehicle Act is not retroactive in its application, and that the former doctrine of negligence applies to all actions for damages for death or injury of a guest while riding in an automobile which accident occurred prior to August 14, 1929, when the California Vehicle Act went into effect. It was therefore not necessary to plead or prove gross negligence on the part of the driver of the machine in the present case. Callet v. Alioto (Cal. Sup.) 290 P. 438; Martinelli v. Poley (Cal. Sup.) 292 P. 451; Krause v. Rarity (Cal. App.) 285 P. 879.

There was no prejudicial misconduct on the part of counsel for the plaintiff in referring to an insurance company during the course of the trial, under the circumstances of this case.

[3] In the examination of prospective jurors on the voir dire they were asked if they were stockholders or interested in any insurance company. Some of them were asked if they were so interested in the Royal Indemnity Company. These were competent questions to ascertain the state of mind of the jurors. If any of them were officers or stockholders in the insurance company which carried indemnity insurance on the defendant's automobile, or in any other indemnity insurance company, they would not be presumed to be as free from bias as though they were not so interested. The relationship of any prospective juror to an indemnity insurance company is a fact the plaintiff has a right to elicit for the purpose of exercising peremptory challenges if he so desires. Arnold v. California P. C. Co., 41 Cal. App. 420, 183 P. 171; Williamson v. Hardy, 47 Cal. App. 377, 190 P. 646; Potter v. Driver, 97 Cal. App. 311, 275 P. 526; 4 Blashfield's Cyc. of Auto Law, p. 1521, § 19.

[4] In answer to a general question propounded to a juror as to whether he was interested in any company insuring against liability for automobile accidents he replied that he was not. Plaintiff's attorney then said: "So, therefore, you are free and open-minded in this matter?" The juror replied, "Yes, sir." On motion this question and answer were stricken from the record. Even though this question did contain a subtle inference that a surety company was indirectly interested in the outcome of the cause, it was harmless. In the course of the examination of the jurors the court made it very clear to the jurors that their verdict was to be based solely on the merits of the cause, and that they were to disregard any question of indemnity insurance. The court said: "There are no outside influences at all of any kind that should have any part in your deliberation in this case, and you are not to speculate as to whether or not the defendants are or are not insured; that has nothing to do with this case, it is just the question, the same as an individual, if the * * * (defendants are) liable under the law they should be assessed damages, and on the other hand, if * * * they are not liable, you cannot figure and say 'well, they must be insured and we will get the insurance company,' for that would be a miscarriage of justice."

[5, 6] An appellate court will not assume that a jury will deliberately disregard their oaths and an instruction so explicit as the foregoing, and presume prejudicial error from the mere discovery of the interest of a surety company in the outcome of the action, unless that information has been unjustifiably elicited by the plaintiff in bad faith.

[7, 8] Finally, it is asserted the most grievous misconduct of the plaintiff's counsel in disclosing the interest of an insurance company occurred as follows: August Pistoresi, who drove the automobile at the time of the accident, was being examined as a witness. For the first time, to the knowledge of plaintiff, he claimed that the accident was caused by Simon Dermer, Jr., distracting his attention from the highway just before they reached the turn in the road, by pulling at his sleeve to emphasize some point in a story which he was relating. Since the alleged contributory negligence of the deceased was an issue in the case this circumstance became of vital importance. The merits of the entire case hinged upon the question as to whether the driver of the machine was guilty of negligence by virtue of his inattention to the highway and his careless operation of the automobile. Discrediting this statement, and in order to lay the foundation for impeachment of the witness on this subject, he was asked on cross-examination:

"Q. Who was the first person you told that this boy pulled your shirt? A. I never told anybody. * * *

"Q. You never told anybody? A. The doctor (Ransom). I told the doctor. * * *

"Q. Did you ever tell anybody else? A. No.

"Q. Wasn't there some man in San Francisco that came out to see you, and talked to you about this accident? A. Sure. * * *

"Q. Didn't the suggestion that your shirt had been pulled by this boy come from that man who came to see you from San Francisco? He told you that, didn't he? A. No, he never.

"Q. What did he say to you about it? A. He just asked me some questions, and I answered the way I wanted them. * * *

"Q. You are sure you told Doctor Ransom? Was Doctor Ransom present when that man talked to you? * * * A. No, sir, he was not

"Q. That man from San Francisco told you who he was? A. He told me his name, but I forget.

"Q. Did he tell you why he came to see you? A. Yes, he told me he was an insurance man, but I just didn't want to tell him right away. * * *

"Q. Did you ever tell anybody else? A. No.

"Q. Anybody else that this boy had pulled your shirt? A. No."

It appears from the admission of August Pistoressi that he had never told any one, except the doctor, about this circumstance regarding the pulling of his sleeve, which clearly was intended to relieve him from negligence and place the blame for the accident upon the deceased boy. The doctor was called in rebuttal and virtually contradicted the statement that he had been told of the incident. When he was asked, "Did Pistoressi make that statement to you?" he replied, "I do not remember that he did."

This was a perfectly legitimate cross-examination of the witness. It does not appear to have been conducted in bad faith. It is not unreasonable, under the circumstances of this case, to assume that the plaintiff discredited this belated story regarding the pulling of the driver's sleeve. A plaintiff may not be deprived of the benefit of legitimate rebuttal to a pretended defense against a charge of negligence even though it may disclose the fact that a surety company is interested in the outcome of the action. Cozad v. Raisch Imp. Co., 175 Cal. 619, 166 P. 1000; 4 Blashfield's Cyc. of Auto. Law, p. 1521, § 19. In the authority last cited the author says:

"The fact of such insurance may, however, incidentally and unavoidably appear. There are many instances in which it may legitimately be developed in cross-examination, and * * * if it tends to prove any issue in the case or is relevant or material for any purpose, it cannot be excluded on the ground that it may tend to prejudice the defendant."

The judgment is affirmed.

All concur.

HODGE v. WEINSTOCK, LUBIN & CO.

Civ. 4045.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

Nov. 8, 1930.

1. Negligence ⇨44.

Department store must exercise ordinary care to keep aisles and passageways of premises in reasonably safe condition so as not unnecessarily to expose customer to danger.

2. Negligence ⇨136(22).

In action for injuries sustained when plaintiff tripped over movable platform protruding into aisle in department store, defendant's negligence held for jury under evidence.

Evidence tended to show that movable platform, over which plaintiff alleged she tripped, was only six inches high and placed in an area where crowds assembled; that it was in immediate proximity of goods on display on elevated tables which invited elevated glances of people in store; and that crowds surged around it with such difficulty of seeing it as can readily be inferred.

3. Negligence ⇨44, 67.

Department store owes customer, as invitee, a reasonably safe place in which to move about, and customer may assume that it was provided.

4. Negligence ⇨67.

Customer in department store is bound to take reasonable care for her own safety.

5. Negligence ⇨136(27).

In action for personal injuries against department store, plaintiff's contributory negligence in not seeing movable platform, over which she tripped, held for jury under evidence.

6. Trial ⇨285, 295(1), 296(1).

Instruction must be read in its entirety and in connection with other instructions, and in view of evidence in case.

7. Negligence ⇨136(27).

Whether momentary distraction of customer in department store resulting in her tripping over movable platform was neglect of ordinary care under circumstances was question for jury.

8. Negligence ⇨141(4).

In action for injuries sustained when plaintiff tripped over movable platform protruding into aisle of department store, instruction on contributory negligence resulting from momentary distraction held not erroneous.

Instruction, among other things, placed it within province of jury to determine whether plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, although they might find that, while moving along aisle, plaintiff's "attention was distracted momentarily by something else and she failed to notice the platform placed in one of said main aisles," and although they might find that platform was in such position that ordinarily prudent person would have discovered it. Parts of same instruction and other instructions clearly declared law relating to contributory negligence, precluding any chance of jury having been misled.

9. Trial ⇨253(7).

Instruction authorizing damages if jury found plaintiff's injuries were caused by department store failing to keep premises in reasonably safe condition held not erroneous as not embracing sufficient facts.

Plaintiff brought action for damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained when she tripped over movable platform protruding into aisle of department store. Instruction complained of told jury that "proprietor of a store must keep the portion of the premises permitted to be used by the prospective buyers in a reasonably safe condition, and if you find in this case that the injury suffered by plaintiff was caused by defendant's neglect to do so, a recovery of damages may be had for the injuries proximately caused thereby."

10. Damages ⇨171.

Evidence showing poverty of plaintiff suing for personal injuries is inadmissible, and, if admitted, constitutes reversible error.

11. Trial ⇨133(6).

In personal injury action, statement by plaintiff's counsel regarding plaintiff's ability to pay on medical and hospital bills held not prejudicial, in view of cautionary instruction.

During course of trial, plaintiff offered certain medical and hospital bills which were marked, "Paid." Defendant objected to bills upon ground that if bills had been paid plaintiff could not recover such sums. During discussion, counsel for plaintiff stated that, "The plaintiff in the action paid all the money she had in the world, on account of these bills." Court, at defendant's request, instructed jury to disregard such statement.

12. Appeal and error ⇨1060(1).

Statement that plaintiff was in needy circumstances does not constitute reversible error, where there is no evidence of poverty.

13. Appeal and error ⇨1066.

Erroneous instruction, in personal injury action, that jury might consider plaintiff's pecuniary position, where there was no sufficient evidence establishing that condition, would not justify reversal.

14. Appeal and error ⇨1060(1).

In personal injury action, argument of plaintiff's counsel giving rise to inference that plaintiff was destitute, though improper, held not reversible error, absent evidence of poverty, and in view of cautionary instruction.

During argument plaintiff's counsel stated that plaintiff was required to pay out all the money she had on account of medical and hospital bills resulting from injuries. Court cautioned jury to disregard comments of counsel beyond what was proven in case. There was no evidence, however, in case, showing plaintiff's poverty.

15. Appeal and error ⇨1060(1).

Plaintiff's showing, in personal injury action, that defendant is protected by insurance, constitutes reversible error.

16. Trial ⇨127.

Plaintiff's showing, as incident to proper proof, that defendant in personal injury action is protected by insurance, does not constitute error.

17. Trial ⇨127.

In personal injury action, eliciting information showing defendant was protected by insurance during examination of defendant's witness on admissibility of photograph, though of doubtful propriety, held not to warrant reversal.

Defendant introduced photograph which it claimed correctly represented scene and conditions of department store in so far as it related to position of movable platform over which plaintiff alleged that she tripped and fell. Plaintiff's counsel during examination of defendant's witness who identified pictures brought out fact that they were taken by defendant's insurance broker. During course of examination, plaintiff's counsel further asked witness whether witness knew named person of a named insurance company, to which witness answered in the negative. Plaintiff, in apparent good faith, disputed correctness of pictures, contending that circumstances at time pictures were taken were not the same as at time of accident.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; John F. Pullen, Judge.

Action by Agnes J. Hodge against Weinstock, Lubin & Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Ralph H. Lewis, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Elliott, Atkinson & Sitton, of Sacramento, for respondent.

SHIELDS, Justice pro tem.

The defendant is a corporation which conducts a large department store in the city of Sacramento.

Near the center of the store is a large aisle or passageway, running southerly from the front entrance to the store, to the elevators in the rear or southern end of the store. This aisle is marked or defined on the west, or what we will call the left-hand side, by a series of counters and showcases, running in a practically straight line from the front to back near the rear of the store. On the east or right-hand side of the aisle, beginning at the front of the store, were a number of tables upon which merchandise was placed and displayed. These tables were about twenty-eight inches high and were placed in straight alignment and parallel with the showcases and counters on the left-hand side of the aisle. These tables extended about half-way back or southerly from the front of the store. Southerly from the tables, and along the right-hand side of the aisle, was placed a platform which was a little over five feet wide and seven feet long. It was six inches high. This platform was movable, and at the time in question had been placed about two feet southerly from the southern end of the tables on the right-hand side of the aisle and in line with, or parallel with, such tables, and with them completing the right-hand border of the aisle. South of this platform was a wide open space running to the elevators, and to the east from such elevators, to another or eastern entrance to the store. On the day in question in this case the plaintiff, with her sister, sister-in-law, and niece, entered the store by the eastern entrance, and together moved along westerly to about in front of the elevators, where they turned northerly and started up the main central aisle above described. Plaintiff moved up along the left side of the aisle, which was crowded with people.

Her sister and sister-in-law were five or six feet ahead of her. At a certain point in their progress the sister stepped over to one of the tables or counters on the right-hand side of the aisle. This sister shortly held up some article there on display and called to the plaintiff to come and see it. Plaintiff started to cross the aisle, through the crowd, to go to her sister when she tripped and fell heavily, breaking her hip and suffering the injuries for which this suit was brought. At the trial the jury found for the plaintiff, giving her a judgment for $5,000, from which this appeal is taken. Defendant's first contention is that there is no evidence from which the jury could find the defendant guilty of negligence.

On behalf of the plaintiff there was evidence that the platform extended out as much as a foot into the aisle and beyond the line made on the right by the series of tables running from the platform to the front of the store. There was no rail or guard around the platform. There was a small molding running around the edge of the platform and extending beyond the level of its sides. When plaintiff started across the aisle to her sister, there were people passing between her and the platform. Her sister was on the same level as herself, and the way across seemed unobstructed, except for the crowd through which she was making her way. Looking at the goods on display, seeking her sister, she tripped over the corner of this platform and fell, suffering her injury. Defendant contends that there is no evidence from which it could have been found that plaintiff tripped on or over the platform. Her niece testified that she fell over the "corner of the platform."

It is true that this witness on cross-examination stated that she did not see the platform at the time of the accident, and not until after the plaintiff had fallen. But she saw it then, she saw the location of the platform, she knew the position in which her aunt had fallen and the spot upon which she fell. From these she could see whether or not she had fallen over the "corner of the platform."

[1, 2] The plaintiff herself did not see the platform until after she had fallen, but she knew that she had tripped on something, and there was nothing else upon which she could have tripped except the foot of some one about the platform, and she testified that the thing upon which she tripped "was something more solid than a foot." It was the defendant's duty, when it invited the public into its store, to exercise ordinary care and prudence to keep the aisles and passageways of the premises in and through which, by their location and arrangement, a customer in making purchases is induced to go, in a reasonably safe condition so as not unnecessarily to expose the customer to danger or accident. From the evidence in this case the court cannot say, as a matter of law, that the defendant performed this duty. There was evidence that this flat platform, only six inches high, was placed in an area where crowds assembled; that it was along the right-hand side of the aisle, but that it encroached as much as a foot out into the aisle; that around it, and particularly north of it, goods were on display, on elevated tables which invited the elevated glances of the people in the store; and that crowds surged around it with such difficulty of seeing it as can readily be inferred. Upon this evidence the question of the negligence of the defendant was properly submitted to the jury, and their finding supported by it will not be disturbed.

[3-5] Defendant further contends that, admitting the negligence of the defendant, the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, as a matter of law, and that the implied finding of the jury that plaintiff was not so guilty, was without support in the evidence. It will be recalled that the plaintiff had not seen the platform, nor did she see it at the time of the accident. She entered the store in the usual way and went around the south end of the platform, at what distance, nor through such crowds as does not appear, and went over to the left-hand side of the aisle, and moved north on that side; the aisle was "crowded" with people. Later she worked her way through the crowd, to the right, and while looking at her sister, a short distance away, stumbled upon the platform and fell.

She was not looking for the platform, and did not see it. The defendant owed to her as an invitee upon the premises a reasonably safe place in which to move about, and she had a right to assume that it had provided it. She was, however, bound to take reasonable care for her own safety and it was a question for the jury to decide whether under all the circumstances in this case she should have seen the platform, or could by the exercise of ordinary care have avoided the accident. Their implied finding in her favor on this issue has ample support in the evidence.

[6-8] Defendant occupies stronger ground when it objects to an instruction given at the request of the plaintiff and which we must set forth at some length. By this instruction the jury was told that if plaintiff entered the store as a customer, she had a right to assume that the main aisles and passageways of the store were reasonably safe, and that she was only obliged to exercise the care of a reasonably prudent person for her own safety. The instruction then provided that "although you may find from the evidence that while moving along such passageway the plaintiff Agnes Hodge's attention was distracted momentarily by something else and she failed to notice the platform placed in one of said main aisles by the defendant, and although you may find from the evidence that said platform was in such position that an ordinarily prudent person would have discovered it, yet you are further instructed that it is the province of the jury to say whether she was guilty of contributory negligence in that behalf; at all times bearing in mind that a customer in such store has only to use ordinary care for her own safety, that is the care that ordinarily prudent persons exercise under the same or similar circumstances, and if you find from the evidence in this case, that at the time plaintiff was injured she was using ordinary care, and that such injury resulted from, or was caused by defendant's negligence in that behalf, then your verdict should be for the plaintiff." The objection, of course, is to the part italicized. This instruction is clumsily drawn, and if part of it was read narrowly it would be erroneous. But this instruction must be read in its entirety and in connection with other instructions; it is only a part of the charge. It must be read, too, in view of the evidence in the case. And the only time that the plaintiff's "attention was distracted," so far as appears from the evidence, was when her sister called to her from across the aisle and held up a piece of goods for her to examine. In view of this fact, the instruction seems clearly to mean that it was for the jury to say whether or not the fact that the plaintiff, through permitting her attention to be "distracted momentarily," by which she failed to see the platform which otherwise "was in such position that an ordinarily prudent person would have discovered it," constituted contributory negligence. In other words, whether or not the "distraction" which was shown in this case was under the circumstances a want of ordinary care. The jury were specifically told this in the portion of the instruction immediately following the italicized portion where the court said that it was "the province of the jury to say whether she was guilty of contributory negligence in that behalf."

As thus read, the instruction is a correct statement of the law. Whether or not a mere momentary distraction, under the circumstances of plaintiff's case, and in the surroundings in which she was placed, was a neglect of ordinary care, was clearly a question for the jury to answer. "Mere abstrac-tion * * * does not constitute contributory negligence." Wise v. Maxwell Hardware Co., 94 Cal. App. 765, 271 P. 918; Meindersee v. Meyers, 188 Cal. 498, 205 P. 1078. The facts in this case do not bring it within the rule of those decisions which hold that momentary forgetfulness of a known danger, which forgetfulness is not induced by some sudden and adequate disturbing cause, is itself, as a matter of law, contributory negligence. Meindersee v. Meyers, 188 Cal. 498, 205 P. 1078. Read in its entirety, this instruction can mean nothing else. Otherwise the portion of the instruction relating to "distraction" would have no meaning or relevance. This view is strengthened by the fact that immediately below the part objected to, and as part of the same instruction the jury are told that the plaintiff was required to "use ordinary care for her own safety, that is, the care that ordinarily prudent persons exercise under the same or similar circumstances." Disregarding this view, and giving the instruction the interpretation of a critical judgment, the most that can be said of it is that it is confusing and uncertain. But the law upon the point to which it relates is elsewhere set forth so clearly, and the instruction is followed by others which so plainly declare the law relating to contributory negligence that we are satisfied the jury was not misled by it.

[9] Defendant next objects to an instruction which reads as follows: "The proprietor of a store must keep the portion of the premises permitted to be used by the prospective buyer in a reasonably safe condition, and if you find in this case that the injury suffered by plaintiff was caused by defendant's neglect to do so, a recovery of damages may be had for the injuries proximately caused thereby." He contends that this instruction violates the well-established rule that "where an instruction directs a verdict for plaintiff if the jury finds certain facts to be true, it must embrace all the things necessary to show the legal liability of the defendant and to warrant the direction or conclusion that the plaintiff is entitled to a verdict." Starr v. Los Angeles Ry. Corp., 187 Cal. 270, 201 P. 599, 602. Appellant's whole objection might be dismissed with the statement that the instruction does not direct, or advise a verdict for the plaintiff. It goes little if any further than the usual instruction in negligence cases that where one is shown to have been guilty of negligence, he is liable in damages for the injuries proximately occasioned thereby. In a proper case, as here, other and qualifying instructions follow. But reading the instruction as appellant reads it, this rule has never been carried so far as to hold the giving of such an instruction as the one in question to be a reversible error. The first case in which the above rule was announced in this state was Killelea v. California Horseshoe Co., 140 Cal.

602, 74 P. 157, 158. Here the court instructed the jury that if they found certain facts, the "plaintiff is entitled to a verdict." It will be noted that the direction was that, in such an event the plaintiff was "entitled" to a verdict. No mention is made of any other or qualifying instructions. In Pierce v. United Gas & Electric Co., 161 Cal. 176, 118 P. 700, 703, where this question next comes before the court, the direction to the jury was that they "should render a verdict for plaintiff" if they found certain facts to be true. The facts referred to did not include all necessary to justify the verdict referred to, and it will be observed that upon the theory stated, a verdict was definitely directed. The latest case dealing with this question is Starr v. Los Angeles Ry. Corp., 187 Cal. 270, 201 P. 599, 601. Here the court told the jury with specific positiveness that if they found certain facts, they were "instructed to bring in a verdict for this plaintiff." The instruction in this case omitted many elements necessary to a legal recovery, and was erroneous in other particulars. It will be noted that in all of the above cases a verdict upon the two narrow statements of fact was definitely directed by the court. In one case the jury were told that the plaintiff was "entitled" to a verdict, in another that the jury "should" give him a verdict, and in the third they were "instructed" to do so. The instruction in this case simply states that in certain circumstances stated "a recovery of damages may be had for the injuries proximately caused thereby." This instruction is far from a direction to find for the plaintiff upon the facts stated. It simply says that upon such facts you "may" find a verdict. Other instructions fully setting forth the defenses of defendant tell the jury with equal clarity the conditions upon which they "may not" find for the plaintiff. Read all together, the charge properly states the law, and the instruction in question does not conflict with other, and qualifying ones. In any event the instructions are not so "flatly contradictory * * * [that they] must be held to be conflicting and prejudicial." Starr v. Los Angeles Ry. Corp., 187 Cal. 270, 201 P. 599, 603.

Other objections to other instructions seem to be without substantial foundation.

[10, 11] Defendant's next objections are based upon what it contends was the misconduct of counsel for plaintiff. The first objection grew out of statements of counsel which tended to inform or suggest to the jury that the plaintiff was impoverished and without means. The statements criticized were made under these conditions. During the course of the trial when counsel for plaintiff offered certain bills or charges against plaintiff, for hospital services, and for physician's fees, it appeared that these bills were marked paid. Counsel for defendant objects to the bills upon the ground that if the bills had been paid by some one other than plaintiff and gratuitously in her behalf, that she could not recover sums which she had not been compelled to pay. Mr. Atkinson, of counsel for plaintiff, then said, "the plaintiff is liable for the bills no matter who paid them, the plaintiff had no money." Counsel for defendant still contended that plaintiff could not recover if she did not pay the bills. During the discussion of this question Mr. Atkinson stated: "The plaintiff in the action paid all the money she had in the world, on account of these bills." Counsel for defendant objected to this statement, assigned it as error, and requested the court to instruct the jury to disregard it. This the court did. A witness was then called who testified that of the total charges the plaintiff paid $550, the plaintiff's sister-in-law paid $390, and the witness herself, the plaintiff's niece, borrowed $200 and paid the balance. Asked as to whether there was an understanding that the plaintiff was to pay these bills when she could, the witness answered, "yes, she was to pay them when she could." Later, when the case was being argued to the jury, Mr. Elliott, of counsel for plaintiff, among other things, said, "and the plaintiff was forced to pay out all the money she had." Counsel for defendant assigned this as misconduct, whereupon Mr. Atkinson, interrupting, said, "she testified she paid out all the money she had." This again was assigned as error. The court thereupon admonished the jury that if counsel in their zeal "go beyond what has been proven * * * you will disregard that * * * you will form your judgment on what has been testified to."

It is well settled that evidence of poverty is not admissible in cases such as this, and that its admission is reversible error. Ensign v. Southern Pacific Company, 193 Cal. 311, 223 P. 953, and many cases cited. In the present case no evidence was offered to this effect. The first statement of Mr. Atkinson was made to the court in the discussion of a legal question. There was nothing in the case to support it, and the court promptly told the jury to disregard it. We think that this disposed of the matter so far as that statement was concerned.

[12-14] Following this the plaintiff's niece testified that she and her mother paid part of the bills. No reference was made to the plaintiff's property or possessions. Later she testified that the plaintiff was to repay her "when she could," and that she had not done so. All this was admitted without objection. We do not think that this was evidence of poverty. It was given of necessity to overcome defendant's objection. An inference might be drawn from it that the plaintiff was destitute. But her inability to pay at the time might have been caused through the possession of assets upon which she could not realize. The inference of poverty in such a case is no stronger than if the bills had been offered, unpaid, with no comment or explanation. The remarks of counsel during the argument should not have been made. If there had been any evidence in the record of the plaintiff's poverty, whether objected to or not, it would have been wholly irrelevant, and the references to it might have necessitated a reversal of the judgment.

But where, as here, there is no evidence of poverty, a statement that the plaintiff was needy does not constitute reversible error. Even an erroneous instruction by the court that the jury had a right to consider the pecuniary condition of the plaintiff, when there was no sufficient evidence in the case of such a condition, will not justify a reversal. Lawrence v. Southern Pacific Company, 189 Cal. 434, 208 P. 966.

[15-17] The remaining assignment of error is the claim that counsel for plaintiff tried to tell the jury or to lead them to believe that the defendant was protected by indemnity insurance. Too frequently this is done, and the courts are confronted with the close and difficult question of determining whether or not the methods used were designedly employed for the purpose of influencing the jury, or whether or not they were successful in doing so. In this case the question arises upon this state of facts as disclosed by the record. Defendant had two photographs which it claimed correctly represented the scene and conditions of the premises in so far as related to the position of the platform and the arrangement of other furnishings as they were at the time of the accident. One of defendant's witnesses identified the pictures and they were offered in evidence. Counsel for plaintiff then interrogated the witness with reference to when and by whom the pictures had been taken. He replied that they had been taken about three days after the accident and by a Mr. Thielen. He was then asked, "Who is Mr. Thielen?" Upon objection being made, counsel for plaintiff stated that the facts sought to be discovered went to the authenticity of the picture, and the court overruled the objection.

Counsel for plaintiff then further asked, "What connection did he have with the accident, if any?" To which the witness answered, "He is our insurance broker." After answering that he did not know at whose request the picture was taken, but that Thielen arranged for it, the witness was further asked, "It was taken by him as your insurance broker; and is that same statement true as to the other time and place and circumstances under which the picture known as defendant's exhibit B for identification was taken?" The witness answered that he presumed so, that he did not see the picture taken, that he was present when they started, but did not stay.

Later, and while still inquiring into the conditions under which the pictures were taken, the witness replied that there were present at the taking Mr. Thielen, the photographer and, he thought, Mr. Norton. Counsel for plaintiff then asked, "Do you know Mr. Hallinan?" And upon an unimportant reply of the witness repeated, "Do you know Mr. Hallinan, of the Eagle Indemnity Company?" To which the witness answered that he did not. Later, counsel, further addressing the witness, said, "Then as I understand you, Mr. Hails, you were not there, but when you left, a Mr. Thielen, your broker, insurance broker, was there, and the photographer, Mr. Hodson, and you are not positive as to anybody else being there, at the time these pictures were taken?" To which the witness replied that he had not stayed until the pictures were taken. There is no rule better settled than that if a party introduces evidence that the defendant in such a case as this is insured, or by deliberate purpose or by successful tactics purposefully suggests this fact to the jury, it constitutes reversible error. This rule is stated and the authorities collected in the case of Perez v. Crocker, 86 Cal. App. 288, 260 P. 838. But the evidence must have been brought out, and the statements made needlessly, or with some evidence of deliberate purpose, as in the case of Citti v. Bava, 204 Cal. 136, 266 P. 954, 955, where the court speaks of and penalizes the "avowed purpose and successful attempt" of counsel to get such facts before the jury. It must have been brought to the jury "by questions designed solely for that purpose." Nichols v. Nelson, 80 Cal. App. 590, 252 P. 739, 742; Pierce v. United Gas & Electric Co., 161 Cal. 176, 188, 118 P. 700; Eldridge v. Clark & Henery, 75 Cal. App. 516, 243 P. 43. In the case before us, the pictures were offered as showing the physical conditions of the premises where the accident occurred, as of the time of the accident. The party who took them, and the party who arranged to have them taken, were not before the court. The plaintiff had not been present when the pictures were taken. Plaintiff, apparently in entire good faith, disputed the correctness of the pictures, contending that the articles upon the platform, as shown in the picture, were not as they were at the time of the accident, and that the position of the platform, as shown in the picture, was also different. Plaintiff had a right to make critical inquiry into all facts relating to the picture's correctness. To this end, she had a right to show when it was taken, by whom, and whether or not such person held an adverse interest. Her questions seem reasonably designed to bringing out this information. And if the evidence, or suggestion of insurance is brought out as an incident to the proof of some other fact properly involved, it is without error. Nichols v. Nelson, 80 Cal. App. 590, 252 P. 739; Potter

v. Driver, 97 Cal. App. 311, 275 P. 526. The rule in such cases is more fully stated in Dermer v. Pistorosi (Cal. App.) 293 P. 78. The repetition by counsel in his question where he said, "Mr. Thielen, your broker, insurance broker," was improper. But the fact that Thielen was defendant's "insurance broker" was already before the jury, through the testimony of a witness for the defendant, and this repetition could not have been productive of injury. Likewise the reference by counsel to the absent Mr. Hallinan as being "of the Eagle Indemnity Co.," was of doubtful propriety, dependent upon whether or not it was made in good faith, for the purpose of identifying the party referred to. Giving counsel the benefit of the consideration, these two instances of questionable statement do not warrant the reversal of a judgment otherwise free from error, and apparently fair and just.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Bills and notes ⇨348.

Payee's demanding payment, while being owner of demand note, fixed date of maturity for purpose of transfer (Civ. Code, §§ 3082, 3088, 3266b).

2. Bills and notes ⇨129(3).

Note, payable on demand, was payable within reasonable time (Civ. Code, §§ 3082, 3088, 3266b).

3. Bills and notes ⇨537(1).

Reasonable time, within which demand note is payable, is mixed question of law and fact (Civ. Code, §§ 3082, 3088, 3266b).

4. Bills and notes ⇨537(1).

In action involving demand note, payable within reasonable time, whether circumstances show unreasonable time is question of fact for fact-finding body (Civ. Code, §§ 3082, 3088, 3266b).

5. Bills and notes ⇨537(1).

In action involving demand note, payable within reasonable time, whether, if true, cir-circumstances amount to unreasonable time, is question of law for court (Civ. Code, §§ 3082, 3088, 3266b).

6. Appeal and error ⇨931(4).

Notwithstanding absence of express finding, it must be assumed, in support of judgment denying recovery against accommodation maker of demand note, that trial court believed note was transferred after maturity.

7. Bills and notes ⇨525.

Evidence held to show demand note was transferred after maturity; note being dated November 15, 1923, and transferred on October 17, 1924, after maker had refused payment (Civ. Code, §§ 3082, 3088, 3266b).

Evidence showed that plaintiff was president of certain bank; that both plaintiff and defendant were members of board of directors; that plaintiff's son, who was cashier, made unauthorized loan exceeding amount allowed by Rev. St. U. S. § 5200 (12 USCA § 84); that in view of expected visit of bank examiner, plaintiff suggested that if directors would accommodate him by executing notes, he would hold them harmless, and would personally pay such notes; that bank, after unsuccessfully demanding payment, sold notes to plaintiff; that nearly all of directors resided in small town, in which bank was located; and that defendant resided in another town only short distance away.

8. Bills and notes ⇨98.

Alleged accommodation maker of demand note for bank to cover illegal loan to third person held not estopped, when sued by president who purchased note after maturity, to set up contemporaneous agreement that president would pay note (Civ. Code, §§ 3082, 3088, 3266b).

9. Bills and notes ⇨351.

In action by purchaser after maturity against maker, evidence that note was for accommodation, and without consideration, held competent (Civ. Code, §§ 3082, 3088, 3266b).

10. Bills and notes ⇨49.

Person for whose accommodation note is given is not entitled to sue accommodation maker.

11. Bills and notes ⇨518(2).

Evidence supported finding that bank director, who gave note to bank to accommodate president whose son, as cashier, made unauthorized illegal loan, received no consideration; contention consideration was director's statutory liability for illegal loan not being proved (12 USCA § 84).

STURTEVANT, J.

This action was brought to recover on a demand promissory note. The complainant pleaded in the ordinary form his cause of action. The defendant admitted the making of the note but denied all liability thereon, and alleged that he executed the note as an accommodation to the plaintiff and on the promise that the plaintiff would hold the defendant harmless thereon and that there was no consideration for the note. The trial court made findings in favor of the defendant. The plaintiff has appealed and has brought up typewritten transcripts.

On November 15, 1923, the date the note was executed, C. Lepori, Jr., was cashier of the First National Bank of Pittsburg, Cal. His father, C. Lepori, Sr., was president. Seven men, including plaintiff and defendant, constituted the board of directors. On the afternoon and evening of the date last mentioned a special meeting of the board of directors of the bank was held. Before that meeting adjourned, each director executed to the bank his promissory note in the sum of $2,500. All of the notes aggregated the total sum of $20,000. While the bank held the notes, Mr. Ellis, who had become its cashier, demanded payment from this defendant, but defendant refused payment. Thereafter, on October 17, 1924, the bank sold to C. Lepori, Sr., all of said notes and the purchaser sued this defendant on one of the notes so signed by him.

On the trial the defendant introduced parol evidence to prove his defenses. The plaintiff contends that such evidence, not related to consideration, should have been excluded. The defendant claims that it was properly introduced.

[1-7] As stated above, the payee, the First National Bank of Pittsburg, demanded payment on the note while it was the owner thereof. For the purpose of transfer, that fact fixed the date of the maturity. 8 C. J. 408. The note was assigned to plaintiff after the making of that demand. Moreover, as the note was made payable on demand, it was payable within a reasonable time. Civ. Code, §§ 3082, 3088, 3266b. As to what is a reasonable time is a mixed question of law and fact. Whether the circumstances show an unreasonable length of time is a question of fact to be found by the fact-finding body. Whether, if true, such circumstances amount to an unreasonable length of time is a question of law for the court. Franklin Bank v. St. Louis Car Co. (Mo. Sup.) 9 S.W.(2d) 901, 902, 60 A. L. R. 639, 646. On these matters the pleadings in the instant case made no issue and the court made no express finding. But in support of the judgment we must assume that the trial court was of the opinion the note was transferred after its maturity. If so, we may not say the court erred in the determination of that question. Bearing in mind that Pittsburg is a small town, that nearly all of the directors resided at Pittsburg, and that this defendant resided only a short distance away, at Oakland, and, bearing in mind, also, the admitted facts surrounding the execution of the several notes each in the sum of $2,500, we think it is clear that the note sued on was transferred to the plaintiff after the maturity thereof. 8 C. J. 408, note 93, and cases cited; Franklin Bank v. St. Louis Car. Co. (Mo. Sup.) 9 S.W.(2d) 901, 60 A. L. R. 639, 641, and note. In the case of Pacific-Southwest Trust & Sav. Bank v. Valley Finance Corp., 99 Cal. App. 728, 279 P. 222, 280 P. 134, similar questions being involved, this court held that in an action against an alleged accommodation maker of a note by a purchaser for value after maturity evidence as to contemporary agreements between the parties to the note is admissible.

[8-10] The defendant introduced evidence to the effect that the bank had made certain legal loans to W. H. Paul. Later, without any action by the board of directors authorizing him so to do, the cashier, C. Lepori, Jr., made other loans to W. H. Paul in such sums that the total, $29,000, was in excess of the sum which the bank might legally loan to one borrower. U. S. Rev. Stats, § 5200 (12 USCA § 84). That is so because the bank had a paid-up capital of only $75,000 and $13,000 in surplus. There was evidence that the bank examiner was expected to arrive at Pittsburg within a very short time; that the board of directors was especially called upon to meet November 15, 1923; that at that meeting this plaintiff stated the dilemma confronting the bank, and admitted the dilemma was brought about by the unauthorized acts of his son in making the additional loans; that at the same time the plaintiff also stated that his properties were such that he could not at once make the necessary advancements to the bank to tide it over; and, continuing, he suggested that if each director would accommodate him by each executing a promissory note in the sum of $2,500 he would hold the makers harmless and that he would personally pay the notes. The defendant testified that acting on the promise so made to him, and not otherwise, he executed the note pleaded in the complaint. The plaintiff claims that such an agreement was contra bonos mores, and when that rule was called to the attention of the trial court it was the duty of the trial court not to enforce the agreement. It has not done so. By its judgment, it has merely left the parties where it found them. Hence it did not violate that rule. Moreover, under the facts the defendant was not estopped from setting up the defense which he pleaded. First Nat. Bank v. Reed, 198 Cal. 252, 261, 244 P. 368. In so far as the evidence showed that the note was an accommodation note and that it was not supported by any consideration, the evidence was properly admitted. Pacific-Southwest Trust & Savings Bank v. Valley Finance Corp., 99 Cal. App. 728, 279 P. 222, 280 P. 134; Wilhoit v. Seavall, 121 Kan. 239, 246 P. 1013, 48 A. L. R. 1273, 1285. As to both of those subjects there was considerable conflict in the evidence. But, if the trial court believed the evidence introduced by the defendant, and from its findings we must assume it did, the note in suit was an accommodation note and this plaintiff was not entitled to sue the defendant on said note. Williams v. Hasshagen, 166 Cal. 386, 390, 137 P. 9.

[11] In what we have said regarding accommodation notes we have not overlooked the fact that the plaintiff earnestly contends that the defendant received a consideration—the amount of his liability under the Banking Act for an illegal excess loan. Rev. Stats. U. S. § 5200. But the defendant answers he had nothing to do with making the excess loans and did not incur any liability thereon. The plaintiff introduced the minutes of the board of directors as evidence. The defendant introduced oral evidence, supporting his contentions. Moreover, so far as the record discloses, the Paul notes were retained by the bank. We cannot say the finding is not supported by legal evidence.

We find no error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

PLATH v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al.

Civ. 7533.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 2, California.

Nov. 5, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 5, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 29, 1930.

1. Master and servant ⇨405(5).

Evidence sustained finding that wife wrongfully deserted employee, as regards her right to compensation for his death (Civ. Code, § 175; St. 1917, p. 844, § 14, as amended by St. 1919, p. 917, § 5).

Evidence showed that wife left home while husband was away, telling neighbor she was leaving her husband for good and was not going back to him, and that wife never again lived with husband, who never contributed further to her support. There was evidence of quarrel within week preceding wife's desertion of husband, but no evidence justifying inference that husband was at fault.

2. Master and servant ⇨405(5).

Finding that wife deserted husband did not require negative showing that leaving was without cause (Civ. Code, § 175).

Civ. Code, § 175, provides that husband abandoned by wife is not liable for her support until she offers to return, unless she was justified, by husband's misconduct, in abandoning husband.

3. Master and servant ⇨388.

Husband is liable for support of insane wife only where liability existed at time wife became insane (Pol. Code, § 2176).

Pol. Code, § 2176, provided that husband of insane person must cause insane person to be suitably cared for and shall be liable for care, support, and maintenance of insane person.

4. Master and servant ⇨388.

Where deceased employee was relieved of liability for support of wife over year before wife became insane, wife was not entitled to recover compensation for employee's death because insane at that time (Pol. Code, § 2176; St. 1917, p. 844, § 14, as amended by St. 1919, p. 917, § 5).

5. Master and servant ⇨403.

Presumption that wife's abandonment of husband continued held not rebutted at time when wife was subsequently declared insane so as to revive husband's liability for support of wife (Civ. Code, § 175; Pol. Code, § 2176).

Proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Lucy Plath, by her guardian, Leroy R. Bruce, for the death of an employee, her husband, claimant, opposed by the Union Rock Company, employer, and the Federal Mutual Liability Insurance Company, insurance carrier. To review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission denying compensation, claimant brings certiorari.

Award affirmed.

Emery F. Mitchell and W. R. Augustine, both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Edward O. Allen, of San Francisco, for respondent Industrial Accident Commission.

R. P. Wisecarver, of San Francisco, for certain other respondents.

SPENCE, J.

Petitioner, an insane person confined in a state hospital, by her guardian, seeks to annul an award of the Industrial Accident Commission made against petitioner and in favor of the employer of her deceased husband and the employer's insurance carrier.

The deceased employee and the petitioner were married in 1923 and thereafter moved to Kern county, where they resided together until their separation in February, 1925. In May, 1926, in San Francisco petitioner was adjudged insane and committed to the state hospital. In November, 1928, the deceased, while employed as a truck driver by the respondent employer, sustained injuries which resulted in his death.

The Commission found: "That in and about the month of February, 1925, the said defendant, Lucy Plath, being then competent and in possession of her faculties, wilfully and wrongfully deserted the said employee, and then and thereafter continued to live separate and apart from him, and the said employee then and thereafter for good and sufficient cause refused to contribute and did not contribute to her support or to any part thereof, and was not legally liable for her support, and said defendant was not dependent upon him at the time of the injury for her support, nor for any part thereof."

[1, 2] The petitioner contends that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the foregoing findings. It may be noted that these "findings" contain both findings of fact and conclusions of law. The conclusions of law are based upon section 175 of the Civil Code, which reads as follows: "A husband abandoned by his wife is not liable for her support until she offers to return, unless she was justified, by his misconduct, in abandoning him. * * *" Petitioner's claim of insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings of fact is directed solely at the finding relating to desertion. The Commission, of course, did not have the benefit of the testimony of the petitioner or of the deceased regarding the circumstances immediately surrounding their separation, but the evidence showed that one evening in February, 1925, while the deceased had gone to see a doctor regarding an injury to his hand, the petitioner left their home and was gone upon deceased's return; that she had told a neighbor that she was leaving deceased for good and that she was not going back to him again; that petitioner was driven in an automobile by a neighbor to the home of another man with whom she thereafter lived; that petitioner never again lived with deceased and deceased never contributed further to her support. There was no evidence that petitioner ever offered to return to the deceased. From the above it appears that there was direct testimony showing that petitioner left the home of deceased with the intent to remain away from him and to never return to him. It was not necessary to show negatively that such leaving was without cause. As was said in Morrison v. Morrison, 20 Cal. 431, at page 432, "The plaintiff is not required to show negatively that no cause existed, for none appearing, the law will not presume one." Counsel for petitioner calls our attention to certain testimony relating to a quarrel or altercation between petitioner and deceased within a week before petitioner left deceased and apparently takes the position that the Commission was bound to infer that such quarrel or altercation constituted misconduct upon the part of the deceased which justified petitioner in leaving. The Commission was not bound to so infer, and it is doubtful whether the evidence would justify any such inference. There was no evidence regarding the subject of the dispute, who was at fault in causing the quarrel, or who was the aggressor in the altercation. Upon the unsatisfactory state of the record, it would be pure speculation to attempt to say whether such quarrel or altercation constituted misconduct on the part of the deceased or upon the part of the petitioner. We believe that the evidence was sufficient to sustain the findings of fact referred to and that the Commission properly concluded, under said section 175, that deceased was not liable for the support of the petitioner.

Petitioner contends, however, that the Commission should have made a finding that at the time of the death of deceased petitioner was insane and an inmate of the state hospital and that an award should have been made in her favor by virtue of the provisions of section 14 of the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 844, § 14, as amended by St. 1919, p. 917, § 5), and section 2176 of the Political Code. Said section 14 reads: "The following shall be conclusively presumed to be wholly dependent for support upon a deceased employee; * * * (1) A wife upon a husband with whom she was living at the time of his injury, or for whose support such husband was legally liable at the time of his injury." Said section 2176 read at that time: "The husband, * * * of an insane person * * * must cause him to be properly and suitably cared for and maintained, and must pay the costs and charges of his commitment and transportation to a state hospital for the insane. * * * The husband, * * * of an insane person * * * shall be liable for the care, support and maintenance of any insane person * * * in a state hospital to which he has been or may hereafter be committed or transferred, and it is hereby made the duty of the commission to make collections of all of the aforesaid costs and charges, and charges for the care, support and maintenance of any insane person * * * in a state hospital, or to see that they are collected."

[3, 4] It is argued that the question of actual dependency is immaterial in the case of the surviving wife where the husband is legally liable for her support at the time of the injury and that section 2176 creates that liability when the wife is insane. There would be merit in this contention if section 2176 is to be construed as imposing a new liability upon the husband in those cases where prior to the insanity of the wife the husband has been relieved of liability for support under section 175 of the Civil Code. We believe, however, that properly construed section 2176 imposes such liability in favor of the state only in those cases in which liability existed in favor of the wife at the time she became insane. Upon the facts as found by the Commission the deceased had been relieved of liability for the support of petitioner more than a year before she became insane, and a finding that at the time of the injury to deceased petitioner was insane and an inmate of the state hospital would have been an immaterial finding not affecting petitioner's rights under the act.

[5] It is further contended that even conceding that the evidence established desertion upon the part of petitioner, the presumption that such desertion continued was rebutted at the time when she was declared insane as she could not thereafter willingly continue to remain away nor offer to return. We cannot follow this line of reasoning. Petitioner abandoned the deceased in February, 1925, and made no offer to return. Assuming that an offer to return in May, 1926, would have been timely so as to revive the liability of the deceased for petitioner's support under section 175, we cannot conclude that adjudging petitioner insane would be equivalent to such offer or have a like effect.

The Commission made findings on all material issues, which findings supported the award and were sustained by the evidence, and the award is therefore affirmed.

WARMER, Justice pro tem.

This is an action by which a tenant seeks to recover damages for eviction by the landlord. The facts are as follows:

May 1, 1925, the plaintiff herein entered into a lease for an orange and lemon grove consisting of 28 acres, approximately one-half oranges and one-half lemons. The term of said lease was five years. The rental provided for in said lease was one-half of the crop. The tenant agreed to cultivate, irrigate, prune, etc., the trees in said grove and to pick the crop and deliver to the landlord his portion of the fruit on the premises or at the railroad station or at a packing house, at the option of the landlord. The defendant purchased said grove some time in April, 1926, with knowledge of said lease. That at some time during his negotiations for said premises he told the plaintiff that when he secured title to the said property he was going to take possession of the premises, that plaintiff had already ruined the grove, and that he would have nothing more to do with him. On May 6, 1926, after having secured title to said premises he (defendant) actually entered upon said premises and took possession thereof, claiming to have done so under a provision in said lease giving him the right so to do in case of the failure of the plaintiff to properly irrigate, cultivate, prune, etc., the said grove. The evidence is sharply conflicting as to the condition of the grove, quantity of the fruit on the trees, and as to the value of the fruit. The cause was tried by the court sitting without a jury. Appellant contends that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings.

[1, 2] The intendments are in favor of the judgment, and, if evidence in support of the findings be substantial, either with or without conflict, the findings are sufficiently supported. Hind v. Oriental Products Co., 195 Cal. 655, 235 P. 438; Shannon v. Tooker et al., 167 Cal. 484, 140 P. 10.

Tenant who, being lawfully in possession, is evicted, may recover any damage sustained.

6. Landlord and tenant ☞331(2).

Evidence held sufficient to support finding of $600 damages to tenant in possession of orange and lemon grove, whose eviction by landlord proximately caused loss of value of fruit then on trees.

7. Landlord and tenant ☞331(2).

Tenant's damage, when evicted by landlord, who was entitled to one-half of crop, amounted to one-half of crop less cost of maturing, harvesting, and delivering according to lease.

premises to his damage in the sum of $600. The court's finding being adverse to the contention of the defendant as to the condition of the grove being such that he had a right to enter said premises under the terms of the lease and take possession thereof, it must be taken as conclusive that the condition of the grove was not such as to warrant the defendant in taking possession of the said premises and excluding the plaintiff therefrom. The evidence is sufficient to support the finding of the court that the plaintiff was excluded from said premises. It is necessary to point out only sufficient of the evidence to support such finding. Bancroft-Whitney Co. v. McHugh, 166 Cal. 140, 134 P. 1157.

The plaintiff testified that between the 5th and 8th of May, 1926, he found the defendant on said premises, at which time the following conversation took place: "I (plaintiff) said 'What do you mean, you got no business here.' He said he had business here. He said 'I own this property.' * * * I said 'You don't own this property.' * * * 'You were not here the other day when I come down here and there was nobody here and I took the chance of going ahead and picking the fruit.' * * * I said 'It was my money; it don't take your money to do all that work.' He said he didn't know anything about that. The place was his and nobody was to be there but himself. * * * It didn't belong to me any more he said. * * * He said 'No, this is all mine. It don't belong to you. You will keep away from here,' etc.

Joe Cappuccio, a son of the plaintiff, testified in that connection: "Yes, my father said to him 'This crop there was raised by myself and at my expense and it belongs to me' and if he would allow my father to take this crop, if father would withdraw his lease and he says 'No, this belongs to me,' etc.

The defendant himself testified that shortly prior to the time that he secured title he told the plaintiff: "I told him I would take possession of it as soon as I got title and I did not expect him to have anything further to do with it as it appeared that he had practically ruined it."

From the testimony quoted, if believed by the trial court, it was apparent that the defendant had inspected the said premises and arrived at the conclusion that, owing to what he saw there, he would enter upon said premises and take possession thereof, and, from the admitted fact that he did so almost immediately after he became the owner thereof, it clearly appears that the defendant chose to do that which he told the plaintiff he intended to do. Such evidence is sufficient to support the finding that the defendant took possession of the property and excluded the plaintiff therefrom. The next finding to which the appellant urges insufficiency of evidence is that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding of damage in the sum of $600.

[5] Where a tenant who is lawfully in possession of the premises is evicted therefrom he may recover damages.

In Klein v. Lewis, 41 Cal. App. 463, 182 P. 789, 790, the court said: "When the lessor by an illegal act materially disturbs the possession of his tenant, which he should protect and defend, the latter may abandon the premises leased and recover damages. [Citing cases.]"

In Saferian v. Baer (Cal. App.) 287 P. 142, 143, the court said: "Where a tenant who is lawfully in possession of the premises is evicted from them, he may recover damages."

An eviction entitles a tenant to recover any damage he may have sustained. Schumann v. Karrer, 184 Cal. 50, 192 P. 849; Hamer v. Ellis, 40 Cal. App. 57, 180 P. 30.

[6, 7] We think the evidence is sufficient to support the finding of the damage as found by the trial court, if the same proximately resulted from the eviction. When a tenant on an orange ranch cares for the same, irrigates, cultivates, prunes, and does such other things as are necessary for the proper care of a grove, and matures a crop of fruit on orange and lemon trees in a grove, he does so with the expectation that he will receive as compensation for his labor and expenditure in the production of said fruit the reward that is evidenced by the value of the fruit. Where one comes in and takes possession of the premises and takes the crop of fruit, it would hardly be contended that the loss of the crop to the plaintiff was not proximately caused by his eviction from the premises, and, where one wrongfully takes a crop so produced, certainly it is to the damage of the person from whom the crop is taken. Of course, the quantum of the damage does not run as to the whole crop, because in the instant case the landlord was entitled to one-half of the crop under the terms of the lease. The damage would therefore run only as to the value of one-half of the crop, from which must be taken the cost of maturing (in this instance nothing) and harvesting and delivering the said crop as in the lease provided. The loss of the value of the crop being proximately caused by the wrongful eviction, it becomes necessary to determine what was the value of the crop of fruit at the moment of eviction. At that time the fruit was on the trees, and we think the evidence is sufficient to sustain the finding of a damage of $600.

The plaintiff testified that he had been a rancher over a number of years; that the fruit was in first-class condition in April, 1926, set heavy on the trees. He estimated the trees would produce at least one box each; that there were 2,400 trees, including both oranges and lemons.

Joe Cappuccio, his son, testified that he was familiar with the handling of orange and lemon properties, and that he had worked on this property for a considerable length of time shortly prior to the eviction, that he had observed the orange and lemon trees and was able to judge the quantity of fruit thereon, and that in his opinion the oranges would average better than a box to the tree, while the lemons would average two boxes to a tree.

A witness, Montgomery, testified that he lived about a mile from the premises in question, was acquainted with the property, had been for a number of years; that he was an experienced man in orange culture, both as an owner and a worker, over a period of about 18 years, and was acquainted with the condition of the trees on this grove in the spring of 1926. He estimated the yield at about a couple of boxes at least, per tree.

Another witness, Raymond, testified that he was in the fruit buying and selling business with 13 years' experience; that he examined the orchard; had not estimated it exactly, but would figure it about a box to a tree or maybe a box and a half; the quality was not first class but was marketable; as to the lemons, that they were not first class but were marketable; that he was familiar with the market price of oranges per box in April, May, June, and July, 1926; that they ran all the way from $3 to $4 per box; that the quality was not very fancy, but they would be second grade; that the market price of the second grade fruit was about $3 per box; that the cost of picking, 6 cents to 10 cents a box, cost of hauling, 15 cents a box, and cost of packing, 75 cents a box for oranges; that the net to the grower of such oranges on this grove would be approximately $1.90 a box.

The grove being approximately equally set to oranges and lemons, there would be 1,200 orange trees. Under the evidence, each tree would produce one box of oranges; there would be 600 boxes of oranges to be delivered to the lessor and 600 boxes for the lessee. However, under the terms of the lease, it was the duty of the lessee to pick, haul, and pack ready for delivery to the lessor his portion of the crop. Under the evidence, such picking, packing and hauling charge was 90 cents per box, or $540 for 600 boxes. Under the evidence the net to the grower was $1.90 per box, or $1,140 for 600 boxes. Hence the plaintiff would receive $1,140 for his portion of the crop of oranges, but such sum would be charged with $540, which would be the cost to him under the terms of the lease, for picking, hauling, and packing the one-half of the crop of oranges that was to go to the lessor as rent. The balance would be the net of the whole transaction to the lessee or the sum of $600 found by the court. This does not take into consideration the evidence that the lemons were marketable. The evidence sufficiently supports the finding.

There was no evidence offered as to any other or further damage as a result of the eviction. The evidence being sufficient to support the findings, the judgment must be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

NOURSE, P. J.

Plaintiff sued for the market value and accrued dividends of certain stocks and bonds which had been deposited with the Union Trust Company prior to its consolidation under the name now used by defendant. The cause was tried before the court sitting without a jury, and resulted in a judgment for the plaintiff in the sum of $17,967.47. The defendant appeals on a bill of exceptions.

[1, 2] On December 1, 1916, plaintiff's mother deposited with the Union Trust Company thirty-nine $1,000 bonds of the United Railroads of San Francisco, subject to the terms of a reorganization agreement. The trust company issued to her a certificate or receipt for the bonds which provided that the interest of the depositor was assignable by transfer on the books by the holder in person or by agent upon surrender of the certificate properly indorsed. On October 31, 1917, plaintiff's mother, through her attorney in fact, Theodore Gray, sold and transferred her interest in this certificate to the plaintiff, and in 1919 said attorney in fact presented the assigned certificate to the trust company and made demand for delivery of the bonds. The company refused to make delivery when it learned that plaintiff's mother died on February 12, 1918; the contention of the trust company being that the assignment by Gray was made after death of his principal and for the purpose of avoiding the administration of her estate and the payment of inheritance taxes. Some time between this date and March 3, 1926, the trust company received in exchange for the thirty-nine bonds of the United Railroads other securities as it was authorized to do under the reorganization agreement.

Numerous demands were made on the trust company by Gray that it honor the assignment of October 31, 1917, and deliver to him these new securities under the power of attorney which he held from the plaintiff, who was a resident of London, England. Each demand was refused on the ground that the trust company believed that the property belonged to the estate of plaintiff's mother and that administration of that estate should first be had.

Letters of administration were not taken out as requested by the trust company, and nothing further was done until October, 1925, when Gray delivered the certificate unindorsed to one James R. Ewing, Jr., who promised to obtain the securities through the Equitable Trust Company of New York which was jointly named in the reorganization agreement as a depository. Ewing presented the certificate to the defendant with an assignment and indorsement to him. The signatures of plaintiff upon these documents were forgeries, but the defendant delivered the securities to Ewing on the strength of a guaranty of signature made by the American Bank. This guaranty was obtained by Ewing in the following manner: He signed his own name upon the certificate and presented it to an officer of the American Bank, where he was known and where he was a depositor. This official made the imprint of a rubber stamp directly under Ewing's name, reading "signature guaranteed. The American Bank of San Francisco," and signed his name. When the assignment was presented to defendant, it bore the name of plaintiff written directly above that of Ewing with three crosses inclosed in pencilled circles—one in front of plaintiff's name, one in front of Ewing's name, and one in front of the stamped impression "The American Bank." The word "signature" of the rubber stamp was changed to "signatures" so that the clerk of the defendant was led to believe that the American Bank guaranteed both signatures. Whether plaintiff's name appeared on the assignment when it was presented to the American Bank is not clear, and the party guilty of the forgery of plaintiff's name was not identified, but the certificate and the assignment were presented to the defendant by Ewing, the securities were delivered to him, and he disappeared. A year or so thereafter Gray discovered the fraud, made demand upon the defendant for the securities, and, the demand being refused, commenced this action in the name of plaintiff. The judgment covers the market value of the securities at the time of demand plus the accrued dividends which were collected by Ewing.

Stripped of all the byplay, the single issue involved is whether the appellant was negligent in delivering the securities to Ewing upon the forged assignment. We may therefore disregard all the lengthy discussions in the briefs upon the weight of the evidence and address ourselves solely to this issue. The appellant invokes the doctrine of section 3543 of the Civil Code, which provides that, "where one of two innocent persons must suffer by the act of a third, he, by whose negligence it happened, must be the sufferer." Appellant argues that the loss was occasioned by the negligence of respondent in intrusting the certificate to Ewing through her attorney in fact Gray, but the trial court impliedly found that it was appellant's negligence that caused the loss. In support of the judgment, the respondent points out that no administration had been had of the estate of her mother, and hence there was no reason for appellant to depart from its original position in refusing to deliver to any one other than a representative of the estate. It is also pointed out that respondent was a depositor with the trust company, that her signature card was on file at the time the certificate was presented, and that a mere inspection of the signature would have readily disclosed the palpable forgery of her name on the assignment. The issue is purely one of fact, and, as the evidence of such negligence is sufficient to support the finding of the trial court, there is nothing left for discussion on this appeal.

The judgment is affirmed.

STURTEVANT, J.

The plaintiff, as administratrix of the estate of her deceased husband, commenced an action against the defendants to recover damages for injuries suffered by her husband in an automobile collision. The defendants appeared and answered and a trial was had before the trial court sitting with a jury. The trial court granted a motion for a nonsuit in favor of Mr. Bodwin, from which order no appeal was taken. It directed the verdict in favor of the defendant corporation, and judgment was entered in favor of the corporation. From that judgment the plaintiff has appealed and has brought up an abbreviated bill of exceptions.

[1-3] The record shows that Reid-Murdoch & Company is a corporation which has its main office in Chicago and another office at 101 Mission street, San Francisco. As to what is the nature of its business the record does not inform us. On the 16th day of April, 1928, and for some time prior thereto, the San Francisco office was divided into three departments. Mr. Bodwin was head of the sales department. Mr. Walker was head of the purchasing department. Another was in charge of the office.

On Saturday afternoon, April 14, 1928, Mr. Walker, accompanied by Mr. Bodwin as his guest, entered an automobile owned by the defendant corporation and drove to Burlingame, where Mr. Walker resided. They remained there until Monday morning, and at about 7 a. m. they started for the San Francisco office, where they were due at 8 a. m. Before reaching the office the accident occurred which gave rise to this action. Mr. Walker was driving the automobile at the time of the accident, and there is no contention that he did not have the right to do so or that the defendant corporation had not authorized him to do so.

One of the grounds of the motion for a directed verdict was "that it affirmatively appeared from the uncontradicted facts that at the time and place of the happening of the accident the defendant Frank E. Walker was driving the automobile of the said defendant corporation * * * upon a mission of his own, and that * * * the said defendant corporation was not liable for his acts." In the case entitled Estate of Baldwin, 162 Cal. 471, 123 P. 267, the court was considering an order directing a verdict. On page 473 of 162 Cal., 123 P. 267, the court said: "The conditions under which the course pursued by the court in this instance is held to be proper are defined by a series of uniform decisions of this court, to which it will be sufficient to make reference. The doctrine of scintilla of evidence is rejected, as it is by the courts of the United States. (Commissioners of Marion County v. Clark, 94 U. S. 278, 24 L. Ed. 59.) A directed verdict is proper, unless there be substantial evidence tending to prove in favor of plaintiff all the controverted facts necessary to establish his case. In other words, a directed verdict is proper whenever, upon the whole evidence, the judge would be compelled to set a contrary verdict aside as unsupported by the evidence. To warrant a court in directing a verdict, it is not necessary that there should be an absence of conflict in the evidence, but, to deprive the court of the right to exercise this power, if there be a conflict, it must be a substantial one." Applying that rule to the instant case it is sufficient to state that both Mr. Walker and Mr. Bodwin testified directly and positively that from 2 o'clock on Saturday until the time of the accident neither one had transacted any business for the defendant corporation. Under these circumstances, the defendant cites and relies on Kish v. California State Automobile Ass'n, 190 Cal. 246, 212 P. 27, and contends that before it could be held liable it was necessary that the evidence disclose that the act of the servant must be connected directly or indirectly with the business of the employer and be in furtherance of the object for which the servant was employed. We do not understand the plaintiff to controvert that proposition. However, the plaintiff calls to our attention the fact that the automobile was the property of the defendant corporation. It then claims that where it is shown that the automobile which struck the injured person belonged to the defendant employer and that the person driving it was his employee, a presumption arises that such person was acting within the general scope of his authority. Wagnitz v. Scharetz, 89 Cal. App. 511, 517, 265 P. 318. The case is not helpful. No question of authority is involved. Mr. Walker testified flatly that he had authority to use the car on Saturdays, Sundays, mornings, and evenings. But there was no evidence that his duties were such that at any time he used the car in the transaction, directly or indirectly, of his master's business. The evidence adduced was to the effect that at the time of the accident the master's business was not being transacted. Furthermore, the plaintiff calls attention to certain questions and answers all of which we will not attempt to quote. Some of Mr. Walker's evidence is as follows:

"Q. But in your capacity as salesman you are working under him? A. Correct.

"Q. And you were at that time (the time of the accident)? A. Correct."

Some of Mr. Bodwin's evidence was as follows:

"Q. What was his (Mr. Walker's) relation to the sales department? A. He was not working as a salesman right then. He was going to the office attending to his duties as a buyer right then.

"Q. He was attending to the duties of his employment? A. Yes."

The plaintiff lays much stress on the words so used and asserts that the foregoing were statements to the effect that the employees were at work when the accident happened. The statements of the witnesses just mentioned are readily reconciled. In an altogether proper sense both Mr. Bodwin and Mr. Walker were employed by the defendant corporation on April 16, 1928. It is equally clear from the evidence that their day's work on that date had not commenced at the time the accident occurred. Most assuredly we are unable to say that in granting the defendants' motion the trial court abused its discretion. That being so, the judgment of the trial court should not be disturbed, and it is therefore affirmed.

Divorce ☞ 269(2).

Court, upon dismissal of divorce action, did not lose jurisdiction to punish plaintiff husband for contempt upon pending order to show cause for failure to pay alimony pendente lite and attorney's fees.

Divorce action was filed in November, 1922, and in November, 1923, court made order directing plaintiff husband to pay to wife alimony pendente lite and attorney's fees in a certain amount. In August, 1929, court issued an order requiring plaintiff to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt for failure to comply with foregoing order. Plaintiff was adjudged guilty of contempt and committed in September, 1930, but in the meantime, in October, 1929, he had filed a dismissal of the divorce action. The order for alimony pendente lite was in full force and effect up to the time of the dismissal, and no payments were made in compliance therewith.

Application by Julius Robbins for a writ of habeas corpus prayed to be directed to the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco to secure the release of petitioner from custody on a commitment for contempt for failure to pay alimony pendente lite and attorney's fees in a divorce action.

Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded to custody.

Petitioner herein was adjudged guilty of contempt for failure to pay alimony pendente lite and attorney's fees in a divorce action, and was committed to the county jail for five days. He seeks his release upon habeas corpus.

It appears that on November 16, 1922, petitioner filed a complaint for divorce and on February 14, 1923, the defendant in that action filed a demurrer to the complaint. On November 1, 1923, the court made an order directing petitioner to pay to the defendant $75 per month alimony pendente lite and $150 on account of attorney's fees. On August 31, 1929, an order to show cause was duly issued by the court requiring petitioner to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt for failure to comply with said order. The order to show cause was returnable on September 20, 1929, and was served on petitioner on September 3, 1929. Several continuances were had upon the hearing of said order to show cause, and petitioner was finally adjudged guilty of contempt and committed on September 3, 1930. In the meantime petitioner, on October 3, 1929, filed a dismissal of the divorce action, and on October 13, 1929, filed an amended dismissal.

It is conceded that the order for alimony pendente lite was in full force and effect up to the time of the dismissal of the action and that no payments were made in compliance therewith. No question is raised concerning the sufficiency of the evidence to show petitioner's ability to make the payments required. It is further conceded that the petitioner was adjudged guilty of contempt for failure to make payments which by the terms of the order had become due prior to the issuance of the order to show cause, which order to show cause was issued more than one month prior to the time that petitioner filed his dismissal.

Petitioner raises several points regarding the nature of the order for alimony pendente lite and the effect of the dismissal. Most of these have been answered adversely to petitioner's contentions in two proceedings heretofore decided involving this same order. Biltmore Drugstore v. Superior Court, 101 Cal. App. 363, 281 P. 710; Robbins v. Mulcrevy, 101 Cal. App. 300, 281 P. 668. Petitioner's main contention is that upon his dismissal of the divorce action the court lost jurisdiction to punish him for contempt upon the pending order to show cause for failure to make payments which had accrued prior to the dismissal. We find no merit in this contention. Petitioner cites no authority in this state in support of this proposition. The authorities in other jurisdictions are not in accord. The case of Hayes v. Hayes, 150 App. Div. 842, 135 N. Y. S. 225, affirmed in 208 N. Y. 600, 102 N. E. 1104, is quoted at length by petitioner. It is apparent from reading that opinion that the New York decisions are not harmonious, and the court there reluctantly followed the rule laid down in an earlier case which had been approved by the Court of Appeals. In the absence of more persuasive authority than that which has been called to our attention, we are unwilling to subscribe to a doctrine holding that under the circumstances here involved the court may be deprived of jurisdiction to proceed with a pending order to show cause and the defaulting party relieved of the consequences of his contempt by the filing of a voluntary dismissal of the action.

The writ is discharged, and the petitioner remanded to custody.

Automobiles ☞ 167(3).

Where truck, being 255 feet away, entered from private road, statute held not to give right of way to automobile on highway (St. 1923, p. 560, § 131(b), as amended by St. 1925, p. 412, § 15(b)).

At time of accident involved, St. 1923, p. 560, § 131(b), as amended by St. 1925, p. 412, § 15(b), provided that driver of vehicle entering public highway from private road shall yield right of way to all vehicles approaching on highway.

Appeal from Superior Court, Del Norte County; Warren V. Tryon, Judge.

Action by Arthur Wakefield against Walter Horn and wife, with a cross-complaint by defendants and a complaint in intervention by the Atlas Assurance Company, Limited, of London. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

George W. Howe, of Crescent City, for appellants.

John L. Childs, of Crescent City, and J. F. Coonan, of Eureka, for respondent.

Mr. Justice PLUMMER delivered the opinion of the court.

The plaintiff had judgment for damages to a truck owned by him, resulting from a collision with an automobile driven by the defendant Mary Horn. From this judgment, the defendants Horn appeal.

The record shows that just preceding the collision the plaintiff was driving a truck from a private road onto the highway known as and called the "Roosevelt Highway," leading to Crescent City. At the time the plaintiff drove onto the highway in question and turned to the right, facing Crescent City, the defendant was driving her car in the direction of Crescent City, and was, at said instant of time, about 255 feet distant from the private road just referred to. The defendant was driving on the Roosevelt highway, as stated, in the direction of Crescent City. At the time of the impact of the two cars, the record shows that the right-hand wheels of the plaintiff's truck were within a foot of the extreme right-hand side of the improved highway. While the truck was in this position, it appears that the defendant Mary Horn drove her car so close to the plaintiff's truck as to come in contact with the left fore wheel thereof, damaging the truck to the extent found by the trial court. The record shows that, at the time the truck was driven upon the highway, the defendant's car, then traveling on the right-hand side of the highway, turned to the left side thereof. Measurements were made of these tracks, and thus the distance was shown as above stated.

The cause was tried without a jury, findings were waived, and judgment entered by the court, assessing damages in the sum of $695.75. The defendants filed a cross-complaint, and the insurance company filed a complaint in intervention. There are no specifications of error; no argument is made by appellants that the testimony is insufficient, and the only point made is that, at the time the truck emerged from the private road to the highway, the defendant Mary Horn, driving her car as aforesaid, had the right of way. This is based upon the provisions of subdivision b of section 131 of the California Vehicle Act of 1923 (St. 1923, p. 560, § 131, subd. b, as amended by St. 1925, p. 412, § 15, subd. b), which then read: "The driver of a vehicle entering a public highway from a private road or drive shall yield the right of way to all vehicles approaching on said public highway." The argument is made that, irrespective of the distance between the approaching car driven by the defendant Mary Horn and the private highway on which the truck was emerging, it gave the defendant the right of way. The subdivision of the section, however, is not susceptible of any such interpretation. If interpreted literally as the subdivision reads, or as it then read, no one could ever drive from a private road upon a public highway if any one were approaching upon such highway, irrespective of the distance. The subdivision must be construed to give effect to the intent of the Legislature, which was to prevent automobile drivers on private roads from entering a public highway when a car was approaching upon such highway so near as to constitute an immediate hazard, and not that no one should enter upon a public highway from a private road or driveway so long as the public highway was in use. The subdivision of the California Vehicle Act has been amended so that its language conforms to the construction which we have here given. At the time the plaintiff's truck was driven upon the highway, the automobile belonging to the defendants was distant 255 feet. No question is raised but that the automobile was sufficiently distant to enable the speed of the automobile to be slackened, the testimony showing that it was running between 35 and 40 miles an hour. Likewise, the testimony is clear that there was ample space for the defendant's car to have been driven to the left of the plaintiff's truck without coming in contact therewith.

Under these circumstances this appeal appears to be wholly without merit, and the judgment is affirmed.

SOMMER et al. v. BANK OF ITALY NAT. TRUST & SAVINGS ASS'N.
Civ. 7087.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 2, California.
Nov. 7, 1930.

1. Banks and banking ⇨154(8).

Evidence showing payment by bank of forged checks and refusal to pay balance represented by forged check made prima facie case for recovery by depositor.

2. Account stated ⇨6(3).

Notice of forgeries given in middle of September held not unreasonably delayed so as to make account relating to August transaction an account stated.

Evidence showed that bank sent depositor statement covering August transactions some time in September before September 10; that depositor notified bank that some checks were forged about middle of September.

3. Banks and banking ⇨148(4).

Provision on bank statement that account is correct if no error is reported in ten days cannot be relied on unless called to depositor's attention.

4. Banks and banking ⇨154(9).

Whether depositor receiving bank statement August 3 was negligent in not examining statement before end of month and reporting forgeries held question of fact.

5. Banks and banking ⇨148(4).

Depositor could recover money paid on forged check, though negligent in not sooner examining bank statement, in absence of evidence that negligence proximately caused successful negotiation of forged checks.

6. Banks and banking ⇨148(3).

Bank sued for money paid on forged checks can avail itself of depositor's negligence only where free from negligence.

7. Negligence ⇨122(1).

Defense of negligence is affirmative defense.

8. Banks and banking ⇨154(6).

When depositor makes prima facie case for recovery of money paid on forged checks, bank has burden of showing freedom from negligence and depositor's negligence.

9. Banks and banking ⇨148(3).

Rule that party employing dishonest agent should bear loss held inapplicable to bank, sued for money paid on forged checks, not shown free from negligence.

10. Banks and banking ⇨148(3).

Re-employment of employee forging checks and acceptance of partial restitution from employee held not ratification precluding employer from recovering money paid by bank on forged checks.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by A. H. Sommer and another, as copartners doing business under the firm name and style of the San Francisco Container Company against the Bank of Italy National Trust & Savings Association. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal.

Reversed.

Rudolph J. Scholz, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Louis Ferrari and J. J. Posner, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

SPENCE, J.

Plaintiffs brought an action to recover sums deposited with the defendant bank and paid out on checks forged by an employee of plaintiffs. Upon a trial by jury, judgment of nonsuit was entered in favor of the defendant bank at the close of plaintiffs' case, and from this judgment plaintiffs appeal.

Plaintiffs opened their account with the bank in the early part of 1928. The signatures of the copartnership and plaintiff Sommer were forged by their employee to a series of checks in the months of July, August, and September, 1928. These forged checks totaled $1,550. The bank reimbursed plaintiffs in the sum of $365 for the checks forged prior to the month of August, but refused to reimburse plaintiffs for the checks subsequently forged. Upon discovery of the forgeries, the employee was arrested on September 17, and thereafter placed on probation. The employee had made partial restitution through the probation officer to the extent of $443.50 after being re-employed by plaintiffs. On the trial, plaintiffs sought judgment against defendant bank for the unpaid balance of $741.50 on the checks forged during the month of August.

[1] The testimony offered in the trial court was brief and rather unsatisfactory in its details as hereinafter pointed out, but neither in the trial court nor on this appeal has the respondent bank questioned the sufficiency of the evidence to show the payment by the bank from appellants' account of a number of forged checks and the bank's refusal upon demand to pay to appellants the unpaid balance of $741.50 represented by the forged checks. We believe such evidence was sufficient to make a prima facie case. Respondent at all times relied upon certain defenses set forth in its answer. In support of the ruling of the trial court in granting the motion for nonsuit, respondent apparently takes the position that such defenses were established as a matter of law by the testimony adduced during the examination of the witnesses for appellants.

Before discussing respondent's contentions upon which it urges that the judgment should be affirmed, certain further observations should be made regarding the state of the evidence bearing upon these contentions. It appears that on August 3 the bank delivered to plaintiffs a monthly statement purporting to cover the July transactions and accompanied by checks for July. Neither this statement nor any other statement of account between the parties was introduced in evidence, and we are unable to ascertain the contents of the statements. Again, confusion exists in the transcript where reference is made to the monthly statements. For example, we are unable to ascertain in many instances whether the words "August statement" refer to the statement delivered in August purporting to cover July transactions or to the statement subsequently delivered in September purporting to cover August transactions. In any event, a statement was delivered to plaintiffs on August 3, and another statement was delivered in September. The exact time of delivery of the statement in September does not appear, but it was conceded that the statement was delivered before September 10. What was referred to as the "August statement" was exhibited to plaintiff Sommer upon cross-examination, and counsel purported to read the following notice from the statement: "Please examine at once. If no error is reported in ten days the account will be considered correct." The witness, in response to questions, replied that he had never noticed this provision on any of the monthly statements. It is questionable whether there is any evidence in the record to prove that this provision was contained on any of the monthly statements, but counsel on both sides assume in their briefs that the "August statement" above referred to was the statement delivered on August 3, and that this statement contained such a provision. Plaintiffs did not examine this statement until the latter part of August, at which time they notified the bank that there was something wrong with the statement. After receiving the statement in September, plaintiffs examined both statements and ascertained that there were fewer checks than there were debit items and notified the bank that checks had been forged. This notice was given about the middle of September, near the time of the arrest of the employee on September 17. It does not affirmatively appear, but respondent assumes that the forged checks were destroyed by the employee guilty of the forgeries. Upon discovering that the checks had been forged, plaintiffs employed a bookkeeper and later a certified public accountant for the purpose of ascertaining the exact amount of the shortage due to the forgeries, and thereafter gave the bank a definite statement. None of the forged checks were introduced in evidence and the record does not disclose the dates upon which the checks were forged or paid by the bank.

[2, 3] Respondent's first contention is that "the account became an account stated weeks before the bank was notified of the forgeries." Passing the question of the insufficiency of the evidence to show the contents of the monthly statements of account, we will assume that such statements showed all debit and credit items for the previous months including debits of the forged checks and that the balance shown was incorrect in the amount represented by the forged checks. In support of its contention, respondent calls attention to the general rule that it is the duty of the depositor to examine his statements and vouchers and report any error within a reasonable time failing in which duty the account as rendered becomes an account stated as between the bank and the depositor. We are of the opinion, however, that the account in controversy had not become an account stated under the facts in the present case. The account in controversy is the account relating to the August transactions, the statement of which account was received some time in September, and it cannot be said that plaintiffs failed to report the forgeries to the bank within a reasonable time after a receipt of this statement. Respondent further calls attention to the "ten-day provision" contained in the statement delivered to plaintiffs on August 3. This statement covering the July transactions cannot be made the basis of an account stated with respect to the August transactions. Furthermore, such a provision in a bank statement cannot be relied upon unless it appears that such provision has been called to the attention of the depositor. Los Angeles Investment Company v. Home Savings Bank of Los Angeles, 180 Cal. 601, 614, 182 P. 293, 5 A. L. R. 1193.

[4-6] Respondent next contends that "the plaintiff partners failed in their duty of inspection of the cancelled vouchers and statement furnished on August 3, 1928, and their negligence proximately caused the successful negotiation of the checks forged in August and sued upon herein, they in reality approving and ratifying the acts of their agent, the forger." There are several answers to this contention. Under the circumstances disclosed by the evidence, we believe that the questions of whether plaintiffs were negligent in not sooner examining the statement of August 3, and reporting the forgeries was a question of fact to be determined by the jury under proper instructions and not a question of law. Even assuming that plaintiffs were negligent in this regard, there was no evidence from which it appeared that such negligence proximately caused the successful negotiation of the checks cashed in the month of August. No evidence is found in the record to show when the August checks were cashed, and, for aught that appears, all the August checks may have been cashed prior to the receipt of the statement of August 3. A further answer to this contention is that the defense of negligence on the part of a depositor is available to the bank only where it appears the bank itself is free from negligence. Glassell Development Company v. Citizens' National Bank of Los Angeles, 191 Cal. 375, 216 P. 1012, 28 A. L. R. 1427; Union Tool Company v. Farmers' & Merchants' National Bank of Los Angeles, 192 Cal. 40, 218 P. 424, 28 A. L. R. 1417. The authorities on this subject are very extensively discussed in the foregoing cases. In the case of Glassell Development Company v. Citizens' National Bank of Los Angeles, supra, the court said, on page 380 of 191 Cal., 216 P. 1012, 1014, of the opinion:

"And the weight of authority, and perhaps of reason, supports the view that when a depositor's passbook has been written up and returned to him with canceled checks which have been charged to his account, it is his duty to examine such checks within a reasonable time, and if they disclose forgeries or alterations to report them to the bank, failing in which he cannot, if his failure results in detriment to the bank, dispute the correctness of payments thereafter made by it on similar checks. * * *

"This rule, however, assumes that the bank itself has not been guilty of negligence in making the payment, for when by the exercise of proper care it could have discovered the alteration or forgery, it must bear the loss notwithstanding that the depositor failed in his duty to examine the accounts."

In the Union Tool Company v. Farmers' & Merchants' National Bank of Los Angeles, supra, the court said, on page 48 of 192 Cal., 218 P. 424, 427: "In Leather Manufacturers' Bank v. Morgan, 117 U. S. 96, 29 L. Ed. 811, 6 S. Ct. 657 [see, also, Rose's U. S. Notes], it is said that—'Of course, if the defendant's officers, * * * could by proper care and skill have detected the forgeries, then it cannot receive a credit for the amount of those checks, even if the depositor omitted all examination of his account.' In another case (Morgan v. United States Mortgage & Trust Co., 208 N. Y. 218, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 462, L. R. A. 1915D, 741, 101 N. E. 871) it is said: 'It is, however, permitted to a bank to escape liability for repayment of amounts paid out on forged checks by establishing that the depositor has been guilty of negligence which contributed to such payments and that it has been free from any negligence.'"

[7, 8] The defense of negligence is an affirmative defense. When the depositor makes out a prima facie case by showing that the bank has made payment from his account on forged checks and has refused upon demand to pay the sum represented by the forged checks, the burden is not upon the depositor to show that the bank was negligent in cashing the checks and that he was free from negligence. The burden is then upon the bank to show by way of defense that the depositor was negligent and that the bank was free from negligence. It is conceivable that under certain circumstances both elements of such defense might appear as a matter of law from the testimony at the close of plaintiff's case, but that was not the situation here.

[9] Respondent further contends that "where one of two innocent parties must suffer, the principal employing a dishonest agent, should bear the loss rather than an equally innocent third party, in this instance, a bank." In this contention respondent proceeds upon the theory that the bank was an innocent party. Reliance is placed upon Otis Elevator Co. v. First National Bank, 163 Cal. 31, 124 P. 704, 41 L. R. A. (N. S.) 529. It is repeatedly pointed out in that decision that, under the circumstances disclosed by the evidence, the bank was an innocent party entirely free from negligence in the cashing of the checks involved. We do not believe that the principle laid down in that case should be extended to any case where it is not made to appear that the bank was free from negligence.

[10] From the defenses set forth in the pleadings and the grounds stated upon the motion for nonsuit in the trial court, it appeared that defendant placed reliance upon an alleged ratification of the forgeries by plaintiffs. This ratification is claimed upon the evidence which showed that plaintiffs had re-employed the employee after he was placed on probation and had accepted partial restitution from him through the probation office. Our attention has not been directed to any authority to sustain the proposition that such re-employment and acceptance of partial restitution would constitute a ratification precluding a claim by the depositor against the bank for the unpaid balance, and we find no reason for so holding.

As plaintiffs had made a prima facie case, and as it cannot be said as a matter of law that any defense had been established at the close of plaintiffs' case, the court erred in granting the motion for nonsuit.

The judgment is reversed.

Action by Joseph Williams against Louis Silverstein and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Reversed, with directions.

Edward J. Lynch, of San Francisco, for appellants.

E. B. Mering, of San Francisco, for respondents.

JORGENSEN, Justice pro tem.

This is an action on a complaint in six counts, based upon two promissory notes given to plaintiff as part of the purchase price of a lease to and furniture in an apartment house in the city of San Francisco. The notes are both negotiable in form, are for $500 each, and are identical, excepting that one was payable June 10, 1926, and the other September 10, 1926.

The first and second counts appeared to charge the defendants as joint makers with one Huber on the two notes. The third and fourth counts appear to charge them as accommodation indorsers for Huber, while the fifth and sixth counts seek to hold them as indorsers. Each of the notes contained a clause "we promise to pay," etc. (the "we" being written in with a typewriter), and were signed at the end by Lee Huber only and underneath his signature are two blank lines. On the back of each note appears the signature of:

"Louis Silverstein

"Louis Sanders."

The first paragraph of each count alleges that on the 10th day of March, 1926, the plaintiff entered into an agreement to sell to one Lee Huber and Isadore Silverstein a certain lease and furniture of an apartment house on Ellis street in San Francisco for $4,850; that, on the day the sale was to be consummated, this contract was modified "by agreeing to accept $1,200.00 in cash and the balance of $1,000.00 to be paid by a promissory note executed by Lee Huber, Louis Sanders and Louis Silverstein."

It appears from the evidence that Isadore Silverstein and Lee Huber, two taxicab drivers, were desirous of acquiring an apartment house as a side line. The defendant Louis Silverstein, who was a real estate agent and builder, was a brother of Isadore Silverstein. Defendant Sanders was engaged in farming and buying and selling country lands, with headquarters at Sacramento. Defendants, Louis Silverstein and Sanders, negotiated with plaintiff, who was in the real estate business and selling leases and apartment house furniture, and who owned an apartment house lease and furniture on Ellis street in San Francisco, for the sale of said lease and furniture, and agreed to pay the defendants a commission for making a sale.

On March 10, 1926, the date of the notes, the plaintiff met in the office of Judge Tyrrell, plaintiff's attorney, with Lee Huber and Isadore Silverstein, the alleged purchasers, together with the defendants, Louis Sanders and Louis Silverstein, who contended that they were acting merely as brokers in the transaction, and the note was signed by Lee Huber. Plaintiff's own testimony as to what transpired in the office of his attorney is highly illuminating, in view of his contention that defendants were makers.

He testified: "Sanders and Silverstein signed on the back of the notes. I said to Judge Tyrrell, 'How about these notes? Shouldn't these be comakers?' He said that they were just as responsible on the back of the note as if they were on the front of it. I took his word for it. He said, 'Whether they are makers or comakers or endorsers, they guarantee the payment of the note and what is on the back of it is the same as the ones on the front of it.' I said, 'He ought to be a comaker.'"

He testified further: "I said, 'Tyrrell, wouldn't it be possible to have a comaker on there—an endorser?' He said, 'It doesn't make any difference one is the same as the other.' He said, 'Don't put my brother on there and I won't go on there, and we will go on the back of it.' That is what he said, 'I don't want my brother to go on the front of it on the face of the note, but let Huber go on the face of it.' That is just exactly the remark he made. I saw the notes signed and endorsed and accepted them under the advice of my attorney. My attorney, Mr. Tyrrell, said, 'The notes or the endorsements on these notes, will hold these men and make them pay if the notes are properly endorsed.' Silverstein said 'We will endorse them on the back.' I said, 'All right,' so he put Huber on the face and he and Sanders went on the back."

The attorney also drew up an escrow agreement under which plaintiff's attorney, John R.

Tyrrell, was made an escrow holder, which reads as follows:

"San Francisco, March 10th, 1926.

"John R. Tyrrell, No. 995 Market Street, San Francisco.

"My Dear Sir: Enclosed herewith we hand you agreement for the sale of the rooming house, designated as No. 1622-1664 Ellis Street, San Francisco, which agreement was executed between Theodore Kupper, as the party of the first part, and A. G. Rehnstrom and A. Johansson as party of the second part, and thereafter assigned by the latter to Joseph Williams, and thereafter by the said Joseph Williams assigned to Lee Huber.

"The condition of the agreement calls for a payment of forty-eight hundred and fifty ($4,850) dollars, less an incumbrance of twenty-five hundred ($2,500.00) dollars. Of this amount thirteen hundred and fifty ($1,350.00) dollars has been paid, receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, and the further sum of one thousand ($1,000) dollars is to be paid as follows: Five hundred ($500) dollars on or before the 10th day of June, 1926, and five hundred ($500.00) dollars on or before the 10th day of September, 1926, according to the terms of the promissory note, covering said sum.

"There is also deposited with you a lease upon the said premises covering a period of five (5) years from April 1st, 1926, running in favor of Lee Huber.

"These documents you are instructed to hold as escrow holder until Lee Huber shall have paid to you the sum of ten hundred ($1,000) dollars and interest, according to the terms of the promissory note, and when such sum has been paid in full with interest you are authorized and directed to deliver to him the said lease and your services as escrow holder will then be terminated.

"Lee Huber,

"Louis Silverstein,

"Jos. Williams."

The taxicab drivers lost money in the apartment house business. The notes were not paid, and plaintiff brought a previous action seeking to hold Huber as maker and these defendants as indorsers, but these defendants were granted a nonsuit in that action because plaintiff had not made proper presentment of the notes and notice of dishonor had not been given to these defendants as indorsers.

The findings in the case were to the effect that defendants executed said note as joint makers and that plaintiff had agreed to sell the apartment house lease and furniture to defendants, Louis Sanders and Louis Silverstein. Neither of these findings are supported by the evidence.

[1] The evidence affirmatively shows that the defendants signed as indorsers and that the plaintiff accepted the notes with that understanding on the advice of his attorney. Not only his own testimony, but the testimony of the defendants are all to that effect. The plaintiff by his own acts subsequent to the execution of the notes showed that was his understanding by causing a notice of dishonor to be sent on one of the notes to one of the defendants as indorser and by instituting his first suit against them as indorsers, and there is no evidence in the record worthy of the name to show that the defendants ever signed in any other capacity.

[2] The finding to the effect that plaintiff entered into a written agreement with both the defendants, Louis Sanders and Louis Silverstein, to sell this apartment house and furniture cannot be sustained on any theory. The verified complaint alleges that plaintiff entered into a contract to sell this apartment house and furniture to Lee Huber and Isadore Silverstein. The answer admits this allegation. There was, therefore, no issue before the court as to the parties to the agreement of sale. No amendment of the complaint was even suggested. There is no written agreement between the parties in evidence to this effect or even suggesting it. The only thing upon which the court could possibly base such a finding is the escrow agreement set forth above. It certainly cannot be sustained as such an agreement. It was not signed at all by the defendant Sanders, and was signed by Silverstein, as he testified, as a matter of form as the broker in the transaction, or, as plaintiff's attorney testified, he signed more as a guarantor than as a principal. The escrow agreement shows on its face that the sale was made to Huber, and provided that the notes were to be signed by Huber and the lease was to be made out to Huber, and referred to an assignment of sale contract from the plaintiff to Huber.

[3-5] Respondents contend that the notes were nonnegotiable, and therefore defendant became liable as guarantors. At the time the notes were executed, the escrow agreement was also executed, and provided that the lease should be delivered upon the payment of the notes. It is true that a negotiable instrument may be rendered nonnegotiable where it is intended to incorporate the terms of a separate agreement with the instrument itself if the terms of the whole agreement are incompatible with negotiability. 19 Cal. Jur. p. 811. But even though the agreement be written upon the same paper that the note is written on, where it is evident that it was not intended to incorporate the terms of the agreement within the note itself, the transferability and negotiability of the note will not be affected by the agreement. Pitman v. Walker, 187 Cal. at page 671, 203 P. 739. The notes here do not refer to the escrow agreement, but contain an absolute and unconditional promise to pay at a certain time. But, considering together the notes and the escrow agreement as constituting one transaction, we do not discover an intention to make the payment dependent upon any contingency. The escrow agreement is in no way incompatible with the terms of the notes, nor does it purport to change, limit, or modify the provisions of the notes. On the other hand, it provides that the payment is to be made in accordance with the notes.

[6] The evidence in this case clearly shows, and the fact is undisputed, that proper presentment of the notes had not been made and notice of dishonor had not been given so as to hold defendants as indorsers of negotiable paper. It is true that notice of dishonor was sent to the defendant Sanders as indorser of the first note, but was sent five or six days after it became due, and it was therefore too late. Sections 3170 and 3184, Civ. Code.

[7] The court, over the objections of defendants, admitted oral evidence of conversations between certain of the parties which took place prior to and contemporaneous with the execution of these notes and the escrow agreement, and which tended to vary, modify, and change the terms thereof. This was prejudicial error.

[8] The general rule that proof of contemporaneous parol declarations and agreements is inadmissible to contradict, vary, or alter the terms of a written contract is applicable to an attempt to prove a prior or contemporaneous parol agreement or declaration to affect the terms of a bill or note where the bill or note is not uncertain, doubtful, or ambiguous. Uniform Laws, Annotated, vol. 5, p. 28; Citizens' Bank of Los Angeles v. Jones, 121 Cal. 32, 53 P. 354; Quatman v. Superior Court, 64 Cal. App. at page 208, 221 P. 666. If the defendants in this case had signed the note on its face below the signature of Huber, could it be said that they might show by parol evidence they signed as indorsers only? The answer is obvious. Such evidence is not admissible, whether the note be negotiable or nonnegotiable. Lindemann v. Coryell, 59 Cal. App. 788, 212 P. 47. If this were not the rule, it would lead to chaos in all business transactions.

[9] The mere fact that the notes contained the words "we promise to pay" has no significance, even though signed by only one maker, with two blank lines below his signature, in view of the state of the record in this case. The words "we promise to pay" cannot be held to include indorsers or other parties whose names are not signed as makers. Hobson v. Hassett, 76 Cal. 203, 18 P. 320, 9 Am. St. Rep. 193; Bean v. Pioneer Mining Co., 66 Cal. 451, 6 P. 86, 56 Am. Rep. 106; Farmers', etc., Bank v. Colby, 64 Cal. 352, 28 P. 118; Whitmore v. Nickerson et al., 125 Mass. 496, 28 Am. Rep. 257.

We have considered the other points urged by appellants in their brief, but, in view of the foregoing opinion, it is unnecessary to discuss them.

In view of the fact that defendants can only be held as indorsers, and proper notice of dishonor has not been given them as such, and there can be no possibility of holding defendants liable on another trial, the judgment is reversed with direction to the lower court to enter judgment in favor of defendants.

Sale and assignment of leases on fruit lands held not "cancellation" of leases with-in mortgage marketing contracts.

Mortgage marketing contracts between landowner and fruit exchange which made advances to landowner provided that, on sale of property or cancellation of leases and payment of proportionate amount of indebtedness for advances, exchange would release its mortgage lien on acreage sold or leases canceled. The word "cancellation" is a common and ordinary one having plain and well-defined meaning, and there was no evidence that it was used in any other than usual sense. To "cancel" a contract means doing away with it; to blot out or obliterate; to annul; to revoke.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Cancel; Cancellation," see Words and Phrases.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Placer County; J. B. Landis, Judge.

Action by the Pacific Fruit Exchange, a corporation, against F. W. Barkhaus and wife. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals.

SHIELDS, Justice pro tem.

On and before the 8th day of February, 1927, F. W. Barkhaus and his wife, Amanda, were farmers in Placer county, owning a large orchard and holding under lease from three different parties additional orchard tracts. They were engaged in the business of growing and selling fruits of various kinds on and from these orchards. The Pacific Fruit Exchange was a corporation engaged, among other things, in loaning money to fruit growers, and in the sale of fruits upon commission. On this date the above parties entered into an agreement by which the Pacific Fruit Exchange was to advance large sums of money to F. W. Barkhaus and his wife, Amanda A. Barkhaus, hereafter referred to as the defendants, to enable them to care for and cultivate their orchards and to prepare the crops of fruit grown thereon for market. These advances were to apply to the crops of 1927, 1928, and 1929, for each of which years certain sums of money were to be advanced. In consideration of these advances, defendants, among other things, agreed to market all of their fruit to be grown upon all of the land owned by them and upon the three pieces of land held by them under lease, through the Pacific Fruit Exchange, and to pay them for making such sales certain commissions provided for in the agreement. To secure the repayment of the sums advanced and to further set out the agreement between the parties, they at that time and as part of the first agreement entered into a "mortgage marketing contract" to which further reference seems to be unnecessary.

The agreement first mentioned provided "that should the first parties (defendants) sell all or any portion of the orchards owned by them, hereinbefore mentioned, or cancel any of the leases on the orchards now farmed by the first parties, then and in that event, upon payment by first parties (defendants) to second parties of a proportionate amount of the indebtedness then owing from first parties to second party, second party agrees to release its mortgage lien on any of said acreage sold or lease cancelled." The parties proceeded under these agreements during the season of 1927 and for a portion of 1928, when on March 20, 1928, defendants notified plaintiff that they had sold their property and desired to pay their indebtedness and be released from their mortgage and marketing contract. It developed as a fact that the defendants had sold all of the land owned by them, and that they had assigned the leases covering the acreage mentioned in the marketing contract to the same purchaser. Plaintiff contended that while defendants were entitled to a release as to all lands owned by them, because such lands had been "sold" as provided in the contract, that they were not entitled to such discharge as to the lands held by them under lease, because none of such leases had been "cancelled," as was required by the contract. This is the only question in the case. Defendants paid the full amount of their indebtedness to the plaintiff, and plaintiff released them from their mortgage, reserving, however, their right to enforce the contracts in so far as they gave plaintiff the right to market the fruits grown on the leased property and obligated the defendants to purchase certain supplies from them. Defendants refused to recognize the further existence of the contracts, and upon their failure to permit the plaintiff to sell their fruit for the year 1928, and thus to earn a commission, or to purchase materials from plaintiff, or to engage plaintiff to load the fruit for transportation, all as provided in the contract, this action was begun.

It was stipulated that should the contract be held to be in effect, that the plaintiff would be entitled to recover $986.49 as damages for defendants' breach. At the trial the court held that the sale of the leases, and their assignment to the purchasers, constituted a "cancellation" of the leases as provided for in the contract and as is expressed in the portion of the contract above quoted. Judgment accordingly went for the defendants. This conclusion of the court we deem to have been erroneous.

It will be noted that the contract provided that upon the sale of the property owned by the defendants, or the cancellation of the leases held by them, and upon the payment of a proportionate amount of the indebtedness then owed by the defendants, the plaintiff was to "release its mortgage lien upon any of said acreage sold or lease cancelled."

It does not say that such sale, or cancellation and payment, should have any other effect. Specifically it does not provide that other portions of the marketing agreement should terminate, or that plaintiff's right to market the fruit, to load it, or to sell to the defendants necessary shipping materials should cease or end.

But the case was tried on the theory that the whole claim of the plaintiffs depended upon whether or not the leases held by defendants had been cancelled. We will so consider it. We do not think that they were canceled; canceled in fact, or as that term is used in the contract. Plausible theories may be advanced as to why the parties might have used the word "cancel" in some special or different sense. But such theories are merely speculative. The word is a common and ordinary one, having a plain and well-defined meaning. There was no evidence before the court to show that it was used in any other than its usual sense. None would have been permissible. There was nothing in the context which suggests an unusual meaning.

To "cancel" a contract means "doing away with" it. Winton v. Spring, 18 Cal. 451. "To 'cancel' a contract means to abrogate so much of it as remains unperformed." Young v. Flickinger, 75 Cal. App. 171, 242 P. 516, 517. To cancel is defined "to blot out or obliterate * * * to annul, * * * to revoke, to do away with." 9 Corpus Juris. 1153. "The words used by the parties 'canceled as of June 28, 1923,' are not ambiguous, and should be given their ordinary and common meaning. 'Cancel' means to annul or destroy; to make void; to set aside; as to cancel a debt or engagement." Irwin v. State Brokerage Co., 82 Ind. App. 687, 147 N. E. 531, 532; Toland v. Toland, 123 Cal. 140, 55 P. 681. In this case the leases were not terminated, set aside, made void, or annulled. They were in full force and effect. They were sold as living things, rather than blotted out and ended. Their sale and assignment by the defendants who still remained parties to them, with a subsisting contingent liability under them, did not amount to their cancellation, as provided for in the agreement. As a consequence the agreement in the particulars sued upon remained in force, and the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

The judgment is reversed, and the trial court directed to enter judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the amount of the stipulated damages.

All concur.

When Legislature has made exceptions to general rule, it must be deemed to have included therein all that it intended to except.

Original application by J. B. Rothschild for a writ of mandate prayed to be directed to the Superior Court in and for the City and County of San Francisco, Isidore Harris, Judge, to compel a witness to testify.

Writ denied, and proceedings dismissed.

Robert B. Gaylord, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

William S. Bayless, of San Francisco, for respondents.

NOURSE, P. J.

Petitioner seeks an original writ of mandamus to compel Naomi Roloff to be sworn and to testify as a witness upon the taking of her deposition in an action pending in said court.

Arnold R. Roloff sued petitioner for damages for personal injuries resulting from a fall from a ladder on premises leased from petitioner. Pending the trial of the action petitioner sought to take the deposition of plain-tiff's wife, Naomi Roloff. She refused to testify on the ground that she was excused under the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 1881, Code of Civil Procedure. The material provisions of this section read: "A husband can not be examined for or against his wife without her consent; nor a wife for or against her husband, without his consent; nor can either, during the marriage or afterward, be, without the consent of the other, examined, as to any communication made by one to the other during the marriage."

[1] Under the plain wording of the section it is manifest that if the husband is the sole party in interest in an action his wife may not be called to testify for or against him without his consent. Petitioner seeks to avoid this exemption on the ground that in the action here pending the wife has a present and existing interest because any judgment recovered by the husband would be the community property of the two spouses, and the wife, therefore, becomes a "person for whose immediate benefit" the action is prosecuted and hence one whose deposition may be taken under section 2021, Code of Civil Procedure.

[2] It may be conceded that, since the addition of section 161a, Civil Code, the wife has a "present, existing, and equal interest" in the community property with the husband. It may also be conceded that any recovery for personal injuries to either spouse sustained during coverture, as well as the chose in action to enforce recovery, is community property. McFadden v. Santa Ana, etc., Ry. Co., 87 Cal. 464, 468, 25 P. 681, 11 L. R. A. 252. Therefore, under the provisions of section 2021, Code of Civil Procedure, the wife is a "person for whose immediate benefit" the action is prosecuted when that action is one to enforce this community right to damages.

[3-7] Thus, under the general provisions of section 2021, Code of Civil Procedure, relating to depositions, and under the general provisions of section 2055, Code of Civil Procedure, relating to the calling of adverse witnesses, the wife, in a suit of this character, is a proper and competent witness. But the provisions of section 1881, Code of Civil Procedure, above quoted, are special and must be read as exceptions to these general rules relating to the competency of witnesses. When, therefore, a wife is called as a witness, she may not be examined without the consent of her husband in any matter which is "for or against" him. This does not mean that the consent of the husband must be had if he is, merely a nominal party plaintiff or defendant in an action in which in truth and fact the wife is the real party. Johnston v. St. Sure, 50 Cal. App. 735, 737, 195 P. 947. But in a suit involving community property the husband, as well as the wife, is a real party in interest, and, unless these interests are capable of segregation so that the testimony can be confined to the separate interest of the spouse called, the provisions of section 1881, Code of Civil Procedure, apply. It is difficult to conceive of a case involving the community property of both spouses where the testimony of one spouse would not be "for or against" the other; but we do not wish to be understood as holding that, if a case should arise where the testimony of one spouse could be confined to his or her own interest in the litigation, and would not be "for or against" the other spouse, such testimony would not be competent without the consent of the other spouse.

[8] We may add that we reach the views herein announced the more readily because we find that the remaining portions of section 1881, Code of Civil Procedure, contain many exceptions to this rule of privilege as between husband and wife, but do not include a case involving the community interests. Bearing in mind that the competency of witnesses in legal proceedings is a matter of legislative control, we must conclude that, if the Legislature had intended to except actions of this character, it would have included them with the proceedings listed in section 1881, Code of Civil Procedure, as exceptions to the general rule affecting the competency of husband and wife to testify. And we cannot overlook the well-settled principle that when the Legislature has made exceptions to a general rule it must be deemed to have included in its exceptions all that it intended to except.

The writ is denied, and proceedings dismissed.

Motion denied.

Frank H. Heskett and Stearns, Luce & Forward, all of San Diego, for the United States of Mexico.

Ward, Ward & Ward, of San Diego, and Sawyer & Cluff, of San Francisco, for respondent.

BARNARD, J.

This was an action for the recovery of the possession of a certain patrol boat then in the possession of the defendant. The action was filed by Heskett, Weinberger & Miller, attorneys, purportedly on behalf of the United States of Mexico, a sovereign nation, as plaintiff. Delivery of the patrol boat was claimed, and upon the giving of an undertaking in the usual form, executed by Independent Indemnity Company, a corporation, the boat was taken by the sheriff of San Diego county and delivered to the plaintiff. After a trial, judgment was ordered in favor of the defendant for the return of the boat, or, if the same could not be had, for the sum of $12,961.61 (the value thereof), plus $463.62 as damages for its taking, and costs of suit. Motion for a new trial was denied on June 23, 1930, and on July 2, 1930, notice of appeal was filed, signed by Frank H. Heskett, one of the attorneys representing the plaintiff at the trial.

Notice of a motion to dismiss this appeal was filed by the respondent upon the grounds that the notice of appeal was filed without the consent, authority, direction, or approval of the plaintiff, and that no appeal was in fact taken within the time allowed by law. In support of the motion is filed the affidavit of one of the attorneys for respondent, in which he deposes upon information and belief that the appeal was taken without the consent, authority, direction, or approval of the plaintiff; that the said Frank H. Heskett is conducting said purported appeal at the request of the Independent Indemnity Company; that the source-es of his information and belief are certain statements alleged to have been made by one of the attorneys for the indemnity company to another one of the attorneys for respondent, and by him related to the affiant; that when the action came on for trial, the said Heskett, expressed doubt of his authority to proceed, and requested time in which to communicate with Mexican government officials in regard thereto, which request was refused by the court; and that when the motion for a new trial came on for hearing, the affiant's informant asked Heskett if he had received authority from the Mexican government, to which Heskett replied: "Well, I am here, am I not?" It is then alleged on information and belief that said reply of Heskett was evasive, and that, in truth, and in fact, the said Heskett had been informed by officials of the Mexican government that he had no such authority. As the source of this last information and belief, there is set forth a copy of a letter which, on June 21, 1930, was filed in the office of the clerk of the trial court, purporting to be signed by one E. Ferreira, as consul of Mexico at San Diego, Cal., protesting against the execution of the judgment in this action, for the reason "that such litigation was not authorized by the proper authorities of Mexico, and the further reason that, as I am informed, under international law, a sovereign government may not be condemned by judicial authority of a state." Another affidavit was filed by one of the other attorneys for the respondent, setting forth a conversation with an agent for the Independent Indemnity Company, in which this agent stated he understood the Mexican government intended to appeal the case, and, if it did not do so, someone else would; and, further, a conversation with Heskett, in which Heskett, upon being asked as to his authority, replied that he was not sure of his authority, but that Edgar Luce, one of the attorneys for the Indemnity Company, had told him to proceed with the appeal. On behalf of the appellant was filed an affidavit by Frank H. Heskett, stating he was retained and authorized to bring this action by J. L. Sepulveda, who, according to his information and belief, was at that time fish and game commissioner of the Pacific for the United States of Mexico, under the department of agriculture of that country; that as such fish and game commissioner and sole representative of said department of agriculture at San Diego, the said Sepulveda had authority to institute the action; that the said J. L. Sepulveda, in verifying the complaint, set forth therein that he was authorized so to do; that after the complaint was filed there was a change of administration in the United States of Mexico, by virtue of which the said Sepulveda was superseded by another as said fish and game commissioner; that there was also a change in the personnel of the office of secretary of agriculture of Mexico; that the successor of Sepulveda neither withdrew from affiant any authority theretofore given, nor gave him any instructions or directions whatsoever; that after judgment adverse to the plaintiff was entered, affiant communicated that fact to the new fish and game commissioner and to the Mexican consul in San Diego, Mr. Ferreira, and that the said Mexican consul referred affiant to Fred W. Noon, an attorney of San Diego, as the representative of the Mexican government in connection with the said case; that at the suggestion of said Fred W. Noon affiant filed a motion for a new trial in said action; that later the said Fred W. Noon authorized and directed affiant to take the necessary steps to effect an appeal in the action, and that this action was taken immediately thereafter; that the said J. L. Sepulveda at the time he authorized affiant to bring this action, authorized him to take all necessary proceedings to protect the interests of the United States of Mexico and to prevent any final judgment being rendered against said government; that affiant has received no authority or directions to withdraw from said case or to permit the said judgment to become final; and that he has not been directed by any person to refrain from filing a notice of appeal. Further affidavits were filed in behalf of appellant, which it is not necessary to consider here.

The earlier cases in California seem to hold that the authority of an attorney to take an appeal may not be questioned by a respondent. In Board of Commissioners v. Younger, 29 Cal. 147, 87 Am. Dec. 164, it is stated that, so long as an attorney remains the attorney of record, his right to manage and control the action cannot be questioned, and that whether he has exceeded his authority in taking an appeal is a question between him and his clients, which is no concern of the defendant.

In Woodbury v. Nevada, etc., Ry. Co., 120 Cal. 367, 52 P. 650, the court said: "When the notice of appeal from a judgment is signed by an attorney of this court, he will be presumed to have had authority from the appellant; and, unless the appellant himself objects to the prosecution of the appeal, it will not be dismissed at the motion of the respondent, upon the ground that it is prosecuted against the will of the appellant. The court will not pass upon the weight or sufficiency of conflicting affidavits for the purpose of determining whether the appellant desires the appeal to be dismissed." In that case the court refers to certain remarks by Mr. Justice McFarland on a previous hearing of the same case, as reported in 115 Cal. at page 87, 46 P. 862, as follows: "The motions were submitted here upon ex parte affidavits, which is a very unsatisfactory method of presenting issues which involve important rights and large property interests. If these motions should be granted, some of the parties would be forever precluded from raising in any form questions which they seek to have decided on the appeal sought to be dismissed, and which involve large sums of money. Evidently, therefore, the motions should not be granted unless the showing made by the moving parties is strong and clear, and the showing made is not of that character. There are a number of affidavits made on behalf of each of the contesting parties, and they are sharply conflicting. It would be useless to state here the contents of the various affidavits. It is sufficient to say that the evidence which they furnish, considered as a whole, does not affirmatively establish the alleged facts upon which the motions are based. * * *

In all cases since that time the decision has rested upon the sufficiency of the showing made to overcome the presumption of authority, rather than upon the inability of the respondent to raise the point. In Parkside Realty Co. v. MacDonald, 167 Cal. 342, 139 P. 805, it was held that, while it is presumed that an attorney appearing and acting for a party has been authorized so to do, the question whether or not such attorney was, in fact, authorized to take an appeal, is one to be determined by the court to which the appeal was taken.

In Title Ins., etc., Co. v. California, etc., Co., 168 Cal. 397, 143 P. 723, 724, the court used the following language: "The fact that an attorney appears on behalf of a party raises a presumption of 'authority upon his part to do so.' Garrison v. McGowan, 48 Cal. 592. But this presumption is disputable, and where it is clearly shown, as it is here, that the attorney was not authorized, the party whom he assumed to represent can found no rights upon the unauthorized act." In that particular case the facts showed clearly that the attorneys purporting to take the appeal had no such authority, which fact was not even questioned by the attorneys then representing the appellant. Practically the same language is again used in the case of Sullivan v. Dunne, 198 Cal. at page 190, 244 P. 343. In that case it was clearly shown that the attorney attempting to take an appeal had no authority to act in the case at all, the affidavits filed in his behalf not even creating a conflict in this regard.

[1, 2] While, as held in the later cases, the authority of an attorney to take an appeal may be questioned by a respondent, the rule is firmly established that the presumption that an attorney of record has authority to take an appeal will prevail in the absence of a clear and satisfactory showing that such authority is lacking.

[3] This being the rule, we think the showing here made is not sufficiently clear and satisfactory to overcome the presumption referred to. Not only are the affidavits conflicting, but the principal affidavit for respondent was made upon information and belief, and is largely hearsay. While the other affidavit states that the agent and attorney for the indemnity company interested themselves in the appeal, that fact is not conclusive. While the letter from the consul of Mexico at San Diego stated that the litigation was not authorized by the proper authorities, the other official of Mexico at San Diego stated in his verification that he had such authority. The affidavit of Heskett shows an original authority to bring the action which has not been discredited, except by surmise and doubt. He was authorized to bring the suit by an official of the Mexican government. While the authority of this official, in turn, has been questioned, it has not been clearly shown that he acted beyond his power. And nothing appears to show that any authority originally given to the attorney has been withdrawn. The proof relied upon by respondent is not of such a satisfactory and clear nature as to warrant a dismissal of the appeal.

A further consideration is that the real attack of the respondent is not merely upon the authority of this attorney to appeal from the judgment entered in this action, but is upon his original authority to file the action. It would appear from the showing made on this motion that the question as to the original authority of this attorney may be one of the questions to be determined upon a hearing of this appeal on its merits, and that the same goes more to the merits of the appeal than to the decision of this preliminary motion. It would appear from respondent's affidavits that, if he is correct in his contention, the judgment should be reversed, as, in that event, the plaintiff, a sovereign foreign government, has never submitted itself to the jurisdiction of the trial court.

[4] A still further consideration is that the record, presented by respondent in support of his motion, conclusively shows that the facts argued as showing lack of authority on the part of appellant's attorney go to the proposition that he never had authority to file the action or prosecute the same in the trial court, while the respondent desires to maintain the judgment against the plaintiff there obtained. Even though a respondent may question the authority of an attorney to take an appeal, we think he may not at the same time rely upon an original authority to file the action, in support of a judgment in his favor, and attack that same authority to proceed with an appeal, unless there be a clear and satisfactory showing that a change in authority has taken place after the entry of judgment.

For the reasons given, the motion to dismiss the appeal is denied.

[1] This is an action for personal injuries. The cause was tried by the court without a jury. Judgment was entered in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals therefrom. At the time of the accident out of which this cause arose, the plaintiff was a boy of 7 years of age. The action is brought by his father, who was appointed his guardian ad litem. Complaint is made that the findings of the court are not sustained by the evidence. It is alleged in the second amended complaint that on January 2, 1927, the defendant was the owner of a vicious horse which he knew to be vicious and ferocious and which he carelessly and negligently permitted to run at large in the city of San Carlos; that on said day while so at large said horse kicked the plaintiff in the face, inflicting serious injuries. These allegations are denied by the answer. The court found that the defendant was not the owner of a vicious horse, or that the horse mentioned in the said complaint was or is a vicious animal; that it is not true that defendant negligently or otherwise permitted said horse to go at large without being securely guarded or otherwise; that it is not true that on January 2, 1927, said horse was at large and not securely guarded and confined; that it is not true that said horse on the last-mentioned day or at any time, kicked or wounded or inflicted any injuries upon plaintiff as set forth in the complaint or otherwise, or that plaintiff was damaged in any sum whatever through any fault or act of the defendant. Counsel for plaintiff sets forth in his brief such evidence as he believes sustains the allegations of the complaint. However, if there is any substantial evidence to sustain the findings of the trial court, this court may not interfere. Estate of Wall, 183 Cal. 431, 191 P. 687; 20 Cal. Jur. p. 27, § 13.

[2] There is no evidence that the horse was vicious. The evidence of defendant and other witnesses was to the effect that the horse was about 25 years old, "broken down," and one with whom children had frequently played, "lifted his feet," and "pulled his tail." The court also found that it was not true that on January 2, 1927, said horse was at large and not securely confined; that it was not true that said horse on the day last mentioned, or at any other time, kicked or wounded the plaintiff. There was no evidence of any eyewitness to the accident; even the child did not undertake to identify the horse. He kept repeating that it was "the horse." The defendant testified that he did not allow the horse to run at large; that on the day of the accident he put his horse in his own pasture about 7 a. m. and tied the gate to the pasture with a rope he kept for that purpose, tying it with a knot that he always used; that about 5 p. m. he took the horse from the pasture and the gate was still tied as he had left it in the morning. The evidence also discloses that the fence was well built. It also appears from the evidence that at different times there were other horses at large in the vicinity of the accident, although there was no one who testified that there were any other horses there the day of the accident. We think that the foregoing evidence sustains the findings of the trial court.

[3, 4] It is next contended that the court erred in denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial. The motion was made on the ground of newly discovered evidence which could not with reasonable diligence have been produced at the trial. Counsel for the appellant admits that the granting of a new trial on the ground above stated rests largely in the discretion of the trial court, and may only be disturbed for an abuse of such discretion. 20 Cal. Jur. § 58, p. 81, and cases there cited. Three affidavits were presented in support of the motion for a new trial—that of one John Marks, whose principal statement is to the effect that he had seen the horse owned by the defendant running at large on the day of the accident between the hours of 10 a. m. and 12 m.; the affidavit of Thomas Carlisle, who says he saw the horse belonging to the defendant kick the child in the face; the affidavit of Frank J. Appel, that he was told by Louis Hess, one of the witnesses for defendant, that the testimony he gave in favor of defendant was false and that he had been paid for it by the defendant. We have read all the affidavits in opposition to the motion, and every material allegation of the affidavits of said Marks, Carlisle, and Appel is denied by said counter affidavits. The rule that the decision of a motion for a new trial rests largely in the sound discretion of the trial court applies with full force to a motion on the ground of newly discovered evidence. 20 Cal. Jur. § 58, p. 81; Waer v. Waer, 189 Cal. 178, 207 P. 891. The principal reason for this is that the trial judge is generally in a much better position to determine the value and effect of the evidence. Accordingly, the decision of a lower court on motion for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence is rarely interfered with, or where every material fact is contradicted by counter affidavits. 20 Cal. Jur. § 58, pp. 81, 82, and 83. We are of the opinion that there is no merit in either question raised by the appellant.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Damages ⇨132(3).

$2,000 to man 56 years old, for injuries to nose, upper lip, eyes, ninth rib, right index finger, sprained wrist, and shock to nervous system, held not excessive.

2. Damages ⇨158(2).

In personal injury action, testimony showing plaintiff's blood pressure held admissible under allegation of "severe shock to entire system."

3. Appeal and error ⇨1064(2).

Instruction authorizing jury to consider speed of automobiles when colliding, weight and size, plaintiff's position, and other circumstances in determining damage, held not prejudicial as assuming facts.

Instruction authorized jury in determining extent of plaintiff's damage to consider speed of automobiles at moment of impact, weight and size of each, position in which plaintiff was sitting, and in fact every relevant circumstance concerning collision for purpose of showing force and manner in which plaintiff was struck and the injuries, together with the shock to his physical and nervous system, resulting therefrom. Undisputed evidence showed that plaintiff sustained injuries and shock.

4. Appeal and error ⇨1064(1).

Instruction authorizing jury, in determining plaintiff's damages in automobile collision, to consider plaintiff's age and condition of life, held not prejudicial.

5. Appeal and error ⇨1064(1).

Instruction on measure of future damages as result of automobile collision, though improper, held not prejudicial (Civ. Code, § 3283).

Instruction, in substance, authorized jury to award damages for injuries sustained at time of collision, if any, together with the injuries sustained, if any, which would be sustained in the future as the direct effect of such injuries, if any. Civ. Code, § 3283, limits future damages to such as are reasonably certain to result in the future.

Butler, Van Dyke, Desmond & Harris, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Mr. Presiding Justice FINCH delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an action for damages on account of injuries received by the plaintiff in a collision between his automobile and that of the defendant. The defendant expressly admitted negligence, and the only question left for the jury to determine was the amount of damages to be awarded the plaintiff. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $2,000, and the defendant has appealed.

[1] The first point made by the appellant is that the verdict is so grossly excessive as to require this court to set it aside.

The plaintiff was rendered unconscious for a time from his injuries; he was 56 years old at the time; his attending physician testified that the plaintiff's physical condition before the accident was good; that in the accident he suffered a bruised condition of the nose and a tear in the skin thereof, although the bridge of the nose was not broken; that his upper lip was lacerated requiring two stitches; that both eyes were blackened and swollen; that the conditions named lasted for 10 or 12 days; that plaintiff's ninth rib on the right side was broken; that "it takes a broken rib about eight weeks to get over the pain"; that the plaintiff still suffers some pain from the broken rib when he stoops over; that he suffered a small tear in the right index finger, a piece of the skin being "torn clear off"; that he had a sprained wrist; that his left shin bone was bruised, leaving a permanent thickness of the bone; that the impact on the shin "might have destroyed the sense of the skin nerves"; that the plaintiff was suffering from shock and injury to the nervous system; that a "nervous condition persists for a long time"; that the plaintiff still complains of being nervous; that nervousness would be a normal result from the shock.

The plaintiff testified that he has no feeling at the place of injury to his shin; that he could stick a pin in that place without feeling it, that the bone there is sore; that the broken rib is still painful in certain positions; that he feels pain and soreness in lifting; that the injury caused him to be away from his business for two weeks and partially incapacitated him for four weeks additional. He further testified: "My nerves are all gone * * * every now and again. * * * I am just all to pieces. * * * I will go home lots of times at night and I am all just to pieces * * * it seems as if every nerve in the pit of my stomach is just going like that (indicating with hands); it just kind of tears me to pieces * * * and I have headaches." It appears that the plaintiff paid out $74 for medical services and other expenses due to the accident. He testified that his services were worth $300 a month.

In view of the wide discretion given a jury in cases such as this, especially in the amount to be awarded for pain and suffering, it cannot be said as a matter of law that the amount of the verdict is grossly excessive.

[2] Appellant contends that it was error to admit testimony as to the plaintiff's blood pressure, on the ground that his blood pressure was not relevant to any issue made by the pleadings. However, it was alleged in the complaint that the plaintiff suffered "severe shock to entire system." Medical experts testified that such a shock may cause high blood pressure. It appears, therefore, that appellant's objection to the testimony was properly overruled.

[3] It is urged that the court committed prejudicial error in instructing the jury that "solely for the purpose of determining the extent of plaintiff's injuries and damage * * * you may consider the speed of the two cars at the moment of impact, the weight and size of each, the position in which plaintiff was sitting, and in fact every relevant circumstance concerning the collision, for the purpose of showing the force with which and the manner in which plaintiff was struck, and the injuries to plaintiff together with the shock to his physical and nervous system resulting therefrom."

It is complained that the instruction assumes that the plaintiff suffered injuries and shock. Ordinarily, such an instruction should not be given where the facts are in dispute, but, in this case, the uncontradicted evidence shows that the plaintiff did suffer injuries and shock. It appears, therefore, that no prejudice was suffered by the giving of the instruction.

[4] Another instruction of which appellant complains is as follows: "The defendant has admitted liability in this case, and you will, in assessing the damages of such plaintiff, if any you find, take into consideration his age and condition of life, the injuries sustained at the time, if any, together with the injuries sustained, if any, which you may believe from the evidence will be sustained in the future as the direct effect of such injuries, if any, together with all actual expenses to which plaintiff has been put and assess his damages at such sum as from the evidence you may deem proper, not exceeding in this case the sum of $5,333."

Appellant's first objection is to the statement in the instruction that the jury might take into consideration plaintiff's age and condition of life. Appellant contends that the term condition of life may have been understood by the jury to mean financial condition. From the connection in which the term is used, it reasonably appears that physical and not financial condition was meant, and the jury doubtless so understood it.

[5] It is also contended that the instruction is erroneous as to the question of future injuries, it being the rule that damages for injuries to be sustained in the future must be such as are certain to result. It may be conceded that the instruction is not accurate in the respect last mentioned, section 3283 of the Civil Code limiting future damages to such as are reasonably "certain to result in the future." For reasons, however, similar to those stated in Burk v. Extrafine Bread Bakery, 208 Cal. 105, 112, 280 P. 522, it is highly improbable that the defendant suffered any prejudice from the error in the instruction.

The judgment is affirmed.

Nov. 3, 1930.

1. Bills and notes ⇨129(2).

Holder's acceptance of delinquent installments and interest on note held not waiver of strict performance and right to accelerate maturity without notice demanding strict performance.

Note contained provision entitling holder at his election to accelerate maturity of note after demand therefor within period of ten days after default in payment of interest or in payment of any installments. Most of previous payments of installments and interest were accepted by holder after their maturity.

2. Bills and notes ⇨109.

Provision in note for acceleration of maturity is not penalty or forfeiture, but simply agreement regarding maturity of debt, and therefore valid.

3. Bills and notes ⇨129(2).

"Demand" within acceleration clause of note held not to require a formal presentment of note.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Demand," see Words and Phrases.]

4. Bills and notes ⇨516.

Evidence held to establish holder of note suing thereon made demand for payment of installment and interest under acceleration clause before electing to declare balance due.

Evidence showed that note had been placed with bank for collection of monthly installments and that each month a notice was sent to maker notifying it that installment was due; that written notice was sent to maker regarding payment due and on which acceleration was based; that manager of collection department of bank had several telephone conversations with representative of maker corporation regarding overdue payment; and that during course of conversation demand for payment was made and attention called to fact that acceleration clause was applicable.

SPENCE, J.

The plaintiff brought this action upon a promissory note executed in his favor by the defendant corporation. Plaintiff obtained judgment upon a trial by the court sitting without a jury, and defendant appeals.

The note in the sum of $10,000 was executed in 1926. Interest on the note was payable monthly, together with installments of not less than $200 on the principal. The note contained the following provision: "And it is further agreed that in case of default in the payment of said interest for a period of ten days after the same shall become due, and demand having been made therefor, then such interest so in default shall be added to and become a part of the principal and thereafter bear the same rate of interest; and at any time during default in the payment of said interest, or in the payment of any instalment of principal in the manner aforesaid, for a period of ten days and after demand having been made therefor, the entire unpaid balance of said principal and the interest thereon, shall forthwith become due and payable at the election of the holder of this note, without notice." Defendant failed to pay the interest and installment due upon December 15, 1928, and plaintiff elected on December 31, 1928, to exercise his rights under the foregoing acceleration clause. On that day he caused the note to be presented and demand was made for payment of the entire balance of the principal amounting to $5,000. Defendant failed and refused to pay said unpaid balance, but thereafter endeavored to tender the interest and installment of principal which became due on December 15, which tender was refused. Plaintiff thereupon filed his complaint.

In the trial court defendant relied upon an alleged waiver by plaintiff of strict performance of defendant's obligations under the note by showing that defendant had not previously paid the interest and installments promptly as they became due and that plaintiff had accepted such delinquent payments. It was stipulated that most of the previous payments were made after they became due, and the trial court found upon that stipulation "that most of the payments up to and including November 15, 1928, were accepted by plaintiff after their maturity." The trial court, however, found in substance that plaintiff had not waived strict performance of the note; that defendant was in default; that plaintiff elected to declare the entire unpaid balance due; and that said balance of $5,000, together with interest, was due, owing, and unpaid. Judgment therefor was entered in favor of plaintiff.

[1, 2] Upon this appeal it is contended that the findings are erroneous and unsupported by the evidence and that the judgment is against law. These contentions are based upon the claim that the undisputed evidence and stipulation of the parties showed the acceptance by the plaintiff of previous payments after they became due and that as a matter of law plaintiff thereby waived strict performance of the obligations of the defendant and waived his right to exercise the accelerated maturity clause of the note without first notifying the defendant that he would require strict performance. Appellant relies upon a line of cases where the doctrine of waiver or estoppel has been applied to prevent a forfeiture under a contract of sale. These cases are not in point. Young v. Burchill, 96 Cal. App. 341, 274 P. 379, 380; Jump v. Barr, 46 Cal. App. 338, 189 P. 334; Dunn v. Barry, 35 Cal. App. 325, 169 P. 910. In distinguishing the cases relied upon by appellant, the court in Young v. Burchill, supra, said: "While the principle declared in the cases relied upon may properly be applied to vendor and purchaser contracts involving and authorizing forfeitures for breach of covenants as to time payments, it has no application to a case of the character here involved. Jump v. Barr, 46 Cal. App. 338, 189 P. 334. A provision for such accelerated maturity is not in the nature of a penalty or forfeiture, but simply an agreement as to the time when a debt shall become due and enforceable according to its terms, and is valid. Dunn v. Barry, 35 Cal. App. 325, 169 P. 910."

[3, 4] It is further contended that the evidence is insufficient to show a demand. The acceleration clause above set forth provides "and at any time during default in the payment of said interest, or in the payment of any instalment of principal in the manner aforesaid; for a period of ten days and after demand having been made therefor. * * *". Appellant concedes that presentment is not ordinarily necessary to charge the person primarily liable, yet he urges that presentment was necessary in the present case as a demand was required by the terms of the note before plaintiff could exercise his right under the acceleration clause. We do not, however, construe the word "demand" as so used to require a formal presentment of the note. The evidence showed that the note had been placed in the possession of a bank for collection of the monthly installments and that thereafter all payments had been made through the bank; that each month a notice was sent to defendant notifying it that the installment was due; that a written notice was sent to defendant regarding the payment due on December 15; that thereafter Mr. Desmond, the manager of the collection department of the bank, had several telephone conversations with Mr. Stewart of the defendant corporation regarding the overdue payment; that in one of these conversations after the ten days had elapsed Mr. Desmond demanded payment and called attention to the fact that the "ten days clause was applicable right then and there"; that Mr. Stewart said on that occasion that he would investigate and mail a check as soon as possible. There was further testimony concerning the demand, but the foregoing is ample to sustain the finding that demand had been made.

We find no error in the record, and the judgment is affirmed.

Edwin H. Williams, of San Francisco, and Chester Monette, for appellant.

Donahue, Hynes & Hamlin, of Oakland, for respondents.

NOURSE, P. J.

Plaintiff, a minor, sued through her guardian for personal injuries received when a motor vehicle, driven by her father and in which she was riding as a passenger, collided with a motor vehicle driven by defendants. The cause was tried with a jury, which returned a verdict for defendants. The plaintiff appeals on typewritten transcripts.

Plaintiff was riding east on the main highway from Oakland to San Jose. Defendants were driving north on the Dumbarton road. As defendants approached this highway at Machado Corners, they stopped for traffic to pass. They then started in low gear into the southerly half of the highway with the purpose of turning to the left and into the highway in the direction of Oakland. As defendants thus entered the highway, they observed plaintiff's car approaching from the left at a distance of 200 feet. Because of the west-bound traffic on the highway, the defendants were unable to complete the turn immediately, and thus blocked the southern half; their machine standing directly across the plaintiff's line of traffic. While in this position, the plaintiff's father applied the brakes to his car, swerved off the paved portion of the highway, and "skidded" into the rear of the defendants' car, causing the injuries to the minor child. The evidence disclosed that when plaintiff's father applied the brakes to his machine "skid" marks were made upon the highway for nearly 100 feet.

[1] The cause was tried on plaintiff's theory that the defendants were negligent in driving into the southern portion of the highway and stopping before crossing or turning into the northern half. The case was defended on the theory that the defendants were without negligence—that they did just as an ordinarily prudent man would have done under the same circumstances. It must be conceded that the evidence unmistakably supports the jury's verdict for the defendants, and that the sole and proximate cause of the accident was the negligent and reckless driving of plaintiff's father. Under such circumstances the judgment must be affirmed, unless the errors assigned are found to be prejudicial.

[2] Appellant first complains of the action of the trial court in refusing to give the proposed instruction found on page 246 of the typewritten transcript. There was no error, as the proposed instruction was one on the facts which were not supported by any evidence. The uncontradicted evidence was that, when respondents entered the highway, appellant's car was so far away that an accident could not have happened unless it was driven with reckless disregard of the right of others.

[3] Complaint is made of the giving of the commonplace instruction that the law presumes that the respondents acted as reasonable and prudent persons in the operation of their machine. The instruction was correct, and the authorities are so numerous that our only difficulty is to choose what to cite. Olsen v. Standard Oil Co., 188 Cal. 20, 25, 204 P. 393.

[4] Error is assigned in the giving of an instruction on the respective rights of way of the two drivers. The instruction followed the terms of the statute strictly, and is free from objection as far as it went. That the court did not cover other elements in the relations of the parties at the time is not an objection to be made to this instruction. If the plaintiff had desired additional instructions covering the matters of stopping and turning while in the intersection, she could have requested them. There is no similarity in this case to Ekwall v. Los Angeles Hat Co. (Cal. App.) 287 P. 545, where the plaintiff, after entering an intersection, made a left turn across the traffic approaching him on his right. The same may be said of Donat v. Dillon, 192 Cal. 426, 221 P. 193, where the left-hand turn was directly across right-hand traffic and was the direct proximate cause of the collision. Here the respondents entered the intersection when the appellant was approaching on their left at a distance of 200 feet, and they paused to permit the right-hand traffic to pass so that they could proceed in that direction. It is plain from the evidence that their intention to make a left-hand turn had no possible connection with the collision. If a driver under such circumstances cannot claim the right of way to either cross the highway or to turn into it, then it would be difficult to conceive of a case where such right would exist.

[5] The appellant complains of the refusal of the trial judge to give her proposed instruction that the minor child was not responsible for the negligence of the parents. It is now argued that this proposed instruction was meant to inform the jury that, if they found that the accident was caused by the contributory negligence of the father in his operation of his machine, that fact would not bar recovery on the part of the minor suing in her own right. If this was what was meant, we are at a loss to understand why the proposed instruction should be so involved. If the respondents had pleaded contributory negligence as a defense, or if that issue had been raised in any manner, an instruction that it would not bar recovery by the minor under those circumstances would have been proper. But the issue was not raised, hence the proposed instruction would have been foreign to the issues before the jury.

Further criticism is directed to the action of the trial judge in reading to the jury portions of the complaint and answer and in instructing them that the burden was on the pleader to prove these allegations. There was no error in the instructions as they appear in the record, but the appellant insists that the trial judge in this connection read a portion of her complaint alleging that "said carelessness and negligence of said defendants was the sole and proximate cause of the collision," etc. The record shows that this portion was not read to the jury and the appellant now moves for a diminution of the record to include it. A similar motion was made in the court below, and, after a full hearing in which the notes of the court reporter were referred to, the motion was denied. The appellant presents no reason why her motion should be granted other than the recollection of her counsel as opposed to that of the trial judge and the court reporter's notes.

[6] Similar criticism is directed to the refusal of the trial judge to permit appellant's counsel to continue his argument to the jury beyond the one hour set aside for him. This is a matter wholly within the discretion of the trial judge.

The motion for diminution of the record is denied.

The judgment is affirmed.

SCHMIDT, Justice pro tem.

One Arthur M. Loeb and others, as stockholders of Sunset Pacific Corporation, filed in the superior court of Los Angeles county an action, which will hereafter be referred to as the action, against one Jacob Berman, sometimes known as Jack Bennet, and many other defendants, including "Los Angeles Stock Exchange, a nonprofit and unincorporated association," which will hereafter be referred to as the exchange, which action was brought on behalf of Sunset Pacific Corporation as the assignee of the Julian Petroleum Corporation.

Except for a few members and ex-members of the Los Angeles Stock Exchange, who were joined as defendants to enforce against them a liability alleged to arise out of their individual participation in the acts forming the cause of action, not any of the members of the exchange were named as defendants either in the complaint or in the summons in said action. Following the commencement of the action, copies of summons and complaint were served upon the exchange and upon members and ex-members of the exchange. Thereupon the exchange, as such, and each of its members and ex-members upon whom service of summons had been had, including those who had been specifically named in the complaint, appeared specially in the respondent court for the sole purpose of moving that court for an order quashing such service. The hearing on said motions to quash were had in the respondent court upon affidavits and upon the constitution and by-laws of the exchange. Each of said motions were denied, whereupon petitions for writs of prohibition were filed in this court. To each of these petitions respondent court has filed a general demurrer in addition to filing an answer to the petition. By stipulation the four cases are consolidated in this court.

Whether liability of any character exists in favor of the plaintiffs in the action or any of them against the exchange or against any of the defendants actually named in the complaint and summons, or what the rights and duties between the members of the exchange and the exchange itself are, and, by reason thereof, whether there is any individual liability against the members, and like questions, must necessarily be matters of fact, and as such are to be determined by the trial court upon trial on the merits. We cannot in advance anticipate what facts will be found nor what judgment will be rendered.

The real question to be determined is: Did the respondent court obtain jurisdiction over the exchange as well as jurisdiction over the respective individuals? If so, then each petition should be dismissed, and, if not, then the writs should issue.

I. The motion to quash on behalf of the exchange was made upon the following ground and separately upon each of them: Said purported service was and is null and void, and of no force or effect; respondent court had no jurisdiction over the person of said defendant; that said exchange is not now and never has been an association engaged in the transaction of business under a common name or any name whatever within the meaning of section 388 of the Code of Civil Procedure; said exchange is not now and never has been an association composed of two or more individuals transacting business under a common name within the meaning of said section 388; that said section 388 is in violation of and obnoxious to section 1 of article 1 of the Constitution of the state of California, and of section 21 of article 1 of the Constitution of the state of California, and of section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Substantially the same grounds were set forth by the respective individuals in their respective motions to quash.

[1] For the purpose of the motion to quash, if the affidavits show a conflict in evidentiary facts, then this court cannot disturb the finding of the lower court upon such contested facts. The determination of such contested facts by the respondent court is not subject to collateral attack by writ of prohibition. Lumas Film Corp. v. Superior Court, 89 Cal. App. 384, 264 P. 792.

The section 388 involved reads as follows: "When two or more persons, associated in any business, transact such business under a common name, whether it comprises the names of such persons or not, the associates may be sued by such common name, the summons in such cases being served on one or more of the associates; and the judgment in the action shall bind the joint property of all the associates, and the individual property of the party or parties served with process, in the same manner as if all had been named defendants and had been sued upon their joint liability."

[2, 3] In paragraph XXI of the complaint it is alleged: "Defendant Los Angeles Stock Exchange is now, and at all times as to it herein mentioned was, a voluntary and unincorporated association of sixty or more individuals, who were and are associated together in business and who transact and transacted such business under a common name." By the motion to quash, supported by affidavits, the exchange virtually asked the respondent court to determine that this allegation of fact so contained in the complaint was not true. A fact alleged in a complaint requiring a finding thereon in order to support a judgment cannot be made an issue upon a motion to quash service of summons. Such motion goes only to the jurisdictional fact of service; that is, whether the court has acquired jurisdiction of the person, and not to the merits of the case. Felton Water Company v. Superior Court, 82 Cal. App. 382, 256 P. 255. To ask a court to determine in advance such issue of fact merely because the particular case, as is claimed in this instance, is apt to be a protracted one and expensive to defend, is not sufficient reason for this court to interfere with a writ of prohibition. If same were to be permitted in this case, why not try any issue of fact upon a like motion to quash?

II. The individuals applying for writs fall into three groups: (a) Those sued in their individual capacity and so named in the complaint whether or not they were members of the exchange at the time of the alleged transactions; (b) those who were members of the exchange at the time of the transactions involved in the complaint who were not named as individual defendants either in the complaint or in the summons; and (c) those who were present members of the exchange, but not members at the time of the alleged transactions, and who were not named as defendants either in the complaint or in the summons.

[4] As to those members who were made parties to the action by the allegations of the complaint, they are charged with the matters set forth in the complaint, and cannot as such defendants by a motion to quash have determined in advance of a trial on the merits any of the issues of fact, including that of their respective liabilities, if any.

[5] The defendants in the other two groups are in a different situation. Although it is the peculiar province of the Legislature to determine procedure, it is nevertheless for the courts to determine whether the method prescribed by the Legislature actually brings a person before the court. There can be no doubt that by the amendment of 1907 to section 388 it was the intention of the Legislature to provide a method for the enforcement of a judgment had against an association where there was also individual liability of a member by reason of being such member of the association, to the end that the property of such member might be taken to satisfy such liability of such member. It is contended that, because section 416, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that, from the time of the service of summons and a copy of the complaint in a civil action, the court is deemed to have acquired jurisdiction of the parties and to have control over all the subsequent proceedings, by the service of a copy of summons and complaint against an association upon a supposed member that such member of the association thereby is made a party to the action and by such service acquires all the rights and duties given by section 430, Code of Civil Procedure, and other sections of the Code, to demur or answer as if he were actually named a defendant in the action. On the other hand, petitioners contend that such a procedure is violative of the constitutional provision prohibiting the taking of property without due process of law. In City of Los Angeles v. Oliver (Cal. App.) 283 P. 298, commencing at the bottom of page 308, we read:

"As applied to judicial proceedings, the phrase 'due process of law' imports an orderly proceeding adapted to the nature of the case in which a person is accorded an opportunity to be heard and to defend, enforce, and protect his rights. County of Santa Clara v. Southern Pacific Ry. Co. (C. C.) 18 F.

385. * * * It means a process which, 'following the forms of law, is appropriate to the case, and just to the parties to be affected. It must be pursued in the ordinary mode prescribed by the law; it must be adapted to the end to be attained; and wherever it is necessary for the protection of the parties, it must give them an opportunity to be heard respecting the justice of the judgment sought.' Hagar v. Reclamation District, 111 U. S. 701, 4 S. Ct. 663, 667, 28 L. Ed. 569. It was undoubtedly the purpose of the framers of both constitutional guaranties to secure to every person a judicial trial according to the established rules of law, before he could be deprived of either life, liberty, or property. Cohen v. Wright, 22 Cal. 293, 318."

Section 407, Code of Civil Procedure, provides:

"The summons must be directed to the defendant, signed by the clerk, and issued under the seal of the court, and must contain:

"1. The names of the parties to the action, the court in which it is brought, and the county in which the complaint is filed;

"2. A direction that the defendant appear and answer the complaint within ten days, if the summons is served within the county in which the action is brought; within thirty days, if served elsewhere;

"3. A notice that, unless the defendant so appears and answers, the plaintiff will take judgment for any money or damages demanded in the complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the court for any other relief demanded in the complaint."

By the amendment of 1907 to section 388, under attack, a summons and complaint served upon individuals not named in the summons or complaint is not in harmony with subdivision 1 of section 407, Code of Civil Procedure, in that it does not name the parties to the action. Neither is it in harmony with subdivision 2 of said section, in that there is no direction whatsoever to the person so served to appear and answer, nor is he apprised what judgment, if any, is sought against him. The most that can be said is that he is informed that an action is pending against an association of which he may or may not in fact be a member at the time of the service of the summons. As was said in Coe v. Armour Fertilizer Works, 237 U. S. 421, 35 S. Ct. 625, 59 L. Ed. 1027, extra official or casual notice is not sufficient; the law must require notice to them and an opportunity to be heard.

[6-8] It necessarily follows that the procedure thus provided by section 388 does not provide for any notice that is either real or reasonable.

After a careful examination of the authorities presented and in view of the matters herein expressed we find that, in so far as an association as an entity is concerned, section 388 is not in violation of section 1, article 1, or section 21 of article 1, of the Constitution of the state of California, or of section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States. We are of a like opinion that the provisions of the section as applying to individuals named as defendants likewise is not unconstitutional. We are, however, equally satisfied that the provisions of section 388 in so far as a judgment may be rendered against a person not named in the summons or complaint, but merely by serving him with a copy of the summons and complaint, is unconstitutional.

In so far as the Los Angeles Stock Exchange and the respective individuals named in the complaint and summons are concerned, the writ is denied; and, in so far as the individuals not named in the complaint or summons are concerned, the writ is granted.

NOURSE, P. J.

Plaintiff sued as assignee of W. H. Marston to enforce the stockholders' liability of the defendants, all of whom were stockholders of the Central Alaska Fisheries, Inc. Plaintiff had judgment against the defendants in accordance with their respective liability. Eleven of these defendants have appealed on typewritten transcripts.

In all the appeals but one point is raised which requires consideration, and that is the application of the statute of limitations. The original indebtedness was evidenced by promissory notes executed by the corporation amounting to $128,000. Payment of these notes was guaranteed by W. H. Marston. They were dated over a period from August 6, 1920, to September 30 of the same year. The banks which held the notes were paid by Marston over a period from January 23, 1921, to October 15 of the same year. Marston assigned his claim to the corporation plaintiff, which commenced this action on September 23, 1923. Thus, if the statute of limitations commenced to run from the date of the original obligation of the Fisheries Company, the greater portion of plaintiff's claim would be barred.

[1] Appellants argue that Marston's contract was one of guaranty and not one of surety, that his satisfaction of the indebtedness did not extinguish the obligations, and that his causes of action are thus barred. The trial court found that Marston guaranteed payment of the notes at the request of the corporation and for its use and benefit. The evidence supports the finding and brings the relation of Marston and the corporation within the definition of a surety as found in section 2831 of the Civil Code. His rights against the corporation and its stockholders are therefore such as belong to a surety who has paid the debt and discharged the obligation of his principal. Yule v. Bishop, 133 Cal. 574, 578, 62 P. 68, 65 P. 1094.

[2] This obligation of the principal to the surety arose when the surety paid the original obligation, and the statute limiting his right to enforce the liability of the stockholders of his principal commenced to run when this new obligation between principal and surety arose. Ryland v. Com., etc., Bank, 127 Cal. 525, 527, 59 P. 989; Yule v. Bishop, 133 Cal. 574, 580, 62 P. 68, 65 P. 1094; Wills v. Woolner, 21 Cal. App. 528, 529, 132 P. 283; H. K. McCann Co. v. Denny, 205 Cal. 147, 151, 270 P. 190; Finch v. Finch, 68 Cal. App. 72, 79, 228 P. 553; W. H. Marston Co. v. Central Alaska Fisheries, Inc., 201 Cal. 715, 258 P. 933.

[3] We are not impressed with appellants' argument that the section of the Negotiable Instruments Law, which is found in section 3202 of our Civil Code, and which provides that, "where the instrument is paid by a party secondarily liable thereon, it is not discharged," leaves respondent with but the single remedy—a suit on the original instrument. Assuming that the Code section applies to a contract of guaranty or suretyship, it is manifest that it has not changed the settled rule that a guarantor or a surety who pays the principal obligation has a right of action upon the implied obligation of reimbursement, irrespective of what right he might be able to assert in equity by subrogation, equitable assignment, or otherwise. 21 R. C. L. 1106; 28 C. J. 1037.

The judgment is affirmed.

BURROUGHS, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of defendants in an action in equity wherein the plaintiff, a minority stockholder in the Tuxedo Land Company, seeks to enjoin a purchase by said company of all the properties of the Golden Valley Land Company, a corporation.

The offer to sell was authorized by the board of directors of the Golden Valley Land Company and unanimously ratified by its stockholders. The offer was then submitted to the Tuxedo Land Company and accepted by its board of directors on May 5, 1927. A permit was secured from the commissioner of corporations authorizing the Tuxedo Land Company to issue and sell the necessary stock called for by the agreement of sale. A special meeting of the stockholders of the Tuxedo Land Company was called for February 9, 1928, for the purpose of ratifying the proposed purchase. Appellant filed his complaint February 2, 1928, asking that the purported acceptance by the board of directors of the Tuxedo Land Company be declared null and void; that they be restrained from executing a deed or other conveyance; also that they be restrained from holding the proposed ratification meeting on February 9, 1928, or from taking any steps toward the completion of the proposed transaction.

Plaintiff alleges that the consideration is far in excess of the value of the properties purchased; that said vendor company was at the time of sale insolvent, its liabilities being far in excess of its assets.

Plaintiff further alleges that he will suffer and sustain irreparable injury and damage. There is no allegation of fraud. A restraining order pendente lite was issued on February 8, 1928, providing, however, that the proposed meeting might be held as scheduled, and that the stockholders might vote as they saw fit upon said proposed purchase, "but that the holding of said meeting shall not constitute a waiver on the part of plaintiff of its objection to the proposed purchase by the Tuxedo Land Company of the properties of the Golden Valley Land Company or of any of the other things complained of in the complaint of the plaintiff herein."

The stockholders' meeting was held as scheduled and the proposed purchase was ratified by an affirmative vote of 1,550 shares out of a total of 1950 shares and opposed by the 385 shares represented by plaintiff. Fifteen shares were not voted.

The individual defendants, five in number, were the board of directors of both corporations, the purchasing company, and the selling company. Following a trial on the merits, judgment was rendered for the defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Further facts will appear in the discussion of the findings assailed by appellant.

Appellant bases his appeal upon the contention that material findings of fact are not supported by the evidence and further upon a question of law, which for convenience we will give first consideration. For this purpose we are assuming that the findings of fact are sustained by the evidence.

Plaintiff stresses the fact of the interlocking directorates and has seized upon the language occurring in the opinion of the court in O'Conner, etc., v. Coosa F. Co., 95 Ala. 618, 10 So. 290, 291, 36 Am. St. Rep. 251, as follows: "Such transaction may be avoided by either company, or, at the instance of a stockholder in either company, without regard to the question of advantage or detriment to either company."

We find no case in which the courts of California have followed this rigid rule, allowing a minority stockholder to avoid the action of the directors and majority of stockholders merely because of an interlocking directorate, without showing injury, damage, or fraud. The rule in California is correctly set out in California Jurisprudence, volume 6, § 449, page 1077, as follows: " * * * Where one corporation deals with another and the same persons constitute all or a majority of the directorate of each company, there being no actual or intended fraud, the transaction is not void, but voidable only, and may be ratified by either party by conduct having that legal effect. Of course, such transactions may be avoided for fraud, by either company or at the instance of a stockholder in either company, without regard to the question of advantage or detriment." (Italics ours.)

In O'Conner v. Coosa, supra, the references to the rights of stockholders cited by counsel are dicta. That action was a creditors' suit which failed because there was no proof of fraud in the transaction complained of. The right of a stockholder to prevent a voidable transaction was not involved in the case. However, the decision in reference to the voidability of a transaction involving an interlocking directorate contains the further statement: "The general rule is that such dealings are not absolutely void, but are voidable, at the election of the respective corporations or of the stockholders thereof. They become binding if acquiesced in by the corporations and their stockholders."

The Sausalito Bay Land Company v. Sausalito Imp. Company, 166 Cal. 302, 136 P. 57, 59 (cited by both appellant and respondents herein), is an action to quiet title to land which the plaintiff corporation had sold to the defendant corporation, and for which the defendant corporation had not fully paid. Defendant corporation filed a cross-complaint in which the fact of an interlocking directorate was set out. Defendant's main contention was that by reason of this fact, regardless of the absence of fraud or bad intent, the conduct of the directors constituted constructive fraud sufficient to justify a rescission at defendant's demand. Commenting on this phase of the case, the court says: "The rule established in this state is that, where one corporation deals with another, and the same persons, constituting the majority of the directorate of each company, control the deal, there being no actual or intended fraud, the transaction is not void, but only voidable, and may be ratified by either party by conduct having that legal effect, and that it is binding upon the party so ratifying it." And, further: "The correct doctrine is well stated in O'Conner, etc., v. Coosa F. Co., 95 Ala. 617, 36 Am. St. Rep. 251, 10 So. 291, as follows: 'If the same persons as directors of two different companies represent both companies in a transaction in which their interests are opposed, such transaction may be avoided by either company, or at the instance of a stockholder in either company, without regard to the question of advantage or detriment to either company. Both the corporations are armed with the right to repudiate such a transaction, no matter how fair or open it may be shown to be. * * * The general rule is that such dealings are not absolutely void, but are voidable at the election of the respective corporations, or of the stockholders thereof. They become binding if acquiesced in by the corporations and their stockholders.' " The decision in the Sausalito Case rested upon the fact found by the lower court and sustained by the appellate court, that all the defendants and cross-complainants by their conduct had ratified that original sale, and the agreement, therefore, had become binding. The statement of the rule from the O'Conner v. Coosa Case was made for its bearing upon the fact of ratification and not for the purpose that the appellant in the instant case has cited it.

We believe the general inference of this decision, as well as in the other California cases cited and relied upon by appellant, are in favor of the rule as above quoted from California Jurisprudence, supra, San Diego, etc., v. Pacific Beach Company, 112 Cal. 53, 44 P. 333, 33 L. R. A. 788; Pauly v. Pauly, 107 Cal. 8, 40 P. 29, 48 Am. St. Rep. 98.

A case in point is that of Roberts and The Daily Telegram Company of Long Beach, Cal., v. Prisk, Hosking and Press, etc., Pub. Company (Cal. App.) 284 P. 984, at page 987, where all the directors of the two companies were the same and minority directors and stockholders refusing to ratify were the plaintiffs. The fact of interlocking directorates is urged as a reason why the transaction should be held void. The court says: "There must be either fraud or a lack of good faith, or some breach of trust shown in addition to the fact of interlocking directorates." The court cites from 14 Corpus Juris, page 873, § 1332, as follows: " * * * The law relating to dealings between interlocking directorates is thus stated: 'The fact that part or all of the stockholders of two corporations are the same does not have the effect of rendering the corporations legally identical. It does not make either corporation responsible for the contracts of the other or for the acts of its members as members of the other. Neither does it prevent the corporations from dealing with each other, although where the same majority is in control of both corporations, the dealings of the corporations with each other will be subjected to a careful scrutiny and the rights of minority stockholders will be protected by the courts. However, it is held that the fact that the same persons constitute majority stockholders in each of two corporations, does not enlarge the jurisdiction of equity to interfere with the management of one of these corporations in relation with the other, at the suit of a minority stockholder."

[1] From the foregoing we believe the rule in California is too well settled to require further discussion. A transaction between two corporations having common directors, which is not ultra vires, cannot be prevented or avoided by a minority stockholder except he be able to prove actual or constructive fraud, injury, or damage. In the instant case plaintiff alleges injury and damage. The court found against him, and, if the findings of the court are sustained by the evidence, plaintiff's action must fail.

Appellant contends that the following findings of fact are not supported by the evidence: 1, 2, 4, 18, 19, 21, 22, 23, and 30.

[2] Findings Nos. 1 and 2 are to the effect that the defendant directors of the two land companies did not at any time hold a majority of the stock in either company. That they did not hold in excess of 581 shares in Tuxedo Land Company out of a total of 1,950 shares; that they did not hold in excess of 331 shares in Golden Valley Land Company out of a total of 760 shares.

Plaintiff alleged in his complaint that the directors owned and held more than one-half of the total issued stock of Tuxedo Land Company (1,950 shares), and that the same directors owned and held all the capital stock (760 shares) of the Golden Valley Land Company.

Plaintiff seeks to avoid these findings by a statement in his brief that "the majority of the stock in both concerns is held by these directors and their wives and immediate families."

The findings complained of are responsive to the issues as framed by the pleadings; without detailing the evidence on this point, it is sufficient to say there is no dispute as to the ownership of stock. The only evidence is that of two defendants to the effect that the directors held in their own names in the proportion stated in the findings of the court. Enough stock is held by relatives and connections of these directors to make a majority of the stock owned by the directors and their relatives; the same evidence shows conclusively that these individual relatives each own the stock standing in their names and purchased it with their own separate money.

There were in the Tuxedo Company twenty stockholders, eleven of whom, holding 615 shares, are not shown to be in any way related to any of the directors. In the Golden Valley Land Company there were nine stockholders. It appears that but one stockholder, owning 117 shares, was not related or connected with the directors in any way. There were stockholders in the Tuxedo Land Company holding 885 shares who owned no stock in the Golden Valley Land Company.

[3] The findings 1 and 2 are wholly responsive to the issues and are supported by the evidence. Findings numbers 18, 19, 21, 22, 23, and 30 are all concerned with the various allegations of the unsoundness of the business deal and the fairness or unfairness of the consideration and the disputed valuations of the properties to be transferred by the Golden Valley Company to the Tuxedo Land Company, and the contention of injury and damage to defendant corporation, Tuxedo Land Company, and in consequence to the plaintiff.

To discuss in detail the evidence relating to these findings would reveal a conflict in the evidence which has already been decided by the trial court and therefore is not subject to change by this court. Suffice it to say that after a careful examination of the record there is sufficient evidence to sustain each finding.

[4] Finding No. 4 recites that it had not been the policy of the Tuxedo Land Company to distribute to its stockholders all sums realized from the sale of its property or to liquidate the company when all the property owned by it had been sold. On this subject two of the directors, Stetson and Oxnard, testified: "The Tuxedo Land Company, had, from sales of its land, accumulated considerable sums of money, the major portion of which had to be carried as the capital assets of the company. The reduction in the par value of the capital stock was accomplished in order to free some of these cash assets from the status of capital assets and to enable the board of directors of the Tuxedo Land Company to distribute the same and such future cash receipts as might seem proper in the form of dividends to the stockholders of the Tuxedo Land Company", and further, "The board of directors of the Tuxedo Land Company in accomplishing the reduction in the par value of its capital stock, did not take that action as a step preliminary to dissolution of the corporation or in an effort to wind up its affairs or conclude its activities."

The above finding is supported by the foregoing evidence. Both appellant and respondents have given considerable space in argument as to the effect of the undisputed facts of ownership of stock in the two companies and to the contention by appellant that the action of the Tuxedo Land Company's directors was not properly, or at all, ratified by a majority of the stock. It is conceded that the plaintiff, who is a minority stockholder, did not at any time ratify the action of the directors.

There is no allegation and no evidence that the action of the directors of the Tuxedo Land Company was ultra vires, or that it was such an action as required a ratification by the stockholders, or that the directors had not the power or right as the business managers and representatives of the one land corporation to purchase the properties of another land corporation without an express ratification by the stockholders.

The undisputed facts of ratification or attempted ratification are as follows: The stockholders of the vendor corporation, Golden Valley Land Company, unanimously ratified the action of their board of directors. The directors of the Tuxedo Land Company accepted the offer of sale of the Golden Valley Land Company on May 5, 1927. The evidence shows that the stockholders of the Tuxedo Land Company were early advised of all the facts of the negotiations, including the fact of the interlocking directorates and that certain stockholders were opposed to the purchase.

Between the time, January 19, 1928, when the notices of the stockholders' meeting for the purpose of ratification were sent out, and the time of said meeting, February 9, 1928, at which meeting a majority of the stockholders expressly ratified the action of the directors, plaintiff filed his complaint. Therefore, plaintiff contends that the subsequent ratification by a majority of the stockholders should not be recognized by the court.

[5] If a ratification by the stockholders is necessary to such action of their board of directors, then, all the stockholders having been fully advised in the premises and a minority having contested, the majority stockholders by their conduct may be deemed to have acquiesced in the action of the board. Sausalito Bay Land Company v. Sausalito Imp. Company, supra. But, if, as contended by appellant, the board of directors owned and controlled a majority of the stock, then it follows a majority of the stock automatically ratified the action of the board of directors and plaintiff would still stand a minority stockholder attempting to avoid the action of the majority, which can be done only upon proof of fraud.

[6] Neither party has shown any necessity for a ratification by the stockholders of an action by the directors, which is, in the absence of any allegation or proof to the contrary, presumed to have been within the scope of their business organization and within the power of the directors as the business managers of the corporation, to conduct. Kennedy v. Savings Bank, 101 Cal. 495, 35 P. 1039, 40 Am. St. Rep. 69, and Roberts and The Daily Telegram Company, etc., v. Prisk et al., supra.

The minority stockholder in this case is seeking to avoid the business judgment of its board of directors on the ground that the dealings are conducted by two corporations having identical directors.

"There must be either fraud or a lack of good faith, or some breach of trust shown in addition to the fact of interlocking directorates." Roberts et al. v. Prisk et al., supra.

The minority stockholder has made no showing which would warrant a court of equity to interfere with the management of the corporation business or disturb the judgment of the trial court.

NOURSE, P. J.

In an action for personal injuries tried before a jury the plaintiff recovered a verdict for $3,415. The defendant appeals from the judgment on typewritten transcripts.

Plaintiff was walking in a southerly direction across Market street in San Francisco at the southeast intersection of Market and Third. At the same time defendant was driving a jitney bus in an easterly direction along Market. Plaintiff was struck by the right front fender of defendant's car just as he reached a point about three feet from the southerly curb of Market street.

Plaintiff plants his case on defendant's negligence in failing to obey the "stop" signal for east-west traffic on Market street. On this point there is a sharp conflict in the evidence, which the jury resolved in favor of plaintiff.

[1] Defendant insists that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law. The argument is based upon some evidence tending to show that plaintiff failed to look to his right as he crossed the street and on evidence tending to show that he stopped and backed into the oncoming car. On both points the evidence is in conflict, and this court cannot say that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. Reaugh v. Cudahy Pack. Co., 189 Cal. 335, 343, 208 P. 125; Swartz v. Acme Express Co. (Cal. App.) 283 P. 358; Hanson v. Cordoza (Cal. App.) 290 P. 62.

[2] In this connection the appellant argues that we should follow Finkle v. Tait, 55 Cal. App. 425, 203 P. 1031; Moss v. H. R. Boynton Co., 44 Cal. App. 474, 186 P. 631; Mayer v. Anderson, 36 Cal. App. 740, 173 P. 174, and similar cases holding that a pedestrian was guilty of contributory negligence in failing to continually look up and down the street he was crossing in order to ascertain if vehicles were approaching which might cross his line of travel. It is sufficient to say that none of these cases involved a question where plaintiff was crossing a street under modern traffic control. In the latter case a pedestrian is entitled to assume that the traffic rules will be obeyed (Gornstein v. Priver, 64 Cal. App. 249, 221 P. 396; Averdieck v. Barris, 63 Cal. App. 495, 497, 218 Pa. 786; Hanson v. Cordoza [Cal. App.] 290 P. 62), and if, under such circumstances, he is charged with contributory negligence, the question is one of fact for the jury.

From what we have said it would, of course, follow that the trial court did not err in denying defendant's motion for a directed verdict. 24 Cal. Jur. 916.

The judgment is affirmed.

3. Negligence ⇨141(9).

Last clear chance instruction held properly refused as against contention word "peril" therein implied danger from which one could not reasonably extricate himself.

Refused instruction stated, in substance, that if jury believed deceased motorist by reason of negligence in operating automobile placed herself in position of peril, and defendant saw and realized her dangerous situation in time by exercise of ordinary care to avoid accident but failed to do all he could or should have done in exercise of ordinary care to avoid the accident, the defendant was solely responsible for death. "Peril" is defined as exposure to injury, loss, or destruction.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Peril," see Words and Phrases.]

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; C. W. Miller, Judge.

TUTTLE, Justice pro tem.

This is an action brought to recover damages on account of fatal injuries received by Sarrah E. Carlile in an automobile collision. It is filed by the administratrix of her estate.

The complaint contains three causes of action, the first being on account of the death of

Mrs. Carlile; the second on account of injuries received by Earl Sadler, a minor; and the third on account of injuries received by Robert Sadler, a minor. A jury brought in a verdict for plaintiffs on the second and third causes of action and for defendant upon the first. This appeal is taken by the administratrix of Sarrah E. Carlile from the judgment rendered upon the first cause of action.

The sole question presented for consideration is whether or not the trial court erred in refusing to give the jury the following instruction upon the doctrine of "last clear chance": "You are instructed that the party who has the last clear chance to avoid the accident, notwithstanding the previous negligence of his opponent, is considered solely responsible. If you believe from the evidence in this case that the deceased, Sarrah E. Carlile, was negligent in the operation of her automobile as she approached and entered the intersection of highways where the accident in question occurred, and, by reason of such negligence on her part, placed herself in a position of peril; and you further believe from the evidence in the case that the defendant, J. M. Benson, saw and realized the dangerous situation in which said deceased, Sarrah E. Carlile, had placed herself, in time, by the exercise of ordinary care, to avoid the accident and resulting death of said Sarrah E. Carlile, but failed, after seeing and observing the perilous situation of the deceased, to do all that he could or should have done in the exercise of ordinary care to avoid the accident, then I instruct you that the defendant, J. M. Benson, is solely responsible for the accident and resulting death of said Sarrah E. Carlile, deceased."

In Palmer v. Tschudy, 191 Cal. 696, 218 P. 36, 37, it was said: "The last clear chance rule presupposes: That the plaintiff has been negligent; that as a result thereof she is in a situation of danger from which she cannot escape by the exercise of ordinary care; that the defendant is aware of her dangerous situation under such circumstances that he realizes, or ought to realize, her inability to escape therefrom; that he then has a clear chance to avoid injuring her by the exercise of ordinary care, and fails to do so. If all of these elements are present, the rule applies and enables the plaintiff to recover, notwithstanding her own negligence. But if any of them be absent the rule does not apply, and the case is governed by the ordinary rules of negligence and contributory negligence."

[1-3] It will be noted that the instruction in question omits entirely one of the essential elements which is necessary before the rule can apply. The jury was not instructed that the situation of danger or peril must have been one from which decedent could not have escaped by the exercise of ordinary care. It is not enough that the party be placed in a position of peril. The driver (who was decedent) must have been caught or entrapped, so that no reasonable effort on her part could have saved her. The "last clear chance" doctrine has been referred to as a humanitarian rule, in that it permits a recovery notwithstanding the negligence of the party injured, but it nevertheless requires that such party use ordinary care to extricate himself from the position of danger or peril, after he has become aware of it.

Assuming that the evidence justified the giving of the instruction, an examination of the record discloses that an instruction upon this essential element of the doctrine was absolutely necessary before a just conclusion in the case could be reached. Decedent was driving a Ford car, conveying as passengers, the two other plaintiffs, who were both under the age of nine years. The collision occurred at the intersection of an eighty-foot highway with a cross country road. There was evidence that decedent was traveling along the road about 14 miles per hour when she reached the intersection, while defendant was moving at about 28 miles per hour on the highway. Some fifty feet from the highway one of the passengers saw defendant's car approaching.

It can be readily seen that, if an instruction of this character were justified at all, this particular element is rendered, under the evidence, absolutely vital. It was for the jury to determine whether or not decedent could have escaped from the position of peril, and they should have been so instructed.

Again in the case of Palmer v. Tschudy, supra, the court said: "If, being aware of the danger and able to escape it by exercising ordinary care, she neglects to do so, she cannot invoke the last clear chance rule to place the burden of the resulting loss upon the other party."

The following language was used in the case of Young v. Southern Pac. Co., 189 Cal. 746, 210 P. 259, 262: "Obviously, if both parties to an accident could, by the exercise of ordinary care, have avoided it, neither can be said to have had the last clear chance. It is only when a defendant charged with the negligent infliction of the injury, knowing plaintiff's peril, could and the injured plaintiff could not have avoided the injury that the defendant is liable. The liability is placed upon the party inflicting the injury only if immediately before the actual infliction of the injury the injured person was in such a situation as to be unable, by the exercise on his part of reasonable and ordinary care, to extricate himself, and vigilance on his part would not have averted the injury."

It is contended by appellant, in attempting to support and justify the instruction offered, that the word "peril," as used in view of the context, implies a position of danger from which one cannot reasonably extricate himself, and that such implication should be read into it. We think this position is untenable. "Peril" means simply exposure to injury, loss or destruction. 48 C. J. 812. Surely not all perils can be held to be inescapable in their nature. We think that our juries have enough to do without casting upon them the additional burden of receiving their instructions through a process of "implication by context." We know of no place where the virtue of simplicity is more in demand and less in practice than in the matter of instructing a jury.

We do not deem it necessary to pass upon the question raised by appellant that the evidence justified the giving of an instruction upon this doctrine. It would appear, however, from an examination of the record, that defendant used every reasonable means to avoid the injury.

Our conclusion is that the trial court was justified in refusing the proffered instruction.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Automobiles ☞132.

Constitutional law ☞80(2).

Statute empowering officers to determine whether automobile license should be revoked confers quasi judicial powers and is constitutional (St. 1923, p. 517, § 73, as amended by St. 1929, p. 558).

St. 1923, p. 517, § 73, as amended by St. 1929, p. 558, provided that certain specified officers, on receipt of verified complaint that operator of automobile is reckless, negligent, or incompetent driver, may conduct hearing to determine whether license should be suspended or revoked, and that finding should be prepared on evidence received and considered.

2. Automobiles ☞144.

Evidence authorized finding that automobile driver's conduct was so careless as to warrant revocation of driver's license (St. 1923, p. 517, § 73, as amended by St. 1929, p. 558).

Evidence disclosed that automobile driver admitted driving from 35 to 50 miles an hour; that driver had been arrested for speeding and was on probation; that driver had repeatedly collided with other automobiles and was twice fined, and was involved in accidents in which another automobile was wrecked on public street while driver was going between 35 and 40 miles per hour.

3. Courts ☞28.

Superior court, though having jurisdiction to try automobile driver's right to license, was not required to hear case where evidence before commissioner compelled conclusion that driver was incompetent (St. 1923, p. 517, § 73, as amended by St. 1929, p. 558).

Application for mandamus by Howard B. Keck, by William M. Keck, his guardian ad litem, against the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the county of Los Angeles.

Writ denied.

Chandler, Wright & Ward, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., L. G. Campbell, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Harry L. Huston, Atty. for Division of Motor Vehicles, Department of Public Works, of Woodland, for respondent.

CRAIG, J.

A verified complaint having been filed with the division of motor vehicles, department of public works, charging the petitioner herein with having driven an automobile in a careless and reckless manner, and with being an habitually reckless driver, his license was suspended after a hearing thereon. He thereafter applied to the superior court, for a trial and determination of the question as to his right to a license, to which application a demurrer was sustained without leave to amend. He now petitions for a writ of mandamus requiring the overruling of the demurrer and requiring said court to set the cause for trial.

[1] The grounds of the application to the superior court were that the chief of the division of motor vehicles acted in excess of his authority in suspending petitioner's license, that the evidence was not sufficient to warrant such action, and that petitioner was thereby deprived of his "free exercise and enjoyment of his liberty and property." The California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 517, as amended) is attacked as being unconstitutional, in that it attempts to confer upon executive officers excessive judicial authority. It is provided by section 73 thereof (St. 1929, p. 558) that certain specified officers, upon receipt of a verified complaint, that an operator is a reckless, negligent, or incompetent driver, may conduct a hearing to determine whether his license shall be suspended or revoked; that the chief of the division or person holding such hearing shall prepare findings upon the evidence received and considered; and that the license may be suspended for a period of six months or revoked if the findings be to the effect that such person is incompetent or unfit to drive for any reason authorizing the refusal of a license, or by reason of negligent or reckless driving which has endangered life, limb, or property. All of the decisions cited by the petitioner hold or adhere to the rule that a commission or board may be empowered by legislative act to ascertain the existence of facts upon the finding of which the right to continue in the practice of a profession or business may depend. It is therein expressly held that the functions of such a board or commission are in this regard not an exercise of "the judicial power of the state" as contemplated by the Constitution, but that they are quasi judicial, and that statutes conferring such power are constitutional. Western Metal Supply Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 407, 156 P. 491; Pacific Coast Casualty Co. v. Pillsbury, 171 Cal. 319, 153 P. 24; Yosemite Lumber Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 187 Cal. 774, 204 P. 226, 20 A. L. R. 994; Tulare Water Co. v. State Water Comm., 187 Cal. 533, 202 P. 874; Suckow v. Alderson, 182 Cal. 250, 187 P. 965; Lanterman v. Anderson, 36 Cal. App. 472, 172 P. 625; Leach v. Daugherty, 73 Cal. App. 83, 238 P. 160. In Tulare Water Co. v. State Water Comm., supra, it was observed that the act there construed vested in the water commission some discretion, but not the power to determine conflicting claims to unappropriated water. The act before us in plain terms invests the named guardians of motor safety with power and authority to "conduct an investigation and hearing to determine whether the license of an operator or chauffeur shall be suspended or revoked."

[2, 3] The petitioner, who appears by his guardian ad litem, is a young man about sixteen years of age. He admitted that he could not say that he had not driven past the complainant's house in a residential district at the rate of 60 miles per hour. He also admitted that he had driven upon other occasions from 35 to 50 miles per hour, had been arrested therefor, and that although on probation at the time of the hearing, he had exceeded 40 miles per hour. The evidence tended to show that he had repeatedly collided with other automobiles, that he had been twice fined, had forfeited bail, and had caused property damage to various machines for which large sums of money were expended by the automobile club. An accident following which the specific charges here in controversy arose, wherein his machine was damaged and another wrecked, occurred upon a public street in the city while the petitioner was driving between 35 and 40 miles per hour. From the foregoing it cannot be seriously contended that it was unreasonable to conclude that petitioner's conduct was so careless, negligent, and reckless as to warrant the action taken. Indeed, to have done otherwise would have been a clear and inexcusable omission to perform an official duty, wisely imposed in the plain interest of public safety. Since the application which the petitioner in this court made to the superior court contained the testimony of witness given before the commissioner, and inasmuch as this evidence even considered most favorably to the petitioner compelled the conclusion that he was a reckless, negligent, and incompetent driver, it would have served no good purpose for the superior court to have set the matter down for hearing. While that court unquestionably has jurisdiction to do so, there is nothing in the statute which indicates that under such circumstances it cannot refuse. We think the demurrer was properly sustained.

Writ denied.

STURTEVANT, J.

The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendant to recover moneys alleged to be due under an oral contract. The defendant answered and the trial was had in the lower court before the court sitting with a jury. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and from the judgment entered thereon the defendant has appealed and has brought up a typewritten record.

Mr. M. T. Dolman, president of the plaintiff corporation, met Mr. W. Flanders Setchel, the general manager of the defendant corporation, and a conversation was had regarding the employment of the plaintiff by the defendant as its advertising agent. Thereafter, on August 10, 1927, the two met again, and at that time Mr. Dolman delivered to Mr. Setchel a written plan, which is set forth in the transcript. It included the use of advertisements in newspapers, window cards, window streamers, and "throw away cards." Newspaper advertising was to be done in the metropolitan daily newspapers of San Francisco and Oakland. The advertisement in each newspaper was estimated as to size and the cost per week. Each other item of the plan was estimated as to quantity and the cost of each item. After that conversation, on August 12, 1927, the plaintiff wrote the defendant a letter confirming the conversation. Omitting irrelevant parts, and for our convenience numbering the paragraphs, the letter stated:

"1. We wish to thank you for placing your advertising account with this agency, and to confirm our understanding of the basis upon which it is to be handled.

"For the present all that is required is for us to prepare a booklet, illustrating Keaton Tires and describing their various points of superiority.

"And to plan and prepare and place a campaign of advertising to appear in San Francisco and Oakland newspapers (to be selected later) featuring Keaton Week, August 21.

"To supervise the preparation of publicity matter under the direction of Mr. A. S. Peterson, to be furnished the newspapers.

"To plan and prepare such window streamers and window cards and display advertising material as may be deemed necessary and compatible with good judgment.

"2. It is understood further that these arrangements, tentatively entered into by Mr. Setchel and this agency are contingent also upon confirmation by your permanent board of directors.

"3. It is agreed further that the Dolman Company, Inc., is to be assured, during the life of any agreement of a minimum remuneration of $50.00 per month, regular agency commissions to apply against this fee.

"4. It is agreed by you that the Dolman Company, Inc., is to retain any and all customary agency commissions from publications, etc., that you will remit to us for all monthly bills on or before the tenth of the month following date of invoice, and you will receive, for this a 2 per cent. cash discount for such payments, but only when the monthly invoices have been paid in full."

The advertising was to take place during "Keaton Week," which was to commence on the 21st day of August, 1927. That letter was not answered by a letter written by the defendant. However, after the letter was written the plaintiff proceeded to prepare the advertising matter including the wording, size, etc., of the newspaper advertisement. Having done so, it caused its secretary to take the proofs and submit them to the defendant. When she returned and made her report, on August 19, 1927, the plaintiff wrote the defendant a letter confirming the conversation between the plaintiff's secretary and the defendant and stating that the plaintiff would make certain corrections which had been suggested. In that letter the plaintiff stated the cost of each newspaper advertisement and also the total thereof. After that letter was sent the advertisements were inserted in the newspapers. No claim is made that said advertisements did not in form, in size, and in all other respects conform with the terms of the oral agreements. During the oral negotiations the defendant discussed its desire to pay for some of the advertising in trade. Mr. M. T. Dolman testified that he stated to the defendant that agreements to pay in trade must be negotiated by the agents of the defendant and not by the agents of the plaintiff, but that otherwise such arrangements would be satisfactory to the plaintiff. Mr. William A. Dolman testified that prior to the placing of the advertisements he had a conversation with Mr. Setchel in which he stated to Mr. Setchel the necessity of bills being paid to the plaintiff promptly to the end that the plaintiff in turn could make its payments promptly to the newspapers and thus obtain the benefit of certain liberal discounts which were made to the plaintiff by the newspapers and which enabled the plaintiff to give to its patrons more liberal terms. Before "Keaton Week" had ended no further communications, oral or written, were had between the witnesses above named.

The plaintiff pleaded its claim in five separate counts. The defendant denied many of the allegations, but as to the newspapers, it admitted that it employed the plaintiff to place the advertising, but contended that the advertising was limited to $1,200 and that it was to be paid for in trade and that each application for advertisements should have indorsed thereon a stipulation to that effect.

After the "Keaton Week" had taken place, the plaintiff paid the bills which it had incurred and asked the defendant to pay it. The defendant did not do so and this action was commenced. The defendant does not claim that it did not authorize everything done which the plaintiff did, nor does it claim any defect in the performance by the plaintiff, except as we shall note.

[1-4] Using the language of defendant: "The issues were (1) Whether the agency was authorized to place advertising to the extent of $1,200 and no more; (2) whether such advertising was to be placed only upon condition that the newspapers would take payment therefor in trade and (3) whether in any event the defendant's liability to pay therefor was to the newspapers or to the agency." The defendant does not follow this order in briefing, but the gravamen of its complaint is that the issues so enumerated were not properly presented by reason of certain errors committed at the trial. In assignments 1, 3, 4, 6, and 9 the defendant complains of the admission of evidence showing payments made by the plaintiff. It asserts the plaintiff in making the payments acted as a volunteer. We think it did not do so. Paragraph 4 of the letter written August 12, 1927, shows that defendant was to pay the plaintiff and that the plaintiff was to pay the newspapers, receive the discount, and retain the discount to its own use. There was other evidence which clearly authorized, at least by implication, plaintiff to pay the other expenses which it was expressly authorized to incur. The defendant complains because evidence of usage was introduced. It was in the nature of a description of the business in hand which is somewhat out of the ordinary. Among other things, it showed the following: As to a newspaper, an advertising agency undertakes to solicit and finally prepare for insertion advertising matter and to collect therefor and then to pay the newspaper. In turn the newspaper gives to the agency liberal discounts on the payments which are made promptly. As to the advertiser, the agency undertakes to inform itself of his wants and needs and express them in the most effective form for insertion in a newspaper, to select the place in the newspaper where the advertisement is to be inserted, to obtain the most efficient and economical space, and make all arrangements therefor. On all of these matters it undertakes to be informed as fully as the proprietors of newspapers. Both as to the newspaper and as to the advertiser it undertakes to do perfect work. In the interest of the newspaper and also in the interest of the advertiser it undertakes to make payments promptly, obtain discounts for the prompt payments, and give the advertiser the benefit of the cheapest service possible. Mr. Dolman testified that he stated these matters to Mr. Setchel. Continuing, he testified that said facts were the general usage. Evidence of the covenants of standard forms of contracts used by agencies and newspapers was admitted. We think the trial court did not err in admitting it. It was but a method of showing what the nature of one of these transactions is in the absence of express covenants to the contrary. As the contract, if any, between the plaintiff and defendant rested in parol the evidence just referred to was not improper. Letters written by the parties after the end of "Keaton Week" were introduced. The defendant asserts that they were improperly received and were in the nature of self-serving declarations. The point is not sustained by the record. As recited in paragraph 2 of the letter dated August 12, 1927, Mr. Setchel endeavored to hold the contract open until it was confirmed by the defendant's "permanent board of directors." As neither a confirmation nor objection of defendant's "permanent board of directors" was sent forward before the plaintiff had fully performed everything by it to be done and performed, at least as to some parts of the agreement, the terms were not agreed to. Until all communications, written or oral, made before the trial were received and considered, the jury under the circumstances was not in a position to ascertain exactly what had been agreed to and what had not been agreed to. From what has been said above it is patent that defendant's motion to strike out the written estimate dated August 10, 1927, was properly denied, and the same comment applies to the motion to strike the letter dated August 12, 1927.

ocritical and rests on a typographical error. The letter dated August 12th contained statements regarding the times within which payment should be made. The letter dated August 19th contained a list of the amounts that would be due each paper. Instruction No. VII clearly refers to both letters, but inadvertently repeats 19th instead of using 12th when referring to the letter which specified the times of payments.

The defendant further complains of instruction No. VII and asserts that it ignores conflicts in the evidence and assumes facts in so far as the last sentence stated the amount expended by the plaintiff and the commission thereon. We think it does not do so. That the plaintiff paid all bills incurred by it was not a disputed fact. That the total sum so paid was $2,075.79 was not a disputed fact. Under what circumstances the plaintiff was entitled to be repaid by the defendant was the subject-matter of other instructions. The instruction under attack told the jury that if it found those circumstances in favor of the plaintiff then the jury could, under certain circumstances, enumerating them, add to its verdict fifteen per cent. as commission. It went no further.

[7, 8] The trial court refused to give defendant's proposed instruction No. II. That instruction purported to state the law as to the authority of this plaintiff to pay the newspapers and thereafter collect from the defendant. It purports to follow Civil Code, § 2343. That section states the law as to an agent's obligation to a third person. In this case we are considering the rights and obligations between principal and agent. In 2 C. J. 793, the rule is stated as follows: "Except where the contract of agency contains stipulations contrary to or inconsistent with any right of the agent to * * * reimbursement for liabilities or expenditures incurred in the furtherance of the agency, an agent ordinarily is entitled * * * to reimbursement from his principal for all advances and expenditures properly made in carrying into effect the purposes of the agency." The text cites, among other authorities, Thompson-Houston Electric Co. v. Central R. Co., 6 Cal. Unrep. 202, 55 P. 777. Applying that rule to the instant case, there was nothing precluding the plaintiff from making the payments. There was no covenant in the contract limiting its right so to do.

[9] Complaint is also made because the trial court refused to give defendant's requested instruction No. IV. The court did not err. The instruction was an improper statement of the law. Among other things it purported to withdraw the letter dated August 12, 1927, as being no part of the evidence of the contract between the parties. To have so held would have been to commit reversible error.

The defendant asserts that the judgment was excessive in the sum of $50. The plaintiff admits the fact and asks that the judgment be modified accordingly. Therefore the words "the sum of two thousand three hundred and eighty-nine and two one hundredths ($2,389.02)" contained in the judgment are changed to read as follows: "the sum of two thousand three hundred and thirty-nine and two one hundredths ($2,339.02)."

As so modified the judgment is affirmed, and the plaintiff will recover its costs on this appeal.

KAUTZ v. ZURICH GENERAL ACCIDENT & LIABILITY INS. CO., Limited.*

TUDHOPE v. SAME.

Civ. 7344, 7320.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California.

Nov. 7, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 6, 1930. Hearing
Granted by Supreme Court Jan. 5, 1931.

1. Insurance ⇨146(1).

Courts endeavor to carry out policy as made and at same time prevent, if possible, exceptions and conditions from wholly devouring policy.

2. Insurance ⇨435.

Indorsement in automobile liability policy providing that policy shall apply to persons "legally operating automobile" held not intended to limit policy to instances where negligence is not made penal by statute.

3. Insurance ⇨435.

Trial court's construction that assured operating automobile while intoxicated was "legally operating automobile" within policy held consistent with true intent of parties.

Upon the automobile liability policy involved was an "omnibus coverage indorsement" which provided that the policy was extended to apply to any person while riding in or "legally operating any of the automobiles described."

4. Appeal and error ⇨1008(1).

Where trial court's construction of policy appears consistent with true intent of parties, appellate court will not substitute another interpretation, though equally tenable.

5. Insurance ⇨309.

To avoid policy for violation of specified material provisions, policy must contain declaration violation shall have such effect (Civ. Code, § 2611).

6. Insurance ⇨309.

If provision in policy is material to risk, though violation be not declared ground for avoiding policy, noncompliance will nevertheless constitute defense (Civ. Code, § 2611).

7. Insurance ⇨668(4).

Whether stipulation in liability policy that automobile "is garaged or principally used" in certain place was material held fact question.

The appellate court could not say as a matter of law that the stipulation was not a material provision of the policy. Whether it was material was a question to be determined from all the facts and circumstances by the trial court.

8. Insurance ⇨332¼.

Proof of noncompliance with condition in liability policy that automobile was maintained in certain place, and that fact was material to risk, is defense.

9. Appeal and error ⇨205.

In action on automobile liability policy, excluding evidence of noncompliance with stipulation that automobile "is garaged or principally used" in certain place held prejudicial error, notwithstanding offer did not expressly include evidence of increased risk.

Defendant's offer of proof did not expressly include evidence that alleged failure to comply with stipulations increased risk further than that counsel stated that lower rate was charged in the place stipulated than in the place where the automobile was actually maintained. Proof of the fact that the provision was not complied with was the foundation of the defense, and, where this was excluded, the defendant was not bound to offer all the facts which would authorize a judgment in its favor, as it will be presumed under such circumstances that it could have proved them in the absence of a ruling rendering further evidence immaterial.

Appeals from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Actions by Anna Irene Kautz and by Lesley Tudhope, by her guardian ad litem, George Tudhope, against the Zurich General Accident & Liability Insurance Company, Limited. From judgments in favor of plaintiffs, defendant appeals.

Reversed.

J. Hampton Hoge, of San Francisco, and J. E. McCurdy, of San Mateo (A. Dal Thomson, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Jered A. Maguire, of San Francisco, and James T. O'Keefe, of Redwood City, for respondent Tudhope.

Norman S. Menifee, of San Francisco, for respondent Kautz.

PER CURIAM.

The above actions were brought to recover on a policy of insurance issued by Zurich General Accident & Liability Insurance Company, Limited, a corporation, to Stella Bayne, who is designated therein as the assured. Defendant corporation agreed for the period of one year commencing December 7, 1927, to indemnify the assured against loss from legal liability for damages caused by bodily injury accidentally suffered as the result of the ownership, maintenance, or use of a certain automobile. Upon the policy was an "omnibus coverage indorsement," which read as follows: "The policy to which this endorsement is attached is hereby extended to apply to any person or persons (other than the assured named in Special Condition 1) while riding in or legally operating any of the automobiles described in Special Condition 5, and any person, firm, or corporation legally responsible for the operation thereof, provided, such use or operation is within the permission of the named assured, or if the named assured is an individual, with the permission of an adult member of the named assured's household other than a chauffeur or a domestic servant, and provided also that this endorsement shall not be available to any automobile garage, sales agency, and/or service station, nor to any agent or employee thereof, and provided further that indemnity under the said policy shall inure first to the named assured and then (as to the remainder, if any) to any other person entitled thereto."

At the time of its issuance, the policy contained certain special conditions, among which were the following: "2. Address of insured 2742 Filbert Street, San Francisco. * * * 9. The automobiles are principally maintained and garaged in the city or town of Los Altos. 10. The automobiles are principally used in the city or town of Los Altos and in the vicinity of said city or town." On March 21, 1928, an indorsement referring to the above conditions was attached to the policy. This indorsement was as follows: "Special Conditions 2, 9, and 10 of the policy to which this endorsement is attached are hereby amended to show that the address of the assured is now 201 Buena Vista Avenue, Mill Valley, California, and that the automobile covered is maintained, garaged, and principally used in the city or town of Mill Valley, California. This endorsement to be effective as of noon (12:01 a. m. or 12:00 noon) of the 21st day of March, 1928. This endorsement is issued subject to such agreements, conditions, provisions, declarations and warranties as are contained in the policy to which it is attached, if not inconsistent herewith. * * *" Pursuant to the statute (Stats. 1919, p. 776), there was inserted in the policy a provision "that in case judgment shall be secured against the insured in an action brought by the injured person * * * then an action may be brought against the company on the policy and subject to its terms and limitations by such injured person."

On November 18, 1928, the plaintiff Tudhope, due to the negligent operation of the automobile by one Earle L. Drais, who was driving the same by permission of the assured, accidentally suffered bodily injuries. An action to recover damages therefor was filed by said plaintiff against Drais, and on April 12, 1929, a judgment in the sum of $2,750 and costs, which has become final, was recovered against him. Execution issued thereon, and the same was returned wholly unsatisfied, whereupon demand for the amount of the judgment was made upon defendant corporation and refused. Plaintiff Kautz, who was also riding in the automobile with Drais, suffered injuries in the same accident, and on May 7, 1929, recovered against the latter a judgment for damages in the sum of $2,500, with costs, based upon his negligent operation of the car. This judgment has also become final. Execution issued thereon against Drais was returned wholly unsatisfied, and a demand for payment of the judgment was refused by defendant corporation. In the present actions, by which plaintiff sought to recover the amounts of said judgments from defendant company, the above facts were alleged, and as defenses thereto defendant averred that Drais was not legally operating the automobile at the time plaintiffs were injured, and, further, that by the indorsement hereinbefore referred to it was provided that the automobile should be maintained, garaged, and principally used in the city or town of Mill Valley; that contrary thereto the automobile was on the date of the accident, and for a long time prior thereto had been, maintained, garaged, and principally used in the city and county of San Francisco, and that this fact materially affected the risk. The questions were submitted for decision upon the same evidence. The trial court found in accordance with the allegations of the complaints and against the defendant upon the defenses mentioned. Judgments from which defendant has appealed were entered accordingly. The evidence shows without dispute that Drais at the time of the accident was intoxicated, and defendant contends that the court consequently erred in its conclusion that the driver was legally operating the automobile within the meaning of the policy, and also that evidence tending to prove the alleged breach of the policy was improperly excluded. The appeals were presented and will be considered together.

[1] It was held in Pacific Heating & Ventilating Co. v. Williamsburgh, etc., Ins. Co., 158 Cal. 367, 111 P. 4, 5, that, while a policy of insurance, like other contracts, must be construed according to the language and terms used therein to arrive at their true sense and meaning and courts will not undertake to relieve parties from the plain stipulations of the policy, still the rule is well established that provisos and exceptions must be strictly construed against the insurer, who is bound to use such language as to make the conditions, specifications, and provisions thereof clear to the ordinary mind, and, in case it fails to do so, any ambiguity or reasonable doubt must be resolved in favor of the assured. In each of the following cases the policy was similar in form to the one in question, and the insurer denied liability on the ground that the driver, not having procured an operator's license, was illegally operating the automobile. It was held that, notwithstanding such failure, the car was being legally operated within the meaning of the policy. Odden v. Union Indemnity Co. (Wash.) 286 P. 59; Fagiani v. General Accident, etc., Corporation, Limited, (Cal. App.) 287 P. 377. In the case last cited, the court said: "Under a liberal definition of the term, one is not 'legally operating' an automobile when he is driving it in violation of any provision of law, but obviously the term was not used in that broad sense in the policy in question, because to give it that meaning would be to destroy the protection which the policy purports to give to persons driving the automobile with the permission of the owner. It is a matter of common knowledge that nearly every automobile accident is due to a breach of some statutory provision." The court suggested that the provision related to the manner of operating the automobile, but this construction no less than the one urged by the insurer in that case would tend to destroy the value of this character of insurance; it also being a matter of common knowledge that the majority of automobile accidents are caused by the failure to observe the statutory regulations respecting the driver's condition as to sobriety, and the manner of operating the car; such violations with few exceptions being made criminal offenses. But, as the court further said, after referring to the fact, which is true here, that the exemption claimed by the insurer was not inserted in the "exclusion" clause of the policy, and stating that this might properly be considered in construing the contract: "It is not necessary to determine what was intended by the use of the term 'legally operating,' but it is sufficient to show that it is uncertain whether it was the intention of the parties to the contract to give it the meaning for which appellant [the insurer] contends." As was aptly said in Pacific Heating, etc., Co. v. Williamsburgh, etc., Ins. Co., supra, with respect to the rule of construction where the provisions of the policy are ambiguous: "This rule is based upon the fact that the contract of insurance is drawn by the insurer, and in it are usually placed many exceptions, conditions, and forfeitures deliberately and purposely by the insurer so as to avoid liability, and the ordinary person in paying a premium and accepting a policy does not read, or, if he does read, he cannot understand the many conditions, exemptions, and exceptions contained therein. * * * Therefore the courts endeavor to carry out the contracts as made by the parties, and, at the same time, prevent, if possible, the exceptions and conditions from wholly devouring the policy."

[2-4] While the meaning of the provision cannot be determined with certainty, yet when the whole contract is considered in connection with what the parties appear to have had in mind, namely, indemnity against the consequences of the negligent use or operation of the automobile, it is reasonably clear that it was not the intention to limit the policy to the few instances where the negligent act or omission is not made penal by the statute. The construction given the instrument by the trial court appears to be consistent with the true intent of the parties, and, where that is the case, the appellate court will not substitute another interpretation, though it seem equally tenable. Slama Tire Protector Co. v. Ritchie, 31 Cal. App. 555, 161 P. 25; Manley v. Pacific Indemnity, etc., Co., 79 Cal. App. 641, 250 P. 710.

[5-7] As stated, the indorsement of March 21, 1928, amended certain of the "special conditions" in the policy, namely, conditions 9 and 10, by providing "that the automobile covered is maintained, garaged, and principally used in the city or town of Mill Valley, California." The policy also contained the following provision: "This policy is made and accepted subject to the general conditions, special conditions, and warranties hereinafter set forth, together with such other general conditions, special conditions, and warranties as may be endorsed hereon or added hereto in like manner as if the same were respectively repeated and incorporated herein, and compliance with such general conditions, special conditions, and warranties shall be a condition precedent to the right of recovery hereunder." While no particular form of words is necessary to create a warranty (Civ. Code, § 2604), here the statement quoted is not found among the schedule of warranties in the policy, but is designated in the policy as one of the special conditions. The effect intended by these provisions is obscurely expressed, and, in case of doubt as to the construction to be given where the meaning of the instrument is not plain, it has been held that "the court should lean against that construction which imposes upon the assured the obligation of a warranty." National Bank, etc., v. Union Insurance Co., etc., 88 Cal. 497, 504, 26 P. 509, 22 Am. St. Rep. 324. The statute provides that "a policy may declare that a violation of specified provisions thereof shall avoid it, otherwise the breach of an immaterial provision does not avoid the policy." Civ. Code, § 2611. To meet the terms of this section, however, the policy must contain a declaration that a violation of the specified provisions thereof shall avoid it, and it was held in Everett v. Standard Accident Insurance Co., 45 Cal. App. 332, 345, 187 P. 996, 1001, that a clause, in substantially the same language as that above quoted, requiring compliance with the provisions of the policy as a condition precedent to a recovery thereunder, fell short of the declaration required by the statute. As the court said: "If such had been the intention, the policy should have so declared in clear and unmistakable terms."

But if the provision in question be in fact material to the risk, though its violation be not declared a ground for avoiding the policy, a noncompliance therewith will nevertheless constitute a defense to an action on the policy. Victoria Steamship Co. v. Western Assurance Co., etc., 167 Cal. 348, 139 P. 807; Everett v. Standard Accident Insurance Co., supra. The authorities recognize the reasonableness of the classification and premium charges based upon the place where automobiles are kept and used (Brest v. Commissioner of Insurance [Mass.] 169 N. E. 657), and we cannot say as a matter of law that the stipulation that the automobile "is maintained, garaged, or principally used" in Mill Valley was not a material provision of the policy. Whether it was material in the sense that a noncompliance increased the hazard or that the stipulation influenced the insurer in fixing the rate of the premium was a question to be determined from all the facts and circumstances by the trial court. McEwen v. New York Life Ins. Co., 23 Cal. App. 694, 139 P. 242. Defendant in this connection sought to prove that, contrary to the stipulation in the policy, the automobile was garaged in San Francisco and not in Mill Valley. The court excluded the evidence on the ground that the fact would be immaterial. While defendant's offer of proof did not expressly include evidence that the alleged failure to comply with this provision increased the risk further than that its counsel stated that a lower rate was charged in Mill Valley than in San Francisco, proof of the fact that the provision was not complied with was the foundation of the defense, and, where this was excluded, it has been held that a party is not bound to offer all the facts which would authorize a judgment in his favor, as it will be presumed under such circumstances that he could have proved them in the absence of a ruling rendering further evidence immaterial. Brundage v. Mellon, 5 N. D. 72, 63 N. W. 209; Loeb v. Willis, 100 N. Y. 231, 3 N. E. 177; Murphey v. Brown, 12 Ariz. 268, 100 P. 801.

[8, 9] Proof that contrary to the terms of the policy the automobile was garaged in San Francisco and that this fact was material to the risk would have constituted a defense to the action (Victoria Steamship Co. v. Western Assurance Co., etc., supra; Everett v. Standard Accident Ins. Co., supra), and the exclusion of evidence on this issue was prejudicially erroneous. For this reason the judgments must be reversed.

The judgments appealed from are accordingly reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Charles L. Allison, Judge.

Action by James G. Early against L. D. Owens, Jr., and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Otto A. Gerth, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Howard F. Shepherd, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

MARKS, Acting P. J.

L. D. Owens, Jr., was a real estate broker, duly licensed under the laws of California, doing business under the name of L. D. Owens Company. W. J. Caverley was a salesman working out of the office of this company.

The complaint in this action alleges: That on or about October 27, 1926, appellant was the owner of ten acres of land near Rialto in the county of San Bernardino of the reasonable value of $20,000; that he was also the owner of a promissory note in the principal sum of $15,000 secured by a deed of trust upon real property in the county of Los Angeles; that he was also the owner of an improved lot located on Melrose avenue in the city of Los Angeles of the reasonable value of $20,000; and that at said time Fannie Jacobs was the owner of four improved lots on Santa Monica boulevard in the city of Los Angeles of the reasonable value of $70,000. The complaint further alleged that on the 27th day of October, 1926, respondents were employed by appellant as his agents and brokers to sell and trade his property together with the sum of $1,250 for the Fannie Jacobs property at the agreed price of $88,000; that the exchange was fully consummated and the conveyances made and delivered concluding the transfers; that appellant paid respondents the sum of $1,965 for their services in consummating the exchange; and, further, that at the time of, and before the exchange, respondents had received a listing of the Fannie Jacobs property for a sum approximating $70,000, at which price she was then willing to sell; that this fact was concealed by respondents from appellant; that in consummating the exchange, respondents, without the knowledge of appellant, kept for themselves the ten-acre orange and lemon grove near Rialto, and ever since such time have held the legal title thereto without the authority or consent of appellant. The complaint further alleged that upon discovering these facts appellant demanded that respondents return to him the Rialto property and the sum of $1,965 paid as commission. This demand was refused. This action was brought to obtain a judgment decreeing that the title to the Rialto property was held by respondents in trust for appellant, and that respondents be ordered to convey said property to him; or that appellant be given judgment against respondent in the sum of $21,965.

The answer of respondents denied all of the allegations of the complaint upon which fraud on their part could be predicated. They alleged that the L. D. Owens Company was the agent for appellant and for Fannie Jacobs in making the exchange of properties, and that this agency was known to both principals, together with the fact that commissions were paid by both of them. The answer further alleged that the $15,000 promissory note was secured by a second deed of trust and was of the reasonable market value of not more than $12,500; that the Melrose avenue property was subject to a mortgage of $5,000 and that the equity of appellant therein was of a value of not more than $9,500; that the Rialto property of appellant did not have a reasonable market value of more than $8,000; that the property of Fannie Jacobs was of the reasonable market value of $75,000 or more and was subject to incumbrances in the total sum of $36,750, and that she had listed said property for sale with the L. D. Owens Company for the sum of $70,310 in cash. It was further alleged that the exchange value put by appellant upon his property was greatly in excess of its market value, and that to meet this inflated value and to consummate the trade, Fannie Jacobs placed the value of her property at $88,000. It was further alleged that Fannie Jacobs was willing to accept appellant's Melrose avenue property in the exchange, but was unwilling to accept either the promissory note or the Rialto orange and lemon grove, and that these had to be sold and reduced to cash to consummate the transaction; and that, with the full knowledge and consent of appellant, the promissory note was purchased by L. D. Owens, Jr., for $13,800 and the Rialto property for $7,500, which sums were paid by him to Fannie Jacobs and the trade thus consummated; that appellant indorsed the promissory note and deeded the Rialto property to Fannie Jacobs, who in turn conveyed these properties to L. D. Owens, Jr.

The trial court found the allegations of the answer true, and that respondents had informed appellant that the price of $88,000 fixed upon the Fannie Jacobs property was a trade value only, and that it could be purchased for very much less than this amount. It further found that the sale of the promissory note and the Rialto property by Fannie Jacobs to L. D. Owens, Jr., was made with the knowledge and consent of appellant. It further found that the net value of the property traded and money paid by appellant for the Jacobs property totaled the sum of $33,550, and that the net value of the Fannie Jacobs property received by appellant was the sum of $38,250. It further found that there was no fraud or deceit practiced upon appellant by respondents or either of them, and that appellant had not been damaged in any sum, but had received in the exchange property of more value than the worth of the money and property paid and conveyed by him to Fannie Jacobs. Upon these findings the court entered judgment in favor of respondents.

[1] Appellant's chief contention upon which he relies for a reversal of the judgment is that the evidence fails to support the findings of the trial court to the effect that the purchase of the Rialto property by L. D. Owens, Jr., was with the knowledge and consent of appellant. He relies upon the well-established rule of law that an agent is required to disclose to his principal all information within his knowledge concerning a transaction being consummated for such principal, and that an agent cannot make a secret profit when acting for the principal. He relies upon the fact that the valuations of the respective parcels of his property were set forth in the exchange agreements and maintains that these valuations were binding upon all of the parties. He also contends that respondents should have obtained for him the Fannie Jacobs property at a price of $70,310 instead of $88,000.

[2] We have examined the record at length and have reached the conclusion that the findings of the trial court are amply supported by the evidence. Both respondents told appellant that the valuation of $88,000 placed upon the Fannie Jacobs property was for trading purposes only, and that it could be purchased for much less than that sum. They told appellant that Fannie Jacobs needed money very badly and could not accept all of his property in trade, and that the orange and lemon grove and promissory note would have to be liquidated and reduced to cash before the transaction could be consummated. It is well established that respondents tried to get appellant to take the orange grove for $7,500 and pay this amount into the escrow so that the transaction could be closed. In fact, L. D. Owens, Jr., testified that appellant knew that he had taken title to the orange and lemon grove and had told him where he could sell the orange crop. There is ample evidence in the record to support the court's finding that this information was conveyed to appellant during the negotiations between the parties and before the transaction was completed.

Appellant admitted that respondents tried to get him to repurchase the orange grove for $7,500, but maintained that this offer was made after the exchange was completed. Appellant's testimony in this respect was thoroughly impeached by his testimony in a deposition given before the trial. In this deposition he testified that he knew that the prices fixed on his properties were fixed above their actual values and upon an exchange basis, and that he knew that the Fannie Jacobs property could be purchased for a sum much less than the $88,000 named in the agreement of exchange. In this deposition he testified that L. D. Owens, Jr., told him that Fannie Jacobs would not take the Rialto property on the exchange, and that it would have to be disposed of before the exchange was completed, so that Fannie Jacobs could receive money therefor.

It further appears from the undisputed evidence in the record that the contracts of exchange were placed in escrow with the Guaranty Building & Loan Association of Hollywood, Cal. In this escrow and as a part thereof are instructions to the escrow holder signed by Fannie Jacobs and her husband in which it appears that the Rialto grove was to be sold to Owens for the sum of $7,500 and the promissory note and deed of trust for the sum of $12,750, she receiving for her property, through escrow, the Melrose avenue property of appellant and cash in the sum of $20,800. An assignment of the note and deed of trust from Fannie Jacobs and her husband to L. D. Owens, Jr., was placed in this escrow, as was a deed to the Rialto property conveying it from Fannie Jacobs and her husband to L. D. Owens, Jr. A further instruction was deposited by L. D. Owens, Jr., in this same escrow instructing the escrow holder to deliver the promissory note and deed of trust to the Los Angeles Home Builders upon its payment of $13,800 into the escrow. This same instrument recited that this sum, together with the money paid into escrow by Owens for the Rialto property, be paid to Fannie Jacobs. It clearly appears from the escrow instructions of Fannie Jacobs that the promissory note and deed of trust and the Rialto grove were being sold by her to L. D. Owens, Jr., at a price fixed by her. Before the close of the escrow Owens succeeded in selling the note and deed of trust to the Los Angeles Home Builders. Had appellant examined the various instruments and instructions deposited in escrow, he would have been informed of the entire transaction and would have known every detail of it about which he now complains.

[3] It is well-settled law in California that the holder of an escrow is agent for all parties up to the time that the escrow is closed. Shreeves v. Pearson, 194 Cal. 699, 230 P. 448; McDonald v. Huff, 77 Cal. 279, 19 P. 499; Bartley v. Fraser, 16 Cal. App. 560, 117 P. 683; First National Bank v. Caldwell, 84 Cal. App. 438, 258 P. 411; Law v. Title Guarantee & Trust Co., 91 Cal. App. 621, 267 P. 565. In this case the escrow was not closed until after all of the documents we have referred to were placed therein.

[4] It is also well-settled law in this state that notice given to or possessed by an agent within the scope of his employment and in connection with, and during his agency, is notice to the principal. Section 2332, Civ. Code; Bogart v. George K. Porter Co., 193

Cal. 197, 223 P. 959, 31 A. L. R. 1045; Waldeck v. Hedden, 89 Cal. App. 485, 265 P. 340. In the case of Shamlian v. Wells, 197 Cal. 716, 242 P. 483, 484, it was held as follows: "The general rule is well settled that the knowledge of the agent in the course of his agency is the knowledge of the principal. 1 Cal. Jur. 846, and cases cited. It rests on the assumption that the agent will communicate to his principal all information acquired in the course of his agency, and when the knowledge of the agent is ascertained the constructive notice to the principal is conclusive. 1 Cal. Jur. 853, and cases cited."

In the case of Watson v. Sutro, 86 Cal. 500, 24 P. 172, 176, 25 P. 64, it was held as follows: "Knowledge, by notice to attorney or counsel or agent, acquired during the negotiation for a purchase, is constructive notice to their principal. If it were otherwise, it would cause great inconvenience, and notice would be avoided in every case by employing agents." See cases cited in 2 Lead. Cas. Eq. pt. 1, pp. 133, 134. That notice to an agent is notice to the principal has been held in this state ever since Connelly v. Peck, decided in 1856, and reported in 6 Cal. 348; followed in May v. Borel, 12 Cal. 91; Stanley v. Green, 12 Cal. 148; Hunter v. Watson, 12 Cal. 363, 73 Am. Dec. 543. See other cases referred to in Gear's California Index-Digest, on page 97. Notice to counsel or attorney is constructive notice to client: Bierce v. Red Bluff Co., 31 Cal. 161 (decided in 1866), and Donald v. Beals, 57 Cal. 399. All these cases in regard to an agent apply to an attorney or counsel, for they are a species of agent. Justice Bradley, in the Distilled Spirits Case, 11 Wall. 367 [20 L. Ed. 167], states the principle on which the rule rests. "The general rule," says the learned judge, "that a principal is bound by the knowledge of his agent, is based on the principle of law that it is the agent's duty to communicate to his principal the knowledge which he has respecting the subject-matter of negotiation, and the presumption that he will perform that duty." It will be of no avail to the purchaser that the agent omitted to communicate what he ascertained to his principal. Williamson v. Brown, 15 N. Y. 359. In other words, one who acts through another will be presumed to know all that the agent learns during the transaction, whether it is actually communicated to him or not. There is no difference in this respect between actual and constructive notice; for, if there were, an agent would be employed whenever it was convenient to remain in ignorance. Bank of United States v. Davis, 2 Hill [N. Y.] 451-461. Or, as the reason of the rule was stated by Lord Brougham: "Policy, and the safety of the public, forbid a person to deny knowledge while he is so dealing, as to keep himself ignorant, or so that he may keep himself ignorant, and yet all the while let his agent know, and himself profit by that knowledge." Kennedy v. Green, 3 Mylne & K. 699-719. It is plain that the ordinary dealings of men could not be carried on without imperiling the rights of property to a degree which could hardly be conceived, and infinite wrong done to innocent persons, unless the rules above pointed out were established canons of law."

We must therefore conclude that appellant had actual notice from respondents that L. D. Owens, Jr., was purchasing the Rialto property from Fannie Jacobs, and that he also had constructive notice through his agent, the escrow holder, of every detail of the transaction before the exchange was consummated. Appellant cannot now be heard to complain because his agent, Owen purchased a portion of the property from Fannie Jacobs, the party to whom appellant conveyed it, as this was all disclosed in the escrow instructions. Respondents received no secret profit. Furthermore, Owens paid his own money to Fannie Jacobs for the Rialto property, the benefits from which payment are still retained by appellant, and nowhere does it appear that he ever made any offer to restore to Owens the money paid out by him.

It further appears that appellant gave to Fannie Jacobs just the property he intended to give her and received from her in exchange the identical property which he expected to obtain. The value of the property given, and the value of the property received, had been raised above their actual market values to fictitious trade values by both parties to the transaction. Appellant received a greater value in the Jacobs property than he gave to Fannie Jacobs in his property. He has shown no damage resulting from this transaction and under the circumstances of this case he cannot complain. Rouse v. Morgan (Cal. App.) 291 P. 441.

As we have concluded from the record before us that the findings of the trial court are amply supported by the evidence, that there was no fraud practiced upon appellant in the transaction, that no secret profit was made by respondents, that appellant was in no way damaged by anything said or done by any of the other parties to the transfers, we cannot disturb the judgment.

Judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Warren V. Tryon, Judge.

Action by the Pacific Coast Engineering Company against the Detroit Fidelity & Surety Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Reversed.

John Ralph Wilson, of San Francisco, for appellant.

George F. Snyder, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiff, Pacific Coast Engineering Company, had a contract for the construction of the Sacramento Memorial Auditorium in Sacramento. On November 25, 1925, plaintiff entered into a contract with W. H. Worswick, whereby Worswick agreed to furnish all of the labor and equipment, including staging, planking, machinery, rigging, etc., necessary to commence and complete the erection and field painting of all structural steel for said memorial auditorium. Defendant, Detroit Fidelity & Surety Company, a corporation, executed and delivered to plaintiff a bond for the faithful performance of the contract by Worswick. Worswick commenced work in January, 1926, and during that month erected 67 tons of steel. On February 3, 1926, plaintiff paid Worswick $200, on February 16th, $200, and on February 19th, $250. Worswick erected no steel subsequent to February 17, 1926.

On said February 17, 1926, Worswick abandoned said contract, and the plaintiff took over the performance of the work required by said contract and completed said work. After the work was completed, plaintiff brought this action against the defendant bonding company as Worswick's surety. The case was tried by the court without a jury, and judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff, from which judgment the defendant appeals.

Appellant's first contention is this: "Worswick's contract was cancelled by plaintiff; the contract was thereupon at an end and plaintiff could not, thereafter, maintain an action for its breach against Worswick or against defendant as his surety."

We think this contention must be sustained. The trial court found: "It is not true the said contract was cancelled or rescinded." This finding is not supported by the evidence. As above stated, Worswick abandoned his contract on February 17, 1926. Thereafter, and on March 1, 1926, after Worswick had abandoned the work, the plaintiff wrote him a letter as follows:

"Mr. W. H. Worswick, 444 California Street, San Francisco, California.

"Dear Sir: Inasmuch as you are in default in your performance of the agreement entered into between yourself and the undersigned, Pacific Coast Engineering Company, on the 25th day of November, 1925, for the erection of the steel work on the Sacramento Memorial Auditorium at Sacramento, and this default has continued for a period of more than ten days to our great damage, this will serve to notify you that your contract above mentioned is now terminated and cancelled (italics ours).

"Yours very truly,

"Pacific Coast Engineering Company

"By [signed] J. J. Coney, President."

[1] It is a familiar principle of suretyship that any act of the creditor, by which the principal is discharged from liability, will also discharge the surety. Lamb v. Wahlenmaier, 144 Cal. 91-95, 77 P. 765, 103 Am. St. Rep. 66; Montgomery v. Sayre, 100 Cal. 182, 34 P. 646, 38 Am. St. Rep. 271; secs. 2819 and 2840, Civ. Code; Montgomery v. Sayre, 91 Cal. 210, 27 P. 648; 32 Cyc. 151; Holden v. Mensinger, 175 Cal. 300-304, 165 P. 950.

[2] Therefore, if Worswick was discharged from his contract, appellant was discharged from any liability under the bond. In the letter above quoted, plaintiff notified Worswick that the contract was "terminated and cancelled." We see no escape from the conclusion that, by this act on the part of plaintiff, the contract was annulled and rescinded, and the parties were in the same position as though the contract with Worswick had never been entered into. Section 1688, Civ. Code; Hayt v. Bentel (Cal. App.) 126 P. 370; Lemle v. Barry, 181 Cal. 1, 183 P. 150; House v. Piercy, 181 Cal. 247, 183 P. 807; Pearson v. Brown, 27 Cal. App. 125, 148 P. 956.

[3] The law is also well settled that it is not necessary that the notice to rescind shall be in any formal or explicit language. It is sufficient that the notice shall be given to the other party which clearly shows the intention of the person rescinding to consider the contract at an end. McNeese v. McNeese, 190 Cal. 402, 213 P. 36; Dyer Bros. Golden West Iron Works v. Central Iron Works, 72 Cal. App. 202, 237 P. 386.

Plaintiff's intention to cancel the contract with Worswick is further manifested by the fact that plaintiff took over the work and actually completed it.

[4] It is therefore clear to us that said finding of the trial court is not supported by the evidence.

[5-8] Plaintiff insists that the president of the plaintiff corporation had no authority to write the above letter of cancellation and rescission. We see no force to this contention. It is admitted in the evidence that Mr. Coney was president of plaintiff at the time of the execution and cancellation of the contract. No by-laws were introduced by respondent showing any limitation upon his authority. It was obviously a matter within the scope of plaintiff's business, and the evidence shows that, after the trouble arose, Mr. Coney actively endeavored to adjust matters, and that after March 1st the plaintiff treated Worswick's contract as canceled by its president and completed the work. Under such circumstances, plaintiff is in no position to contend that its president had no authority to cancel the contract with Worswick. Furthermore, a prima facie case of his authority was made out, which plaintiff did not attempt to overcome by introducing its by-laws. Commercial Security Co. v. Modesto Drug Co., 43 Cal. App. 162, 184 P. 964; Grummet v. Fresno Glazed Cement Pipe Co., 181 Cal. 509, 185 P. 888; Reardon v. Richmond Land Co., 21 Cal. App. 358, 131 P. 894; International M. Co. v. National R. Co., 67 Cal. App. 498, 227 P. 918.

The other contention made by appellant need not be considered.

We think the judgment must be reversed, and it is so ordered.

Evidence showed that maker of note involved, in selling trust property to third person, deposited instruments of conveyance in escrow, and that payee thereupon deposited his note and trust deed in escrow, together with reconveyance, with instructions to deliver instruments to proper persons on payment of balance due on note. As part of same transaction, third person deposited balance due on note, with instructions to pay it to payee when sale was consummated.

Action by Edith Babcock against B. Olhasso. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Haas & Dunnigan, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Frazier McIntosh, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

Mr. Justice THOMPSON delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an appeal from a judgment for the recovery of usurious interest against the payee of a promissory note.

November 27, 1924, the respondent borrowed $2,000 from the appellant. A bonus of $500 was exacted by the appellant for making the loan. The respondent executed and delivered to the appellant her promissory note for $2,500 at 8 per cent. interest per annum. The note was payable in monthly installments of $55 until June 2, 1927, at which date the balance became due. This note was secured by a trust deed upon real property belonging to the respondent. Prior to October 26, 1925, twelve installments of $55 each had been paid. These payments were first applied to the interest due, and the balance was credited upon the principal. The sum of $182.72 was thus applied to the account of interest. The balance of these payments, amounting to $477.28, was credited to the principal. This left a balance of $2,022.72 due upon the principal sum.

On the last-mentioned date the respondent sold to George W. Heckert the real property upon which she had executed the trust deed. The necessary instruments of conveyance were deposited in escrow with the Alhambra branch of the California Bank. On the same day the appellant deposited in escrow with that bank the note and trust deed, together with a reconveyance of the property, accompanied by instructions to deliver the instruments to the proper parties upon payment of the balance of principal and interest which was due upon this note. This sum was to be credited to the appellant's account. As a part of the same transaction Heckert forthwith deposited with the bank the amount due upon the note, with directions to pay it to the appellant when the purchase was consummated. This sum was subsequently paid to the appellant in satisfaction of the note, and charged against Heckert as a part of the purchase price of the property.

June 15, 1926, the respondent brought suit to recover judgment for treble the amount of interest and bonus paid to the appellant on the ground that the payments were usurious and void. The answer admits the loan substantially as it was alleged. It acknowledges the receipt of interest in the sum of $207.98. The exacting of $500 bonus is not denied. The record shows that $126.06 was paid on account of interest more than a year before the commencement of the action.

The court found that the respondent borrowed only $2,000 from the appellant; that the appellant exacted $500 bonus for the loan, and charged in addition thereto 8 per cent. interest on the sum of $2,500; that the respondent executed and delivered to the appellant her promissory note for $2,500 at 8 per cent. interest per annum, due three years from its date; that the respondent paid the appellant the full amount of the loan, together with $500 bonus and $207.98 interest; that a portion of said interest, to wit, the sum of $77.82, and the bonus were paid within one year prior to the commencement of the action; that the balance of the interest, to wit, $130.16, was paid more than one year before the commencement of the action; that the payments of bonus and interest exceeded 12 per cent. per annum of the amount borrowed, and were usurious and void. The court thereupon rendered judgment in favor of the respondent for treble the amount of $577.82, plus the additional sum of $130.16, which the court erroneously found to be $1,852.62.

[1] The undisputed evidence shows that only $126.06 was paid on account of interest prior to one year before the commencement of the action. The difference between that sum and $207.98, which was the total amount of interest paid, is $81.92. This last-mentioned sum, together with the bonus, was the amount paid on account of interest within one year prior to the commencement of the action. The court should have allowed treble the sum of $581.92 in addition to the further sum of $126.06, which aggregates the sum of $1,871.82. The appellant, however, may not complain because the court has rendered judgment for less than the evidence warrants.

[2-4] A promissory note which includes a bonus in addition to a rate of interest which in the aggregate amounts to more than 12 per cent. on the sum borrowed is illegal and void so far as the interest and bonus are concerned. Calif. Usury Law, 1. Deering's Gen. Laws of 1923, p. 1384, § 2. The principal sum loaned is, however, not forfeited. Haines v. Comm. Mtg. Co., 200 Cal. 609, 622, 254 P. 956, 255 P. 805, 53 A. L. R. 725; Baker v. Butcher (Cal. App.) 289 P. 236; Van Noy v. Goldberg, 98 Cal. App. 604, 610, 277 P. 538. The payment of usurious interest is regarded as having been exacted under restraint. It is not deemed to be a voluntary payment. 27 R. C. L. 269, § 72. Such usurious and illegal interest which has been actually paid may be recovered in an action of assumpsit. Curtis v. Thaxter, 204 Cal. 439, 268 P. 630.

Section 2 of the Usury Law, supra, provides that: "Any agreement or contract of any nature in conflict with the provisions of this section shall be null and void as to any agreement * * * to pay interest. * * *" Section 3 of this act provides a penalty against "any person * * * who shall ask, demand, receive, take, accept or charge more than twelve per centum per annum upon the sum of money actually loaned." The person exacting such usurious interest is guilty of a misdemeanor, and may be punished therefor by a fine or imprisonment. This same section further provides that: "Every person * * * who for any loan * * * of money * * * shall have paid * * * any greater sum or value than is allowed to be received under the preceding sections, one and two [to-wit 12% interest per annum on the amount actually borrowed], may either in person or [by] his or its personal representative, recover in an action at law against the person * * * who shall have taken or received the same, * * * treble the amount of the money so paid * * * providing such action shall be brought within one year after such payment. * * *"

[5] The respondent was therefore entitled to judgment for threefold the sum of $581.92, which was the amount of interest paid within one year of the time of commencing this action. The respondent was also entitled to recover the balance of the interest, to wit, $126.06, which was illegally collected from her, although it was paid more than a year before the action was brought. This last sum, however, may not be trebled. The total sum to which the respondent was entitled is $1,871.82.

[6] The only ground for reversal which the appellant seriously urges is that the usurious payments were in fact made by Heckert, the purchaser of the land, and not by Edith Babcock, the maker of the note, and that the respondent is therefore precluded from maintaining the action. The answer alleged that the final payments amounting to the sum of $2,047.88 were paid by Heckert.

The position of the appellant in this regard is stated in the following language: "Where property encumbered by a usurious lien, is transferred, subject to the lien, there can be no recovery for usury on the part of either the seller or the buyer." To support this assertion he quotes from Matthews v. Ormerd, 140 Cal. 578, 74 P. 136, 138, as follows: "The law seems to be well settled that a purchaser of mortgaged premises from the mortgagor, who takes a conveyance expressly 'subject to the mortgage,' cannot set up a taint of usury in the mortgage."

The foregoing principle, however, has no application to the present case. Heckert did not purchase the land subject to the trust deed. The trust deed was paid, satisfied, and reconveyed before Heckert took title to the property. All of the instruments, together with the entire purchase price of the property, including the amount which was necessary to satisfy the note, were placed in escrow with adequate instructions to constitute one complete transaction. The legal effect of this transaction is that Heckert bought the land from the respondent free from incumbrance, paying to the bank as her trustee the full purchase price. She applied a sufficient amount of this purchase price to satisfy the appellant's note. He thereupon reconveyed the incumbered land and canceled the note. Heckert then took title. It was one transaction. The trust deed and note were not transferred to Heckert. The respondent is therefore entitled to recover judgment for the usurious interest which she paid, pursuant to the provisions of the usury law of California.

The judgment is affirmed.

Jesse R. Carter, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Fred B. Mellmann, of Oakland, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

An appeal from a judgment annulling certain orders of the board of dental examiners of the state of California. Respondents are regularly licensed and practicing dentists. On May 16, 1929, verified accusations were filed with the board charging respondents with unprofessional conduct. The accusations were identical in form, the material portion of that filed against respondent Barron being as follows: "Pursuant to the provisions of the law of the State of California, I do hereby charge Fred T. Barron, who is and was, at all of the times herein mentioned, a regularly licensed and practicing dentist in the State of California, with unprofessional conduct as the same is defined in said law aforesaid, specifying as the basis of such charge the following facts: That the said Fred T. Barron on or about the ninth day of May, 1929, at the city of Oakland, county of Alameda, State of California, did employ certain persons as cappers and steerers to obtain business for him in the following manner, to wit: That at the time and place aforesaid said Fred T. Barron did employ radio broadcasting station KLX, operated by the Oakland Tribune, a corporation, to obtain business for him by means of the following announcements over said radio broadcasting station, to wit: 'You are now to be entertained with a program sponsored by Doctors Barron and Wilkinson, those gentle dentists. Their office is at Seventeenth and Broadway, opposite the Oakland post office. The entrance is No. 455 Seventeenth street. Doctors Barron and Wilkinson are specialists of the highest degree in the dental profession. Dr. Barron is a plate specialist and guarantees a perfect fit. He does all the work himself. You will be agreeably surprised at their prices. These gentle dentists are celebrating their first anniversary, having opened their office on May 8th, a year ago. They now have 1400 satisfied patients. Their telephone number is Oakland 1819. Telephone for an appointment. Open evenings until eight.' That said announcements were regularly broadcasted over said radio station and were heard by the general public; that said Fred T. Barron paid said radio broadcasting station a consideration for making said announcements and each of them, and it was thereby intended by said Fred T. Barron that business should be obtained by him as a result of said announcements from those who heard the same. That all of said acts above set forth are contrary to the law of the State of California."

Respondents, after demurring to the accusations, entered pleas of not guilty, and upon a hearing their licenses to practice were suspended by the board for a period of 90 days. On October 16, 1929, on petition of respondents, a writ of review issued out of the superior court of Alameda county directed to the board, which, pursuant thereto, certified its record to said court. After a hearing the court adjudged that the facts alleged in the accusations were insufficient to constitute a violation of an act entitled "An act to insure the better education of dental surgeons and to regulate the practice of dentistry in the State of California," etc. (Stats. 1915, p. 698, and amendments thereto), or any other law of the state, and by its judgment annulled the orders of suspension.

[1-5] It is urged by appellants that the acts complained of constituted the employment of persons as cappers or steerers within the meaning of section 13 of the act which provides that "any dentist may have his license revoked or suspended by the board of dental examiners for any of the following causes:

* * * (3) For unprofessional conduct or for gross ignorance or inefficiency in his profession. Unprofessional conduct is hereby defined to be: The employment of persons known as cappers or steerers, to obtain business. * * * It is not contended that any of the statements contained in the announcements were untrue, and we may say at the outset that other than the provisions of the above subdivision of the section by which advertising under any false, assumed, or fictitious name, or in any name other than the name under which he was licensed, was denominated unprofessional conduct, no law of the state prohibited advertising by a licensed dentist. A "capper" has been defined as a decoy or lure for the purpose of swindling (Standard Dictionary; Century Dictionary). A "steerer" has been held to be one who gains the confidence of the person intended to be fleeced (People v. Simmons, 125 App. Div. 234, 109 N. Y. S. 190), and who may be said to steer or lead the victim to the place where the latter is to be robbed or swindled. It is the rule that the words of a statute unless they have a technical meaning are to be interpreted according to their common acceptance and will be read and understood in their natural, ordinary, and popular sense. Ex parte Galivan, 162 Cal. 331, 122 P. 961, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 1349; Corbett v. State Board of Control, 188 Cal. 289, 204 P. 823. Whatever abuse the Legislature intended to correct by the above provisions of the act, it is clear that truthful advertising, whether by newspaper or radio, cannot by any reasonable construction of the statute be brought within its inhibitory provisions. And it is well settled that, where a board is granted the power to revoke a license for certain reasons set forth in the statute, it may not be revoked for any other or different causes not clearly within the provisions of law or by implication included therein. Kentucky State Board, etc., v. Crowell, 220 Ky. 1, 294 S. W. 818; 48 Cor. Jur.; Physicians and Surgeons, § 65, pp. 1097, 1098. While it is ordinarily sufficient to charge in the words of the statute (Suckow v. Alderson, 182 Cal. 247, 187 P. 965), here facts were pleaded which showed affirmatively that respondents' actions were not in violation of the statute and the sufficiency of the accusations was properly tested by certiorari. Dymment v. Board of Medical Examiners, 57 Cal. App. 260, 266, 207 P. 409.

No error is disclosed by the record, and the judgment is accordingly affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Del Norte County; Warren V. Tryon, Judge.

Petition for writ of mandate by Hobbs, Wall & Company against J. J. Moran. From a judgment for respondent, petitioner appeals.

Affirmed.

John L. Childs, of Crescent City, and J. F. Coonan, of Eureka, for appellant.

Geo. W. Howe, of Crescent City, for respondent.

R. L. THOMPSON, J.

This is an appeal from a judgment refusing to grant a writ of mandate to compel the treasurer of Crescent City to cash warrants which were issued by the city in payment for supplies purchased from the petitioner.

The appellant is a corporation engaged in a general merchandise business at Crescent City. The respondent was the treasurer of that city. Leo A. Dressler was a member of the city council. He was also employed on a salary as the manager of the mercantile business. He was not a stockholder in the corporation and had no direct pecuniary interest in it. He merely acted as the agent and manager thereof. During the time Dressler's relationship existed as manager of the business and member of the council, the city purchased from the petitioner merchandise and supplies of the value of $249.66. Four claims were duly presented to the city for payment of these bills. They were approved and ordered to be paid by the council. Dressler participated in this action of the council, voting to pay the claims. Warrants were accordingly issued and presented for payment to the treasurer by the petitioner. Payment of these warrants was refused. This action was then commenced to procure a writ of mandate to compel the payment of the warrants. The court held that the merchandise was purchased in violation of section 886 of the Municipal Corporation Act of California, and that the transaction was illegal. The petition for a writ was thereupon denied.

[1] It conclusively appears that Councilman Dressler, as the manager of the business from which the supplies were purchased, was indirectly interested in the transaction, and that it was therefore illegal.

Section 886 of the Municipal Corporation Act of California (Deering's Gen. Laws of Calif. for 1923, Act 5233, p. 2247) provides:

"No officer of such city or town [of the sixth class, to which Crescent City belongs] shall be interested, directly or indirectly, in any contract with such city or town, or with any of the officers thereof in their official capacity, or in doing any work or furnishing any supplies for the use of such city or town, or its officers in their official capacity; and any claim for compensation for work done, or supplies or materials furnished, in which any such officer is interested, shall be void, and if audited and allowed shall not be paid by the treasurer. Any willful violation of the provisions of this section shall be a ground for removal from office, and shall be deemed a misdemeanor, and punished as such."

This statute provides that not only the contract, which is executed under such circumstances, is void, but any claim for payment of work or supplies purchased under such circumstances shall also be illegal. Indeed, the entire transaction is void, and the treasurer, under penalty, is prohibited from paying such claims. It is therefore immaterial, in the present case, whether Dressler was a party to the original making of the contract for the supplies which are here involved, or not.

[2] The challenged claims contained several items for water furnished to the fire department of the city. A public utility corporation which is engaged in supplying customers with water is entitled to collect the value of water furnished to a city in spite of the inhibition of the Municipal Corporation Act, supra. This exemption from the application of the statute is declared to exist for the reason that a public utility corporation is compelled by law, as distinguished from contract, to supply all customers, upon demand, and such public utility corporations are subject to regulation by the Railroad Commission. Capital Gas Co. v. Young, 109 Cal. 140, 41 P. 869, 29 L. R. A. 463. However, there is no evidence in the present case that the appellant was engaged in the business of supplying the public with water. It does not appear that the mercantile company was also a public utility corporation. For that reason the items for water which were included in the challenged claims were also within the inhibition of the statute and were properly rejected as illegal.

Statutes which declare contracts or transactions with a municipality to be void when an officer of such city is privately interested therein are based on the sound principle that the officer's interests are conflicting and that it is contrary to public policy to permit an officer under such circumstances to purchase supplies for a city or participate in a contract with respect thereto. Such transactions are held to be void whether they arise from the relationship of an agency which is public, quasi-public, or private in its nature. The theory of the law is that a councilman or other officer of a city sustains the same fiduciary relationship toward the citizens of his community that a trustee bears to his c'estui que trust, and should therefore act with the utmost good faith. 2 McQuillin's Municipal Corp. (2d Ed.) p. 216, § 531; Woods v. Potter, 8 Cal. App. 41, 95 P. 1125; Berka v. Woodward, 125 Cal. 119, 57 P. 777, 45 L. R. A. 420, 73 Am. St. Rep. 31; 18 Cal. Jur. 978, § 253; 44 C. J. 89, § 2169.

It is argued that since the councilman, Dressler, was merely employed and worked for a salary as manager of the mercantile corporation, that he was not a stockholder and that he had no pecuniary interest therein, he was therefore not interested in the business to such an extent or in such a manner as to invalidate the transaction, since the supplies were purchased for the city in perfect good faith.

[3] The statute declares that a transaction consisting of the "furnishing of any supplies" for a city or town, in which an officer is "directly or indirectly" interested, shall be void. As manager of the mercantile business, which employment demanded strict loyalty to his employer, it may be inferred Dressler, as a councilman, was not free to negotiate a bargain in behalf of the city as favorable to the municipality as though these conflicting interests did not exist. Dressler's membership on the council may reasonably be expected to influence his associates in purchasing supplies for the city. The desire to favor a fellow councilman, unwarranted confidence, or carelessness in bargaining for supplies might result in a substantial loss to the city. It is not necessary to show actual fraud, dishonesty, or loss to invalidate the transaction. The purpose of the statute is to remove all indirect influence of an interested officer as well as to discourage deliberate dishonesty.

Nothing in the relationship of a public officer should prevent him from exercising absolute loyalty and undivided allegiance to the best interest of the municipality he serves.

Although Mr. Dressler had no greater interest in the transaction than is shown by the mere agency as business manager of the store from which the supplies were purchased, even though they were obtained in perfect good faith at favorable prices, still the transaction was void and the claims were illegally allowed.

In the case of Stockton P. & S. Co. v. Wheeler, 68 Cal. App. 592, 229 P. 1020, 1024, it was held that a contract with the city of Stockton for plumbing to be installed in a public building of the city was illegal and void because Charlesworth, a member of the city council, was also foreman of the sheet metal department of the hardware business with which the contract was made. The court there says:

"If his interest in the contract is such as would tend in any degree to influence him [Charlesworth] in making the contract, then the instrument is void because contrary to public policy. * * * Indeed, we think it cannot well be denied that, abstractly speaking, the interest which Charlesworth had in the petitioner's business would be sufficient to invalidate any contract made by a public officer in which he had a similar interest."

[4] Upon the same principle the vendor or party contracting with a municipality under such circumstances is also denied the right to recover upon a quantum meruit. Berka v. Woodward, 125 Cal. 119, 57 P. 777, 45 L. R. A. 420, 73 Am. St. Rep. 31; 18 Cal. Jur. 978, § 253.

Our courts have been very scrupulous in the enforcement of the spirit of statutes similar to the one which is here involved. Osborn v. Stone, 170 Cal. 480, 490, 150 P. 367; Pacific Vinegar Works v. Smith, 145 Cal. 352, 366, 78 P. 550, 104 Am. St. Rep. 42. When it appears that an officer is substantially benefited, financially or otherwise, by his participation in a contract with the municipality which he represents, the transaction is invariably declared to be illegal. Under such circumstances, in its effort to uphold the transaction, a court will not resort to fine distinctions in order to determine just what facts will constitute an "indirect interest" on the part of the officer. The case of Moody v. Shuffleton, 203 Cal. 100, 262 P. 1095, 1096, illustrates this tendency on the part of the courts. In that case H. L. Moody sold a newspaper and job printing business to his son, accepting a chattel mortgage as part payment therefor. The father was thereafter elected supervisor of the county in which the printing business was located. The son continued to supply the county with job printing, presenting his claims therefor. These claims were approved by the supervisors. The father participated in this approval. The auditor refused to draw warrants for the claims. In a suit for a writ of mandate the trial court ordered the claims to be paid. On appeal the Supreme Court reversed the judgment and said with reference to the statute which is here involved:

"The foregoing statutory pronouncements are in consonance with the well-settled policy of the common law, and numerous decisions are to be found vigorously enforcing the rule."

In rendering the decision the Supreme Court approved the following contention of the auditor that:

"The value of the security of said chattel mortgage is therefore increased by the business received by said newspaper. * * * and said H. L. Moody is benefited thereby."

It follows, in the present case, that Dressler, as manager, had such an interest in his employer's mercantile business as to preclude him from participating, as a member of the council, in the allowance of the claims.

Clearly the facts of this case bring it within the inhibition of the statute. The transaction was illegal and void. Payment of the warrants was properly refused. The writ of mandate was therefore properly denied.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Del Norte County; Warren V. Tryon, Judge.

Petition for writ of mandate by J. M. Hotchkiss, an individual doing business under the firm name and style of J. M. Hotchkiss Electric Light Plant, against J. J. Moran. From a judgment for petitioner, respondent appeals.

Affirmed.

George W. Howe, of Crescent City, for appellant.

John L. Childs, of Crescent City, and J. F. Coonan, of Eureka, for respondent.

R. L. THOMPSON, J.

This is an appeal from a judgment awarding a writ of mandate to compel the appellant, as treasurer of Crescent City, to cash certain warrants issued to the respondent, a public service corporation, in payment of the purchase price of electric energy for lighting the city.

This is a companion case to that of Hobbs, Wall & Co. (a Corporation) v. Moran, 293 P. 145, in which an opinion of this court was this day filed. The essential facts of the two cases differ materially.

The respondent is a public service corporation, engaged in the enterprise of manufacturing and marketing hydro-electric energy for lighting purposes in and about Crescent City. Hotchkiss, the president of this electric lighting corporation, was also a stockholder in a mercantile corporation doing business in the same community under the name of Hobbs, Wall & Company. Leo A. Dressler was the business manager of this mercantile establishment, working for it on a salary. He was not otherwise interested in the mercantile company. He was not a stockholder or employee of the electric lighting company. He was, at the same time, a member of the city council and chairman of the finance committee of Crescent City. The petitioner, electric lighting company, sold and furnished Crescent City with electric energy for lighting the city and its public buildings. Claims amounting to the sum of $305.82 were presented to the city for this service and allowed with the approval of Councilman Dressler. Warrants were drawn therefor and presented for payment to the appellant as treasurer of the city. Payment of these warrants was refused on the ground that the contract for lighting the city was illegal and void under the provisions of section 886 of the Municipal Corporation Act of California (Deering's Gen. Laws of Calif. for 1923, Act 5233, p. 2247), for the reason that one of the councilmen of Crescent City was interested in the company which supplied the electric light to the city. This suit was thereupon instituted. The trial court ordered a writ of mandate to issue directing the treasurer to pay the warrants. From this judgment the treasurer has appealed.

The judgment should be affirmed for two reasons. It is true that section 886 of the Municipal Corporation Act, supra, provides in part:

"Any claim for compensation for work done, or supplies or materials furnished, in which any such officer [of a city or town] is interested [directly or indirectly], shall be void, and if audited and allowed shall not be paid by the treasurer."

[1] It is also true this rule is inflexible and the courts will not trifle in enforcing the spirit of the law. Pacific Vinegar, etc., Works v. Smith, 145 Cal. 352, 78 P. 550, 104 Am. St. Rep. 42; Osburn v. Stone, 170 Cal. 480, 490, 150 P. 367. In the present case, however, Councilman Dressler was not employed with or interested in the electric lighting company, directly or indirectly.

It may not reasonably be said a contract for lighting a city violates the Municipal Corporation Act merely because the councilman who participates in the transaction is the manager of a mercantile business in which a prominent stockholder of the electric company is also a stockholder. The interest of the councilman under such circumstances is too remote and speculative upon which to assume the contract will be affected thereby.

[2, 3] Moreover, the respondent Hotchkiss Electric Light Company is a public utility corporation engaged in the business of generating and marketing electric energy for Crescent City and its vicinity. It is the only electric lighting company from which the city can procure the energy. Subject to regulation by the California Railroad Commission, as provided by article 12, § 23, of the Constitution of California, and section 46 of the Railroad Commission Act of California (Stats. 1915, p. 138), upon demand, the respondent is bound to supply Crescent City with light for municipal purposes. The reason for protecting a city against the possible result of the personal interest of an officer in a contract or transaction with a city, as provided by the Municipal Corporation Act, does not exist under such circumstances. The obligation of the lighting company to supply this public utility to the city under the law distinguishes the transaction from the mere enforcement of a contract.

In the case of Capital Gas Co. v. Young, 109 Cal. 140, 41 P. 869, 871, 29 L. R. A. 463, a claim of the gas company for gas supplied to the city of Sacramento was sustained although the mayor of the city was also a stockholder in the company at the time the contract was awarded and when the claims were presented for payment. The court said:

"Under the operation of this law [section 629 of the Civil Code as it existed prior to the enactment of the Public Utilities Act of 1915], the gas company was not a free agent with power to contract or refuse to do so, but it became its duty upon demand to furnish gas to the city, irrespective of the status of its president.

"This duty to furnish gas to the city devolved upon the respondent, not by virtue of any contract, but by operation of law; and hence the laws governing ordinary contracts resting in the volition of the parties thereto has no application."

It is true that section 629 of the Civil Code was repealed after the rendering of the last cited authority. The principle which is there announced is nevertheless applicable to the present case. Independent of the Civil Code provision which was construed in that case, a public utility corporation is bound, upon demand, to supply its commodity to consumers. Section 629 of the Civil Code was repealed only because the regulation of public utilities was transferred to the Railroad Commission by the terms of the constitutional and statutory provisions above mentioned.

The judgment is affirmed.

SECURITY TRUST & SAVINGS BANK v.

McADOO et al.

Civ. 4215.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

Nov. 13, 1930.

1. Mortgages ⇨159.

Transaction whereby grantor of property authorized lender to make grantor's trust deed inferior to lender's mortgage for construction money paid grantee held not within statute (Civ. Code, § 2235).

Letter of instructions explicitly provided that grantor's trust deed was to be made subject to mortgage for construction money paid to grantee in favor of lender, thereby manifesting parties' intention to give lender the first security so as to take case out of Civ. Code, § 2235, providing that all transactions between a trustee and his beneficiary by which trustee obtains any advantage from his beneficiary are presumed to be entered into by latter without sufficient consideration and under undue influence.

2. Evidence ⇨271(1).

In action to foreclose mortgage, evidence regarding conversations between mortgagor and beneficiary under trust deed had without mortgagee's knowledge held properly excluded.

3. Mortgages ⇨159.

Grantor authorizing lender to take mortgage not exceeding $4,500 prior to grantor's trust deed could not claim it did not authorize mortgage for $1,000.

Facts disclosed that lender took mortgage and note from grantee for $4,000, for construction money, but that grantee failed to carry out his building contract with grantor, and money which lending bank had placed to credit of grantee, on execution of $4,000 note and mortgage, with exception of $1,000 advanced, was later charged back against him, and that this reduced amount of loan to sum of $1,000.

4. Evidence ⇨448.

Where written instructions relating to precedence of mortgage over trust deed were unambiguous, oral testimony interpreting instrument was properly excluded.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Guerin, Judge.

Action by the Security Trust & Savings Bank against the Averill-Weymouth Company and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant named appeals.

Affirmed.

Eastham & Smith, of San Pedro, for appellant.

Lloyd S. Nix, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

Mr. Justice PLUMMER delivered the opinion of the court.

The plaintiff had judgment in an action to foreclose a mortgage on certain property described in the complaint, from which judgment the Averill-Weymouth Company, a corporation, appeals.

The record shows that the Averill Company was engaged in the building of houses, and in so doing had contracted with one W. H. McAdoo for the erection thereof. The money to erect the buildings and to erect the building upon the lot involved in this action was to be obtained from the plaintiff.

In pursuance of this agreement the appellant, the owner of the lot, executed a grant, bargain, and sale deed in favor of the defendant W. H. McAdoo, and handed the same to the respondent. In handing this deed to the respondent, the appellant accompanied the deed with the following letter of instruction, to wit:

"Averill-Weymouth Company

"Real Estate, Loans and Investments

"725 South Olive St.,

"Los Angeles, California.

"Security Trust and Savings Bank, San Pedro, Calif. Gentlemen: We are enclosing herewith our grant deed drawn in favor of W. H. McAdoo, a married man, covering Lots 1 and 2 in Block 26 Vista Del Oro subject to taxes for the fiscal year 1923-24, conditions, restrictions, reservations and rights of way of record.

"You may use this deed when you can hold for us a note for $1500.00 in favor of this company, executed by our grantee and his wife, Mrs. Ella M. McAdoo, payable in monthly instalments of $50.00 or more, including interest at 7% per annum, this note to be secured by deed of trust executed by the above parties, affecting the easterly 60 feet of Lots 1 and 2, Block 26, Vista Del Oro, which deed of trust is to be made subject to a mortgage in favor of your bank for an amount not in excess of $4500.00 due in three years. As we do not have the necessary data in order to enable us to draw the note and trust deed above mentioned, we would ask that you kindly attend to this matter using Title Guarantee and Trust Company form of note and trust deed.

"We have ordered two separate guarantees of title at the Title Insurance and Trust Company, under their order #700621, as follows: One guarantee to cover the easterly 60 feet of Lots 1 and 2 in Block 26 Vista Del Oro, liability $1500.00. The other guarantee to cover the westerly 60 feet of Lots 1 and 2 in Block 26, Vista Del Oro, liability $1500.00. We have asked them to hold this order open for further papers and closing instructions to come from you and to bill you with all expenses in connection with this transaction, with the exception of item for cost of continuation of Title to our name on the two guarantees, which amount will be taken care of direct by us.

"Kindly collect interest for us on $1500.00 at 7% per annum from September 30th, 1923, to the date of our trust deed. Please cancel the $3.00 revenue stamp which we have attached to our deed and acknowledged receipt of this instrument by signing and returning the enclosed receipt for same.

"Yours very truly,

"Averill-Weymouth Company, Inc.

"IM:DO By I. MacManus, Jr."

In pursuance of the instruction just set forth, the respondent took from W. H. McAdoo and wife a mortgage in the sum of $1,000 and also a note in favor of the appellant for the sum of $1,500 secured by a deed of trust on the property mentioned in the letter of instructions. Thereafter the respondent advanced to W. H. McAdoo the sum of $1,000, as part payment for materials to be used in the erection of a building upon the premises involved herein. The remainder of the loan was simply carried as a credit to McAdoo on the books of the bank, and no further advancements were ever made by the bank to McAdoo. The record shows that McAdoo did not erect or complete any building upon the premises, and thereafter filed a petition in bankruptcy. The $1,000 advanced by the bank upon the $4,000 loan not having been repaid, the respondent began this action in foreclosure.

Upon this appeal, it is urged that the findings of the trial court are not supported by the evidence; that the judgment is contrary to the evidence; that the court erred in refusing to grant a new trial; that the court erred in failing to render judgment in favor of the appellant; that the court erred in rendering judgment for the respondent; and, further, that there were errors occurring during the trial, prejudicial to the appellant.

[1] In support of the foregoing specifications the appellant cites first section 2235 of the Civil Code, which reads: "All transactions between a trustee and his beneficiary, * * * by which he [the trustee] obtains any advantage from his beneficiary, are presumed to be entered into by the latter without sufficient consideration, and under undue influence." A number of cases are then cited having to do with transactions between trustees and beneficiaries, all of which set forth the law correctly upon the facts presented for consideration, but none of which are applicable to the instant case.

The record in this case shows that the mortgage in favor of the bank was to have precedence over the trust deed that was to be executed in favor of the appellant. The appellant, by its own letter of instructions, authorized the bank to accept a mortgage on the property involved from McAdoo in a sum not in excess of $4,500. The mortgage executed was in the sum of $4,000. It is true that the appellant directed the bank to see to the execution of the trust deed in favor of the appellant. The letter of instructions explicitly provides that the trust deed is to be made subject to the mortgage in favor of the bank; the language of the instruction being "which deed of trust is to be made subject to a mortgage in favor of your bank," etc. It follows as a matter of course that the intention of the parties to give the bank the first security is manifested in such a manner as to take the case entirely out of the provisions of section 2235 of the Civil Code. The bank did not acquire any advantage over the beneficiary not contemplated by the parties or not provided for in the letter of instructions. The evidence fails to show any confidential relations between the parties. At best it only shows that the parties were having business dealings, and, in view of the instructions which were executed purely voluntarily on the part of the appellant, and was being conducted for the benefit of the appellant, to the end and purpose that W. H. McAdoo might be enabled to erect a building upon the premises referred to in the instructions, we do not very well see how any confidential relations were taken advantage of, even though it be admitted that such existed. The fact that the respondent held the papers executed by the parties is wholly immaterial. The rights of the parties, including their priorities, were specifically set forth, and the record fails to show any violation thereof.

[2] The alleged errors committed by the trial court during the hearing of the cause consisted in the exclusion of certain testimony. It is not necessary to set forth the testimony sought to be introduced; it being sufficient simply to state that the offered testimony consisted of conversations between the defendant McAdoo and the appellant, without any showing whatever that these conversations were with any of the officers of the bank, or that the bank had any knowledge thereof. The bank not having any knowledge of any communications between McAdoo and the appellant, it cannot be successfully urged that any failure on the part of the bank to comply with secret understandings had between McAdoo and the appellant furnished a basis for any finding that the respondent was guilty of any fraud, or had taken any undue advantage.

[3] Again, it is urged that the appellant did not authorize a mortgage in the sum of $1,000. The record shows a complete answer in that the mortgage was executed for $4,000, but that only $1,000 was advanced on the mortgage by reason of the failure of McAdoo to carry out his building contract with the appellant. The fact that no greater sum than $1,000 was turned over to McAdoo by the bank on the $4,000 note and mortgage heretofore referred to inures to the benefit of the appellant, and is not a cause working a detriment. As we have said, the appellant authorized the execution of a note and mortgage, to be a first lien upon the premises, in a sum not exceeding $4,500. The money which had been placed to the credit of McAdoo, upon the execution of the note and mortgage, was charged back against him after the occurrence which we have heretofore mentioned, and thus reduced the amount of the loan to the sum of $1,000.

[4] The letter of instructions being plain and unambiguous, there was no occasion, on the part of the trial court, to admit oral testimony as a means of interpreting the instrument. Upon this hearing the appellant has not pressed consideration of the affidavits upon which a new trial was sought in the court below. However, we have read the same, and fail to find therein any reason for disturbing the conclusion of the trial court. We see no occasion for reviewing such cases as Bury v. Young, 98 Cal. 446, 33 P. 338, 35 Am. St. Rep. 186; Jones v. Title Guaranty & Trust Co., 178 Cal. 375, 173 P. 586, for the reasons that in those cases confidential relations were relied upon, and here, irrespective of the relations of the parties, specific instructions only appear to have been followed. Nor do we find anything in the case of First National Bank v. Garner, 91 Cal. App. 176, 266 P. 849, decided by this court, applicable to the case at bar. There is no question but that the instructions provided for the trust deed being subsequent to the mortgage, which is not parallel to the circumstances presented in the case last cited.

There being no merit in the appeal in this action, the judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

ANDREWS v. BUSH.

Civ. 435.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

Nov. 13, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 8, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 12, 1931.1. Joint adventures ⇨1.

Agreement for joint adventure is not invalid because of indefiniteness in respect to its details.

2. Joint adventures ⇨1.

Courts, in determining whether relationship of joint adventurers or partners has been created, are guided not only by spoken or written words, but also by acts of parties.

3. Joint adventures ⇨1.

Misunderstanding between parties as to determination of profits did not prevent them from having assumed relationship of joint adventurers.

4. Joint adventures ⇨4(1).

Duty and liability of parties to joint adventure as between themselves was that of fiduciaries.

5. Joint adventures ⇨4(1).

Acceptance of amount advanced under agreement for joint enterprise pursuant to false representations did not terminate enterprise as respected right to share in profits.

Party to agreement for purchase of real estate as joint enterprise after advancement of money by other party falsely represented that prospect of success had vanished and paid back amount advanced after having arranged for sale at a profit, thereby violating duty of acting in highest good faith by reason of fiduciary obligation.

6. Joint adventures ⇨4(1).

Party to joint adventure acquiescing in termination of agreement pursuant to false representations was not estopped to claim profits accruing from relationship.

7. Joint adventures ⇨5(1).

Party to joint adventure terminated pursuant to false representations of other party did not lose right to accounting as respected limitations (Code Civ. Proc. § 339, subd. 1).

CARY, P. J.

Plaintiff brought this action against defendant alleging in his amended complaint the existence of a joint adventure between them regarding a real estate deal, that the joint adventure had been completed and certain profits made, all of which had been retained by defendant, and asked for an accounting. Defendant's answer denied the allegations of the complaint and alleged that the action was barred by the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure and that plaintiff was estopped to claim any share of the profits.

The court found for the most part in accordance with the allegations of the amended complaint. It further found, however, that in one particular the minds of the parties did not meet—plaintiff believing he was to receive back all moneys advanced by himself with interest and in addition thereto one-half of all profits—defendant believing and thinking that plaintiff believed that all sums received from the deal were to be divided equally without any reimbursement to plaintiff for the money he had originally advanced. The court adopted the latter of these two methods for its accounting, found plaintiff's share to be $8,270.77, that the action was not barred by the statute of limitations, that plaintiff was not estopped to claim his share of the profits, and gave judgment for plaintiff for $8,270.77.

Defendant urges that the judgment be reversed for the following reasons: (1) Since the minds of the parties did not meet on how the net profits were to be arrived at, there was really no agreement for a joint adventure and all plaintiff was entitled to was the return of his $5,000 investment which, as the evidence shows, he had already received prior to the institution of this action; (2) that even if it be conceded that a joint adventure was originally created, nevertheless the undisputed testimony shows that the joint adventure had been terminated and plaintiff had made no attempt thereafter to comply with the terms of the joint adventure agreement, thus forfeiting his right to participate in any profits; (3) that even though it be conceded that plaintiff's termination of the joint adventure agreement was brought about by defendant's concealment from him of certain facts, that situation only gave rise at the most either to a right of action by plaintiff for breach of the joint adventure agreement which, not having been brought within two years, was barred by the provisions of subdivi-vision 1 of section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure, or to a right of action by plaintiff for fraud—an issue not raised by the pleadings; (4) that the uncontradicted evidence shows that plaintiff is estopped to claim any of the profits of the joint adventure; and (5) that certain findings are unsupported by the evidence.

The facts follow. A certain tract of land lying east of the city of San Diego was owned by the El Cerrito Park Company. February 16, 1926, defendant obtained an option to purchase this tract by the terms of which $2,500 was to be paid ten days after date, another $2,500 fifteen days later, and $20,000 ninety days later, at which time a mortgage securing the remaining $175,000 of the purchase price was to be executed. The option was informal, consisting merely of a letter addressed to the El Cerrito Park Company by defendant, at the bottom of which the company had indorsed a statement that its board of directors had sanctioned the acceptance of the proposal contained in defendant's letter. Within a few days after the execution of this option, one Smith, a Los Angeles subdivider, approached the El Cerrito Company and attempted to buy the tract but was informed that defendant had an option on it. Knowledge of Smith's interest in purchasing the land soon reached defendant and negotiations were begun between them, but the first payment under the option fell due before these negotiations had progressed very far. February 26, the last day this first payment could be made, defendant went to the bank where he did business and attempted to borrow $2,500 on the option in order to make this first payment. Plaintiff, executive vice president of that bank, to whom he explained the matter, informed him that it was not a bankable loan. Defendant then told plaintiff that Smith was ready to purchase the property, that it could be sold to him at a good price, and that if plaintiff would personally advance the money necessary to meet the option payments they could both make a good profit. Plaintiff consented to go in, made out his personal check for $2,500 to defendant "Grant A. Bush, Trustee," and defendant immediately used the money to make the first payment called for under the option. The testimony is in sharp conflict as to just what each was to receive should the deal prove profitable. According to plaintiff's version, the money he advanced was to be returned to him with interest first, and all over was to be divided equally between them. Defendant, on the other hand, testified that all sums received from the deal were to be divided equally between them without any reimbursement to plaintiff for his advances. A few days after this first payment plaintiff and defendant met in the office of plaintiff's attorney to draw up an agreement defining the terms of their joint adventure. Both plaintiff and his then attorney testified that at this conference the attorney was instructed to prepare a written agreement calling, among other things, for the repayment to plaintiff with interest of the $25,000 which he was to advance and then an equal division between plaintiff and defendant of any profits they might make out of the option, and that defendant raised no objection to the terms of the proposed agreement. This agreement was drawn up by plaintiff's then attorney, submitted to and approved by plaintiff, and by him submitted to defendant, who, stating that he desired to consult his own attorney, delayed executing it. For reasons which can only be surmised defendant never executed the written agreement regarding the joint adventure. In the meantime defendant had again contacted his prospective purchaser Smith and informed him that before making a final proposition he (defendant) would have to get rid of his partner in the deal but defendant would not tell who his partner was. The effect of defendant's attitude on Smith is graphically described by the statement in Smith's testimony, "There apparently was always a mystery over the thing that created a suspicion in my mind." At this stage of the proceedings the second option payment fell due. Plaintiff again made out his personal check to defendant "Grant A. Bush, trustee" for $2,500 and defendant used this money to make the second payment. There was now a period of ninety days ahead of them before the next payment fell due. Defendant resumed his negotiations with Smith and on April 8, without plaintiff's knowledge, accepted Smith's offer to purchase a half interest in the option for $27,500. A formal escrow based on the informal option was opened on April 24 to which El Cerrito Park Company was a party, and at this time out of the $27,500 purchase money for the half interest in the option Smith put up in the escrow $20,000 with which to meet the third payment required by the option. The $7,500 balance of the price Smith had agreed to pay defendant for a half interest had already been paid direct to defendant. Two days later defendant went to the plaintiff and told him: "The deal with Smith has fallen down, all I was able to save out of the wreck was $5,000, I am through with the real estate business. Under the circumstances you are lucky to get your $5,000 back." Relying upon the truthfulness of these statements, plaintiff consented to and did receive back from defendant his investment of $5,000. A week or so after plaintiff had received back his $5,000, he got wind of the fact that defendant still retained some sort of an interest in the deal, and on May first wrote defendant a letter in which he said, in part:

"If you had been Andrews and I had been Bush, would you feel fully satisfied with the termination of our El Cerrito deal?"

"If the answer is 'Yes,' then put this in the waste basket, and forget it, as I will. * * *

"The matter as now concluded has refunded my $5,000, which they had for 60 days, has provided otherwise the $25,000 required for the first year, and saved intact your half interest without liability and without investment.

"Your ability obtained the favorable option.

"My investment protected it until you made a better deal.

"From the transaction you gained a valuable holding on a future prospect.

"I gained nothing.

"Would you feel that it was a Golden Rule settlement if you were Andrews and I were Bush?"

Defendant paid no attention to this letter, but after several telephone calls finally came in to see plaintiff and said: "All I have been able to get out of Smith is $5,000. Smith is going on with the deal and pay the remaining $20,000 when it is due in June. Smith has taken over all of the interest and I am through." At some time apparently between May 1 and the time defendant sold the remaining half interest in the option he expended some $900 in the way of taxes, etc., on the property. Thereafter defendant sold the remaining half interest in the option to Smith for $20,000. Plaintiff left San Diego to reside in the East some time during the year and made no attempt to follow up the matter until December, when his attorneys wrote defendant demanding an accounting, and this being refused this action was instituted April 8, 1927. At the trial the defendant produced no witnesses other than himself, while plaintiff placed on the stand every person who had knowledge of the transaction, including Smith.

[1-3] Does the fact that there was no meeting of the minds of the parties, on the precise method by which profits should be determined, result in there being no joint adventure and thus no right in plaintiff to obtain an accounting? The law requires little formality in the creation of a joint adventure. Anderson v. Blair, 202 Ala. 209, 80 So. 31, 35. Such an agreement is not invalid because of indefiniteness in respect to its details. 33 C. J. 848. Thus a partnership, which in many respects is similar to a joint adventure (Menefee v. Oxnam, 42 Cal. App. 81, 85, 183 P. 379), is none the less a partnership though there be no definite agreement as to how the profits shall be divided (Doudell v. Shoo, 20 Cal. App. 424, 438, 129 P. 478). Likewise, with a joint adventure. Hoge v. George, 27 Wyo. 423, 200 P. 96, 99, 18 A. L. R. 469; Goss v. Lanin, 170 Iowa, 57, 152 N. W. 43, 46. In considering whether or not a relationship such as that of joint adventurers or partners has been created, the courts are guided, not only by the spoken or written words of the contracting parties, but also by their acts. Niroad v. Farnell, 11 Cal. App. 767, 769, 106 P. 252; Bartelt v. Smith, 145 Wis. 31, 129 N. W. 782, 783, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 1195; Jackson v. Hooper, 76 N. J. Eq. 185, 74 A. 130, 136; Knapp v. Hanley, 108 Mo. App. 353, 83 S. W. 1005, 1008; Saunders v. McDonough, 191 Ala. 119, 67 So. 591, 593; Reece v. Rhoades, 25 Wyo. 91, 165 P. 449, 453; O. K. Boiler Co. v. Minnetonka Lumber Co., 103 Okl. 226, 229 P. 1045, 1047, 1048; Doan v. Dyer (C. C. A.) 286 F. 339, 341. From the facts in the case at bar there is no question but that the parties intended to go into the deal together so that each might derive profit therefrom. Under the authorities above cited, the fact that there may have been a misunderstanding as to how the profits were to be determined does not prevent the parties from having assumed the relationship of joint adventurers. In defendant's reply brief he modifies the contention made in his opening brief and contends that there was no mere failure of the parties to understand each other, but rather an open disagreement as to the division of the profits, and that hence defendant was within his rights in returning plaintiff's money and terminating the relation. Such contention, however, while testified to by defendant, was not upheld by the findings of the court.

Was the joint enterprise terminated when the plaintiff received back his $5,000 and did he then lose all right to any profits accruing thereafter? Defendant urges that this question should be answered in the affirmative, arguing that the evidence shows, without conflict, such a termination and he relies particularly upon the letter written by plaintiff to defendant of May 1, quoted above. He urges that, regardless of the circumstances of the termination of the relationship, nevertheless it was terminated, that plaintiff never put up the last $20,000 installment, and therefore was not entitled to an accounting for any future profits. Plaintiff replies to this argument that a termination of such relationship brought about by fraudulent concealment of the actual facts is no termination at all.

[4, 5] The relationship of the parties being that of joint adventurers, their duty and liability as between themselves was that of fiduciaries. Reece v. Rhoades, 25 Wyo. 91, 165 P. 449, 453; McMillen v. Olmsted, 85 Cal. App. 656, 664, 259 P. 1104; Menefee v. Oxnam, 42 Cal. App. 81, 85, 86, 183 P. 379; Munson v. Fishburn, 183 Cal. 206, 211, 190 P. 808; Humburg v. Lotz, 4 Cal. App. 438, 442, 88 P. 510; Lomita Land Co. v. Robinson, 154 Cal. 36, 50, 97 P. 10, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1106; King v. Wise, 43 Cal. 628, 633, 634; Dennis v. Gordon, 163 Cal. 427, 433, 125 P. 1063. The defendant was charged with the duty of acting in the highest of good faith towards plaintiff and of refraining from taking any advantage of him. Not only did defendant violate this obligation, but, realizing that he was on the threshold of disposing of the property successfully at a profit, he sought to discourage his coadventurer by falsely stating that all prospect of success had vanished and that plaintiff would be exceedingly fortunate to recover back from the "wreck" his $5,000 original investment. To allow defendant under these circumstances to claim that the alleged termination of their relationship forfeited all plaintiff's rights to share in the profits would be to enable defendant to enrich himself by the violation of his fiduciary obligation, a situation at once obnoxious to the principles of equity. Richards v. Fraser, 122 Cal. 456, 460, 55 P. 246; Llewellyn v. Levi, 157 Cal. 31, 37, 38, 106 P. 219. We therefore hold that the alleged termination of the relationship, procured by the means that it was, did not in fact result in forfeiting plaintiff's rights in the profits of the joint adventure.

[6] Defendant contends that the plaintiff is estopped to assert any right to the profits accruing from the relationship. As grounds for this assertion, he states that plaintiff acquiesced in the termination of this agreement, accepted the return of all money which he had advanced, admitted in writing that the arrangement was terminated, stood by, allowing defendant to alter materially his position, allowed Smith to advance $20,000 which should have been advanced by plaintiff, and allowed defendant to expend for taxes, etc., $958.45, and that defendant's change of position as brought about by plaintiff's acquiescence now renders it inequitable to allow plaintiff to reverse his position, assert his right to the profits, and recover same. To this line of argument there are at least two answers: First, the evidence fails to show any detriment suffered by defendant. Second, to hold that plaintiff was estopped would, in itself, work an injustice. Were defendant's contention regarding estoppel to be sustained, it would be equivalent to holding that where one has by violation of his duties as a fiduciary succeeded in ousting his associate from a profitable business deal, the guilty party could carry through the project, make a profit, and if, upon discovery of the facts, the innocent party laid claim to his share of the profits, all the guilty party need say in defense would be: "I relied on your being out of the deal, went ahead and made a big profit for myself, and now it would not be fair to me to have to divide with you." There is no merit in defendant's contention.

[7] Regarding the contention that the action is barred by the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure, defendant readily admits that the action for an accounting was begun within the time allowed by statute, but contends that the relationship of the joint adventurers having been terminated before any profits had accrued, plaintiff has no right to an accounting, that his only right of action is for damages for breach of the original joint adventure agreement, that since that agreement was not in writing such an action must be begun within two years from the breach of the agreement, and that more than two years have elapsed between that time and the institution of this action. As we have held that plaintiff did not lose his right to an accounting, no further consideration of this point is necessary.

Defendant contends that the findings are, in certain particulars, unsupported by the evidence. The first of these mentioned in his brief is the finding that plaintiff at all times was ready, willing, and able to make payment of the $20,000 installment on the option. Even if there were no evidence to support this finding, which we do not concede, defendant, due to his own acts, cannot be said to be aggrieved by that fact. He next complains of the finding that the defendant exonerated plaintiff from any obligation to advance or contribute the $20,000. There is no merit to his complaint. The next finding attacked is, "That the purposes and objects of said joint adventure have been fully performed." Defendant attacks this finding, claiming that the uncontradicted evidence shows that plaintiff did not make the $20,000 payment which he was obligated to make. But the defendant did unquestionably succeed in raising the $20,000 payment through the sale of plaintiff's interest in the option, and we regard that as equivalent in substance to a payment by plaintiff of that amount. Defendant's attack on the finding that defendant did not suffer any injury or prejudice by failure of plaintiff to claim profits prior to the time that he did so, has been answered in our consideration of his contention regarding estoppel. His assignment that the finding that the subsequent agreement between Smith, Bush, and the El Cerrito Company was expressly founded on the writing of February 16, 1926, is without support in the evidence is without merit. On the contrary, it finds ample support, since the escrow agreement entered into by Smith and the El Cerrito Company contained the following: "This escrow being based on an agreement between G. A. Bush and El Cerrito Park Company dated February 16, 1926."

Plaintiff prosecutes a cross-appeal from the judgment, giving as his sole grounds thereof that the court erred in not allowing plaintiff his $5,000 investment with interest and also one-half of the profits remaining after such payment. We feel this point to be without merit, for the reason that the court upon conflicting evidence expressly found that there was no meeting of the minds of the parties on that method of division of the profits.

We have carefully scrutinized the entire record and have read the numerous cases cited by counsel. In our opinion the case was tried fairly and the decision arrived at by the trial court was correct and finds ample support in the evidence.

The judgment is affirmed.

Action by T. J. Wolfe against Clayton Severns. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals.

Nelson & Burns, of Santa Ana, for appellant.

Chandler, Wright & Ward, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WARMER, Justice pro tem.

This action arose out of the pretended sale of certain oil well equipment consisting of a derrick, tanks, tools, etc. James, Price, and Richards owned certain oil leases and oil well equipment at Huntington Beach, Orange county, Cal. They were in financial difficulties and made an assignment of their interest in said leases and said equipment to a certain creditors' committee consisting of Spraul, Fairchild, and Gale. Said creditors' committee had certain negotiations with Clarence R. Bailey, Pearl R. Bailey, his wife, W. J. White, and Mamie B. White, his wife, looking to the sale of said property. In said negotiations it was agreed to sell said property to Bailey and White for an agreed consideration, payable at specified times; that they were to place all necessary papers in escrow and the delivery thereof was to be made according to the escrow instructions. The deal was never completed because of the failure of Bailey and White to carry out the terms of their agreement. Bailey and White were never in possession of the property, although they did a little work thereon by special arrangement with Spraul, one of the creditors' committee. The appellant, as judgment creditor of Bailey and White, caused an execution to be levied on certain of the personal property in said lease, said personal property being the same property that is the subject of the controversy here. At the sheriff's sale on said execution the said Spraul announced publicly that the creditors' committee claimed the property being offered for sale under said execution. The appellant and his attorney and others were present. Appellant's attorney heard the claim made by Spraul, but appellant does not remember hearing any such claim. Appellant's attorney advised him that all he would get as a result of said sale was the right, title, and interest of the judgment debtors. The appellant was the purchaser of said property at said execution sale.

Appellant requested one Dockins to inform him if he found any one desiring to purchase oil well equipment, stating that he had two complete outfits, derricks, and all, from the crown block down, referring to the property that he had purchased at the said execution sale. Dockins brought respondent to see appellant concerning said property. After the introduction of said appellant and respondent, they went to inspect the property, and after some negotiations regarding the particular property to be included in the deal, and the prices thereof, they agreed on a deal, and at the suggestion of Wolfe went to the office of appellant's attorney to have a bill of sale made and executed.

While they were inspecting the property before going to the office of appellant's attorney, certain representations were made, appellant representing to respondent that he was the owner of said property and there was no claim against the same that he knew of, except city taxes, which, in his opinion, would not exceed $50. They went to the office of appellant's attorney, and said attorney prepared an instrument and handed the same to the respondent, who objected to the description of the property therein, and then said attorney suggested that he make an assignment of the sheriff's certificate of sale, which theretofore had been handed to the respondent for perusal, or a bill of sale on the back of the sheriff's certificate of sale. An assignment of said certificate was placed on the back thereof, executed, and delivered to the respondent herein. Whereupon the respondent asked if it was good, and, being informed that it was, delivered a check for $1,000, the purchase price of said property, to the appellant. They immediately went to the sheriff's office and inquired if appellant had a right to sell the certificate of sale and were informed by a deputy sheriff that the appellant had such right. Respondent then ordered his employees to dismantle the derrick preparatory to moving the same, but shortly after they began to do so they were notified by some other parties that they were the owners of said property, which fact said employees reported to the respondent. Respondent then made further inquiry of the sheriff's office and learned for the first time that the only interest that he received in the property was the interest of the judgment debtors, which, if any, was questionable. Whereupon respondent immediately returned the certificate of sale, together with the assignment thereon, which had been delivered to him, and demanded the return of his check. The check was delivered to the appellant herein on the 12th day of February, 1929, and the return thereof was demanded by the respondent on the 14th day of February of the same year. Appellant refused to return the same and brought this action to compel the payment thereof. Respondent's answer sets up, among other things, fraud and failure of consideration.

Respondent asks affirmance of the judgment for failure of the appellant to set up sufficient evidence to comply with the rules of this court. While the testimony set out by the appellant is rather meager, yet we are of the opinion that it is sufficient to require a denial of the motion for affirmance. The motion is, therefore, denied.

It is admitted by the appellant that, if there is any substantial evidence to support the findings of the trial court, the findings cannot be disturbed on appeal. However, appellant insists that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings. The theory upon which appellant's contention is based is that appellant acquainted respondent with the source of his title by showing him the sheriff's certificate of sale, and insists that in so doing respondent was placed within that class of persons whose duty it is to investigate before purchasing, and, having failed to do so, he is precluded from the defense of fraud, and that he got all he bargained for; hence no failure of consideration.

Appellant cites Brimmer v. Salisbury, 167 Cal. 522, 140 P. 30. That case is one where the court is passing upon the obligation of one who has entered into an executory contract of sale, and the court says at page 527 of 167 Cal., 140 P. 30, 32: "The conveyance by the vendor was not a breach of the contract. One may sell land which he does not own, and yet be able, when the time of performance arrives, to furnish a good title. In the meantime the purchaser would not be at liberty to disaffirm the contract on the ground that then the vendor was unable to make a good title. It would be incumbent upon him to offer to perform, or to show that at the time of performance the vendor could not furnish the title." Here it is immediately to be noted that a vendor under an executory contract of sale who has title may part with it under two essentially different conditions. He may part with it to a third person, who, if he be not charged with knowledge of the previous executory contract, takes it freed from the obligations of that contract. Such would be the case were the executory contract of sale unrecorded. He may, however, part with his title, subject to the rights of the vendees under the executory contract of sale, and thus not put it beyond his reasonable power to make title to his vendees under the executory contract of sale when in due time title may be demanded of him. In the one case the conduct of the vendor may with propriety be termed a fraud upon the vendee, since he has parted with the title, and consequently with the security upon which his vendee was entitled to rely in the making of his installment payments, and after having done so he insists that these installment payments should be continued without any legal assurance to him that, at the time when he is entitled to demand a deed, the vendor will be in a position to convey title."

Appellant cites certain other cases to the same effect. It will readily be seen that these cases are not in point where there is no executory contract in connection with the sale.

[1] There is a conflict in the evidence on the question of the representations made as to title and the claims of others thereto. This court, therefore, must accept as true that testimony which tends to support the findings, together with all reasonable inferences therefrom.

[2, 3] It is never presumed that a party has committed a fraud, and, where fraud is alleged for the purpose of depriving him of a right, it must be clearly made out. McCarthy v. White, 21 Cal. 495, 82 Am. Dec. 754; Ryder v. Bamberger, 172 Cal. 791, 158 P. 753; Wendling, etc., Co. v. Glenwood, etc., Co., 153 Cal. 411, 95 P. 1029; Casey v. Leggett, 125 Cal. 664, 58 P. 264; Abrams v. Daugherty, 60 Cal. App. 297, 212 P. 942; Everett v. Standard Acc. Ins. Co., 45 Cal. App. 332, 187 P. 996. To establish fraud the evidence must be clear, satisfactory, and convincing. McCarthy v. White, supra; 12 R. C. L. 183. Such has been the rule in this state from an early date and such the rule continues to be.

Respondent testified in part as follows:

"He (Dockins) told Mr. Wolfe (appellant) that he brought me down, that I was in the market for a rig, and Mr. Wolfe said he had two for sale and we got in the car and came down to look at them.

"Mr. Mabry: Q. Where were they located?

"Witness: A. At the corner of Sixteenth and Olive streets, Huntington Beach.

"Q. When you got there, did you have any further conversation with him? * * * A. We talked the matter over and I asked Mr. Wolfe if he owned them and he said he did. I told him I didn't want both of them, I just wanted one, and asked what he wanted for them and he said he wanted thirty-five hundred dollars for the two. I told him I didn't care only about one, I just needed one, and he said he would rather sell all of them, so we talked about one thing and another and I said, 'Now just what do I get if I just buy this?' He said, 'You will get everything, it all belongs to me, everything you see, even the pipe in the hole. If you take it, you will get the pipe in the hole.' I told him I didn't want the pipe. I just needed the derrick. That was the general line of conversation,—that was practically all. * * * I asked him what he would take for the one rig, not the two rigs, and he asked me fifteen hundred dollars for it. I told him it was second-hand materials, and a salvage sale, it was too much money, that I would give him a thousand dollars. He said he couldn't sell this for that. I said that was too bad, but that was all I could give. I asked him if there was anything against this and he said not that he knew of excepting a sign which was posted upon the rig and the city taxes. I asked him about that and he said he didn't know if they had been paid or not. I asked him how much he thought they would be and he said probably fifty dollars but it might be more than that. I said if it was only fifty dollars I will pay that fifty dollar taxes above the thousand dollars. I said I wondered if we could find out more about the taxes and he said, 'Yes, by going down to the city hall,' so we went down to the city hall, but it was on Lincoln's birthday, a holiday, and it was closed. He said he knew Mr. Rossin, the city engineer, he lived right across the street, we would go over there and he would probably have some idea. * * * (Speaking to Mr. Rossin) Mr. Wolfe stated what we came over there for—he said he was selling me one of those rigs that he owned down on Sixteenth and Olive streets and we came over there for the purpose of finding out if he knew how much taxes, or if any taxes were due against them and how much they were, and he said he didn't think it was over fifty dollars—that this might be for the last year's taxes, which would be fifty dollars I think he said was due."

Respondent then ordered his employees to dismantle the derrick, preparatory to moving the same, but shortly after they began to do so they were notified by other parties that they owned the property, which fact was reported to the respondent. Respondent further testified:

"Upon these claims being made against the property what did you do? Witness: A. I thought I better examine it and see if Mr. Wolfe had title to it.

"Q. What did you do? A. I went down to Mr. Wolfe's house and told him I understood he didn't have full title to that property down there.

"Q. What did he say? A. He said he did.

"Q. Was anything else said? A. So we got in the car and we drove back down to where the rigs were and Mr. Gifford came out and I said to him, 'Well, we are going to Santa Ana to see about the title to this property, so you better not do any more here until I find out where we stand on this. I don't want to get mixed up in any affairs that are not right.' Then I said, 'Mr. Wolfe says he owns it and I want to find out about it.'

"Q. Now, what did the gentleman at the sheriff's office advise you upon inquiries being made there? A. Well, we met the gentleman there and he said— * * *

"Q. Now, at this conversation, did you have a conversation at the sheriff's office?

"Witness: A. Yes, sir.

"Q. All right; who were present? A. Myself, Mr. Wolfe and I didn't know the other gentleman's name, the sheriff.

"Q. State just what was said, Mr. Severns. A. Well, I asked him what title Mr. Wolfe had in that property over there and he said he didn't have any. I asked him what he sold and he said he sold a nigger's interest. (Referring to Bailey and White), I said to Mr. Wolfe, 'I didn't buy no interest, I bought the whole outfit and you agreed to give me a clear title to the rig. You said you owned it,' and he said 'No, they just sold the niggers' interest and that's what I sold you.'"

Appellant testified:

"Did you ever tell Mr. Severns you were the owner of the property? * * * I only told him I had a sheriff's bill of sale.

"Mr. Mabry: Q. You never told him you were the owner of the property? * * * He didn't answer the question yet.

"The Court: Answer the question. Read the question, Miss Reporter. * * *

"The Court: Answer the question. Did you tell him that or not? Do you understand the question?

"Witness: A. Yes.

"The Court: Will you answer it then?

"Witness: A. I don't believe I did, only the way I stated it.

"Mr. Mabry: Q. You are not positive whether or not you did?

"Witness: A. No; I am not."

In the case at bar the defendant went to the place where the property was located and after examining that which he desired to buy he made two direct and pertinent inquiries and two only. First, "What do I get if I buy this property?" Second, "Is there anything against it?" As to the first inquiry he was told, "I own it. You get it all from the crown block down, including the pipe in the ground." As to the second he was told, "There is no claim against it that I know of except the city taxes." The defendant was satisfied with what he saw and agreed to purchase a derrick, tanks, tools, etc., after having been told by appellant that he owned said property, that he got it all, that there was nothing against it, except the city taxes, which, in the opinion of appellant, would not exceed $50.

Blake v. Arp, 180 Cal. 144, 179 P. 683, 684, is a case where fraud was alleged and found. The basis for such allegation and finding was that defendant therein was the owner of a lot and sold the same to plaintiff, stating to plaintiff that he owned the title to said lot. At the time of the purchase a lis pendens was on record in the case, which resulted in a judgment against himself and his vendee (plaintiff in said cause). The court said: "The jury was justified in finding him guilty of fraud under the circumstances, even though he believed the truth of his assertion (Civ. Code, § 1572, subd. 2), and they were so instructed by the court. Appellant urges the fact that the evidence was insufficient to show any fraud on his part, for the reason, as he claims, that the plaintiff knew as much about the title as he did, and that therefore his statement was a mere expression of opinion, and cites in relation thereto the following cases: Choate v. Hyde, 129 Cal. 580, 62 P. 118, and Rheingans v. Smith, 161 Cal. 362, 365, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 1140, 119 P. 494. * * * Moreover, the evidence of plaintiff was that she was constantly lulled into inaction by the repeated assertion of defendant that he had the title, notwithstanding the allegations of the plaintiff in said suit."

Crandall v. Parks, 152 Cal. 772, 93 P. 1018, is a case wherein the plaintiff was the owner of certain real and personal property, and the defendant, in order to induce plaintiff to make an exchange for his property in Oregon and a restaurant in San Diego, made certain representations as to the value of the Oregon land and the ownership of personal property. The personal property concerning which the representation of ownership was made consisted of a hot water tank and a refrigerator represented to belong to the defendant when in fact it did not. An exchange of property was effected, plaintiff being induced to make the same solely by reason of such representations as to value and ownership, upon which he wholly relied. Defendant well knew that plaintiff in making the exchange relied and acted solely upon these representations. In this case the court said, at page 776 of 152 Cal., 93 P.

1018, 1019: "A statement as to the value of property is not always made as a mere expression of opinion upon which the other party has no right to rely. It may be a positive affirmation of a fact, intended as such by the party making it, and reasonably regarded as such by the party to whom it is made. When it is such, it is like any other representation of fact, and may be a fraudulent misrepresentation warranting rescission. The rule in regard to this matter is stated by Mr. Pomeroy as follows: 'Wherever a party states a matter which might otherwise be only an opinion, and does not state it as the mere expression of his own opinion, but affirms it as an existing fact material to the transaction, so that the other party may reasonably treat it as a fact and rely and act upon it as such, then the statement clearly becomes an affirmation of fact within the meaning of the general rule, and may be a fraudulent misrepresentation.' 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 878. * * * That plaintiff never made or commenced an investigation for himself as to the value of the Oregon land or the ownership of the personal property, that he believed and relied solely on the statements and representations of defendant in regard thereto, and that he was induced to make the exchange solely by reason thereof, are all fully established by the findings, which are conclusive upon this appeal. We know of no reason why defendant should be allowed to maintain that plaintiff was not entitled to rely, without investigation on his part, upon a representation as to the value of land so remotely situated, which he had never seen and could not personally examine—a representation, 'to the truth of which the party has deliberately pledged his faith.' See Dow v. Swain, 125 Cal. 681 to 684, 58 P. 272 to 274. He was clearly entitled also to rely upon the representation as to the ownership of the personal property."

In Oppenheimer v. Clunie, 142 Cal. 313, 75 P. 899, 901, the court says, in quoting Mr. Justice Temple in Colton v. Stanford, 82 Cal. 398, 23 P. 16, 16 Am. St. Rep. 137:

"The power to cancel a contract is a most extraordinary power. It is one which should be exercised with great caution—nay, I may say, with great reluctance—unless in a clear case. A too free use of this power would render all business uncertain, and, as has been said, make the length of the chancellor's foot the measure of individual rights. The greatest liberty of making contracts is essential to the interests of the country. In general, the parties must look out for themselves."

"It is stated in Southern Development Co. v. Silva, 125 U. S. 250, 8 S. Ct. 881, 31 L. Ed. 678, that, in order to justify a court of equity in setting aside a contract on the ground of fraudulent representations, the complainant must show by clear and decisive proof:

"First, that the defendant has made a representation in regard to a material fact; secondly, that such representation is false; thirdly, that such representation was not actually believed by the defendant, on reasonable grounds, to be true; fourthly, that it was made with intent that it should be acted on; fifthly, that it was acted on by complainant to his damage; and, sixthly, that in so acting on it the complainant was ignorant of its falsity, and reasonably believed it to be true."

"This court said in Colton v. Stanford, 82 Cal. 399, 23 P. 28, 16 Am. St. Rep. 137: 'A misrepresentation as the basis of rescission must be material, but it can be material only when it is of such a character that if it had not been made the contract would not have been entered into. The misrepresentation, it is true, need not be the sole cause of the contract, but it must be of such nature, weight, and force that the court can say, "Without it the contract would not have been made."' "

"* * * The rule is thus stated by Pomeroy in his work on Equity Jurisprudence (section 893): "If after a representation of fact, however positive, the party to whom it was made institutes an inquiry for himself, has recourse to the proper means of obtaining information, and actually learns the real facts, he cannot claim to have relied upon the misrepresentation and to have been misled by it. Such claim would simply be untrue. The same result must plainly follow when, after the representation, the party receiving it has given to him a sufficient opportunity of examining into the real facts, when his attention is directed to the sources of information, and he commences, or purports or professes to commence, an investigation. The plainest motives of expediency and of justice require that he should be charged with all the knowledge which he might have obtained had he pursued the inquiry to the end with diligence and completeness. He cannot claim that he did not learn the truth, and that he was misled.' And again the same author says (section 894): 'If, in a contract of sale or leasing representations are made by the vendor concerning some incidents, qualities, or attributes of the subject-matter which are open and visible, so that the falsity of the statement is patent to an ordinary observer, and it is made to appear that the purchaser at, or shortly before, the concluding of the contract, had seen the thing itself which constitutes the subject-matter, then a knowledge of the facts is chargeable upon such party; he is assumed to have made the agreement knowingly, and cannot allege that he was misled by the false representations.' "

[4, 5] In the case at bar said representations were material and respondent relied on them and delivered his check to appellant in payment for said property. Certainly such representations were false. Appellant knew them to be false, because he was informed by his attorney that the only interest he had in said property was the interest of the judgment debtors. Second, the record is silent as to any other or further knowledge of appellant concerning his ownership of said property. The record does not show any knowledge on the appellant's part to justify his claim of ownership. Such information did not justify a representation of ownership of any title at all. Civ. Code, § 1572; Blake v. Arp, supra. Plaintiff told defendant that he knew of no claims against the property, except city taxes, which would not be more than $50 in his opinion.

[6, 7] Does the fact that he was shown a sheriff's certificate of sale, and looked at the description of the property therein and upon inquiry was again told that the title was good, deprive the defendant of his right to rely upon those representations? We think not. Appellant must have known that the sheriff's certificate of sale carried with it the title of the judgment debtors and no more, and the respondent had a right to believe that the appellant was aware of the title he had received by virtue of the sheriff's certificate of sale. But to be certain, he again asked if the title was good. Then, if not before, appellant must speak the truth, because he knew then, if not before, that the respondent was relying upon his representations without investigation. That is, appellant was then, if not before, legally bound to disclose the nature of the title of the judgment debtors, or at least to state to respondent his lack of knowledge concerning the same. Having failed so to do, appellant's statement that the title was good was in fact a fraud. Civ. Code, § 1572; Blake v. Arp, supra; Crandall v. Parks, supra.

[8, 9] Further, taking the representation that there were no claims against the property excepting city taxes in a sum less than $50, in the opinion of the appellant, appellant joined the creditors' committee, Spraul, Fairchild, and Gale, as parties defendant with Bailey, White, etc., in the action out of which the judgment and execution sale and sheriff's certificate arose, and, upon the creditors' committee's representation in open court of the contract between the creditors' committee and Bailey and White et al., appellant dismissed the cause of action as to the creditors' committee and continued to prosecute said cause as to Bailey and White to judgment, caused execution to issue in said cause, and upon the execution sale, before buying said property, was present when one of the creditors' committee, Spraul, announced to all present that they claimed such property. Plaintiff does not remember the statement so made, or if one was made. However, his attorney heard such a statement. His attorney, a number of times, advised appellant that all he got by the said purchase was the interest of the judgment debtors, and that was all he had a right to sell. Further, plaintiff must have known that the defendant was making these inquiries as to title and claim of others, to know what he was buying, and that he was relying upon him (appellant) for his information relative thereto. Appellant apparently either paid no attention to what was going on at the sale and gave no heed to his attorney's advice or as to what title he had purchased or received and therefore erroneously believed he had a good title, or else he knew he had no title to said property and knew there were claims by others to said property, and thought by lulling the said respondent into inaction by his continued affirmation that the title respondent was getting was good, and that there were no others claiming the same, that he would get the $1,000, in entire disregard of respondent's rights. The evidence shows that such price was a fair and reasonable value of the property agreed to be sold. In such circumstances the respondent had a right to rely upon the representation that the appellant knew of no claims against said property except the taxes. The representation as to title was a representation of a material fact and false, and not the expression of an opinion. Blake v. Arp, supra; Civ. Code, § 1572. The representation as to the appellant having no knowledge of any claims, except city taxes, was a representation as to a material fact and false. Crandall v. Parks, supra. Such representations were relied upon by respondent. Said representations were the inducing cause of the contract. There can be no doubt but that without them no contract would have been entered into. Craig v. Shea, 45 Cal. App. 351, 188 P. 73; Colton v. Stanford, 82 Cal. 399, 23 P. 16, 16 Am. St. Rep. 137; Oppenheimer v. Clunie, supra.

[10] Fair dealing, common honesty, and good conscience required the appellant to make a full disclosure as to the title and other claims known by him to be against the property, rather than to continue to lull this confiding defendant into a continuance of his belief in the representations of the plaintiff. Appellant, having failed to do so, was guilty of fraud in procuring the $1,000, and the whole contract was void ab initio. There was therefore no consideration for the check for $1,000. Other objections urged are devoid of merit. The findings are abundantly supported by the evidence, and the judgment is not against the law.

Judgment affirmed.

109 Cal. App. 539

CARPENTER v. ELMER R. SLY CO. et al.
Civ. 4218.District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

Nov. 14, 1930.

1. Joint-stock companies and business trusts
C-17.

Where contract in compliance with trust declaration set forth provision limiting liability to trust estate, trustees are exempt from liability, and recourse can only be had to trust property.

Declaration of trust provided that every contract executed by trustees shall be conclusively taken to have been executed or done only in their or his capacity of trustee or trustees, and that such trustee or trustees shall not be personally liable. It further provided that every instrument executed by trustees "shall recite the substance of the section showing the nonliability of the individual trustees."

2. Joint-stock companies and business trusts
C-17.

Statute providing that singular promise by several is presumed to be joint and several held inapplicable to contract by trustees of trust estate (Civ. Code, § 1660).

Contract provided that it was not made by undersigned individually, but as trustees under declaration of trust creating trust estate, and that contract was enforceable only against trust property "any and all personal liability of the trustees and beneficiaries thereunder being, and having been expressly waived."

3. Joint-stock companies and business trusts
C-17.

Provision in agreement between trust estate and third person, whereby latter associated himself with former, held to constitute third person a trustee of trust estate.

Contract provided that upon execution of agreement trust estate would constitute third person one of trustees, subject, however, to all the terms and conditions contained in the trust agreement, constituting the trust estate.

4. Contracts C-147(1).

In interpreting contract, primary object is to ascertain and carry out intention of parties (Civ. Code, § 1636).

5. Contracts C-221(3).

Contract to pay may be restricted to particular fund, so as to make sufficiency of fund condition precedent to liability.

In such case, promise cannot be enforced until fund is realized, unless failure to realize or collect fund from which payment is made is due to promisor's neglect or unreasonable refusal to act or is otherwise attributable to him.

6. Contracts C-221(3).

Bonus under terms of contract engaging third person to superintend construction of houses held payable only out of profits derived from undertaking (Civ. Code, § 1636).

Contract provided, in substance, for payment of $10 per day for services rendered, and a bonus of $100 on each and every house constructed and superintended by third person, payable as and when said houses had been sold and settlement made through escrow. Parties building houses did not own lots, but were only interested in profits derived from sale of houses after their construction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Thomas C. Gould, Judge.

Action by G. A. Carpenter against the Elmer R. Sly Company, a trust estate, and others. From a judgment for plaintiff against defendant Richard E. Eagan, the latter appeals.

Reversed.

E. O. Leake, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Newcomb Condee, Vernon P. Spencer, and W. W. Farrow, all of Inglewood, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J.

The plaintiff had judgment against Richard E. Eagan in the sum of $2,400, from which judgment the defendant appeals.

The record shows that the defendant Elmer R. Sly Company is a trust estate formed under and by virtue of a trust indenture, dated the 15th day of March, 1925. The trust instrument provides in section 3 as follows: "Every note, bond, contract, instrument, certificate or undertaking, and every other act or thing whatsoever, executed or done by the trustees, or any of them, in connection with this trust shall be conclusively taken to have been executed or done only in their or his capacity of trustee or trustees under this agreement and declaration of trust, and such trustee or trustees shall not be personally liable." The section then further provides that every instrument executed by the trustees shall recite the substance of the section showing the nonliability of the individual trustees.

On the 1st day of April, 1925, an agreement was entered into between the Elmer R. Sly Company and the defendant Richard E. Eagan, wherein it was recited that the party of the first part, to wit, Elmer R. Sly Company, had a contract with the Fidelity Mortgage Company, a corporation, relative to the building of certain houses, and that the party of the second part had been building houses in the city of Los Angeles, and had established a certain organization for the building thereof, and was desirous of entering into a contract with the party of the first part to assist party of the first part in carrying through successfully the contract of the party of the first part with said mortgage company. Wherefore, it was understood and agreed that party of the first part, to wit, Elmer R. Sly Company, should transfer to party of the second part, to wit, to Richard E. Eagan, a one-half interest in the profits to be derived from a building contract with the Fidelity Mortgage Company, etc. The contract just referred to, among other things, contained the following: "It is further agreed between the parties hereto, upon the execution of this agreement, that the party of the first part will constitute said party of the second part one of the trustees of the Elmer R. Sly Company, a Trust Estate, subject, however, to all the terms and conditions contained in the trust agreement constituting Elmer R. Sly Company a Trust Estate." Thereafter, the Elmer R. Sly Company and the defendant Richard E. Eagan entered into an agreement with the plaintiff, G. A. Carpenter, which agreement is in the words and figures following, to-wit:

"This agreement made in triplicate this 6th day of April, 1925, by and between Elmer R. Sly Company, a Trust Estate, organized and existing under the laws of the State of California, whose principal place of business is in the City of Los Angeles, State of California, and Richard E. Eagan of the said city and state, hereinafter called 'parties of the first part' and G. A. Carpenter, of the said city and state, hereinafter called 'party of the second part,'

"Whereas, the parties of the first part are desirous of securing the services of the party of the second part to assist them in the erection of twenty-four houses in the city of Los Angeles, State of California, and whereas the party of the second part has agreed to associate himself with the said parties of the first part. Now, Therefore, the parties hereto agree with each other as follows: The party of the second part agrees to devote his entire time and attention to the business of the parties of the first part, and to diligently do and perform all work necessary to superintend the construction of such houses as shall be erected by the parties of the first part, and to carry out all instructions given him in a workmanlike manner. The parties of the first part agree to pay party of the second part the sum of $10.00 for each and every day that he is employed by said parties of the first part, and are to pay to the said second party a bonus of $100.00 on each and every house constructed and superintended by said second party, payable as and when said houses have been sold and settlement made through escrow. It is agreed by and between the parties hereto that in the event of the death of the party of the second part, that the bonus herein agreed to be paid shall cease upon all houses upon which actual construction has not been started.

"It is further agreed by and between the parties hereto that this contract is made by the undersigned, not individually, but as trustees under a certain trust agreement creating Elmer R. Sly Company, and hereby made a part hereof, and is enforceable only against, and is payable only out of, the trust property held hereunder, any and all personal liability of the trustees and beneficiaries thereunder being, and having been, expressly waived by the holder hereof.

"In Witness Whereof, the said Elmer R. Sly Company has caused its signature to be affixed hereto, and said Richard E. Eagan and G. A. Carpenter have hereunto set their hands the day and year first above written.

"Elmer R. Sly Co.

"By Elmer R. Sly.

"R. E. Eagan,

"G. A. Carpenter."

At the time and prior to the execution of this agreement, G. A. Carpenter had been working for the appellant Eagan on the basis of $9 per day and 50 per cent. of the profits from their building operations. Thereafter, twenty-four houses were built under the above contract, and payment of $10 per day as wages was made by the defendants, or, rather, by the Elmer R. Sly Company, to the plaintiff. No part of the bonus was paid, and the judgment against the appellant in this action is for the sum of $2,400, representing the bonus of $100 per house. The record shows that after the building of twenty-four houses the defendant R. E. Eagan withdrew from all connection with the building transactions and severed his connection with the Elmer R. Sly Company, a trust estate.

The transcript further shows that the plaintiff had knowledge of the agreements which we have herein referred to, and of the relationship existing between the Elmer R. Sly Company, a trust estate, and the appellant, Richard E. Eagan. The testimony of the respondent, as it appears in the transcript, in this particular, reads as follows: "Mr. Eagan and Mr. Sly both told me the arrangements under which they were working. Each was to receive one-half of the profits made from the building of the houses. I knew that they did not own the lots upon which the houses were built; they were only interested in the profits to be derived from the sale of the houses, and each of them was to receive one-half. About a week before the execution of plaintiff's exhibit I (being the first agreement referred to herein), I had a lengthy discussion with Mr. Eagan and Mr. Sly at my house, during which time we talked about the building of the houses and how much we were all going to make out of it. About the following day Mr. Sly and Mr. Eagan outlined to me fully what their connection was with the transaction. Immediately prior to this time I had been working with Mr. Eagan on a basis of $9 per day and 50 per cent. of the profits made in the building of the houses." The plaintiff further testified that all the directions he received relative to the building of the houses came from the Elmer R. Sly Company, and not from the defendant; that the defendant never gave any instructions relative to the building of the houses.

The record further shows that sixteen of the twenty-four houses were sold through escrow, and the remainder by the Elmer R. Sly Company, and that in order to acquire title the defendant and his wife executed a few quitclaim deeds. There is nothing in the record, however, to warrant the holding that the defendants did anything which could be construed as a violation of the contract with the plaintiff, so as to render themselves individually liable for the $100 agreed to be paid as a bonus for each house. The record, as we have indicated, shows that Elmer R. Sly Company and Eagan were interested only in the profits to be made, and had no ownership in or to either the lots upon which the buildings were erected or in the buildings themselves.

[1] That a trust declaration similar to the one executed by the Elmer R. Sly Company is valid, and if the contracts thereafter executed by them comply with the trust declaration in setting forth in the instruments the provision of the trust declaration limiting liability to the trust estate, then and in that case third parties, or the parties so contracting with the one or the ones executing the trust declaration, have recourse only to the property of the trust estate, is expressly held in the case of Goldwater v. Oltman et al. (Cal. Sup.) 292 P. 624. Upon this appeal the appellant challenges the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings of the court, the court having found the appellant individually liable, irrespective of his relation to the Elmer R. Sly Company, and that the appellant did not occupy the position of a trustee of said company. The findings of the court, so far as necessary to be considered here, may be limited to a portion of finding No. 6, which reads: "And it is not true that said agreement also provided that the same was not made by the defendant Richard E. Eagan individually; and it is not true that the said agreement was enforceable only against and was payable only out of certain trust property therein described (referring to the agreement), and it is not true that said agreement contained an express waiver of any and all personal liability of the defendant Richard E. Eagan, but it is true that the said agreement was executed by the said defendant Richard E. Eagan individually and as a joint obligor with the said defendant Elmer R. Sly Company, a trust estate." The argument in support of this finding is based upon the holding of the court in the following cases: Farmer's Exchange Bank v. Morse, 129 Cal. 241, 61 P. 1088; Gummer v. Mairs, 140 Cal. 537, 74 P. 26; Bell v. Adams, 150 Cal. 772, 90 P. 118; Wood v. Longyear, 197 Cal. 723, 242 P. 932, 934; Reuter v. Gaudreau, 58 Cal. App. 634, 209 P. 216; Bagley v. Cohen, 121 Cal. 604, 53 P. 1117. All of these cases have been carefully examined and none of them sustain respondent's contentions.

In the case of Bagley v. Cohen, supra, it appears that the parties held liable expressly guaranteed the payment of the sum agreed to be paid in the contract. There was nothing in the contract bearing any likeness to the agreement entered into between the plaintiff in this action and the defendants Elmer R. Sly Company and Richard E. Eagan.

In the case of Wood v. Longyear, the most recent one cited by the respondent, the holding that the defendant there was liable was based upon the language of section 1659 of the Civil Code, which reads, "Where all the parties who unite in a promise receive some benefit from the consideration, whether past or present, their promise is presumed to be joint and several," followed by a statement in the opinion as follows: "There being nothing in the instrument itself to overcome this presumption, it follows that the trial court was correct in holding that the obligation of these defendants was a joint and several obligation, and hence that the action might have been begun and might proceed against either of them in so far as an individual remedy against either was sought," etc.

[2] In the contract before us there is something to the contrary. The contract itself expressly provides the fund out of which payment shall be made. Nor does section 1660 of the Civil Code, which provides that a promise made in the singular, but executed by several persons and presumed to be joint and several, apply to this case.

[3] Respondent further contends that the defendant Richard E. Eagan did not occupy the position of a trustee of the Elmer R. Sly Company, a trust estate, and therefore the exemption of liability, other than as against the property of the company, does not apply to him. The excerpt from the agreement between Elmer R. Sly Company and Richard E. Eagan which we have set forth, and of which the plaintiff had knowledge, is a conclusive answer to this contention.

[4-6] Taking all the instruments together and considering the building project in which the parties were about to engage, it seems to us absolutely clear that the $100 bonus was to be paid out of the profits, if any, derived from the undertaking. This is further strengthened by the fact that the plaintiff, instead of being paid $9 a day, his original compensation, was given an additional $1, and was paid at the rate of $10 per day. The plaintiff's own testimony shows that he understood the whole transaction; he understood the basis upon which the parties were operating, and that it was in the expectation of profits to be made by all of the parties in building the houses and selling the same. Section 1636 of the Civil Code provides that: "A contract must be so interpreted as to give effect to the mutual intention of the parties as it existed at the time of contracting, so far as the same is ascertainable and lawful." Other sections of the Code provide that the whole contract must be taken together, and also the circumstances under which it is made should be taken into consideration. In this behalf it is sufficient to cite California Juris. vol. 6, p. 252, where it is said: "The primary object of all interpretation is to ascertain and carry out the intention of the parties." This text is supported by a long list of authorities, so numerous that we cannot list them here.

Respondent makes the further contention that the condition in the agreement constituted only a stipulation as to the time of payment of the bonus fixed therein, and cites 13 C. J. 632. This reference, however, we think inapplicable. The statement of the law controlling in this case is found in the same volume of Corpus Juris, but on page 631, § 701, which reads: "A contract or promise to pay may be restricted to a particular fund so as to make the raising or the sufficiency of the fund a condition precedent to the liability, and in such case the promise cannot be enforced until the fund is realized, unless the failure to realize or collect the fund from which payment is made, is due to the neglect, or the unreasonable refusal to act, of the promisor, or is otherwise attributable to him. So, where the contract of the parties is that the creditor shall look to a particular fund, he cannot, on the failure of such fund not attributable to the fault of the debtor, hold the debtor personally responsible, unless the contract contains stipulations amounting to a guaranty that the funds specified shall be sufficient for payment, or unless the promisee is induced to perform by the promise that a third person who, the promisor claims, owes him a debt or duty, shall pay the agreed price to the promisee, in which case the promisor is primarily liable to pay the contract price, although his debtor does not pay, or the debt or the duty does not exist."

We have in this case an agreement providing that the bonus shall be paid out of a certain fund. There is also an agreement in the record, of which the respondent had knowledge, that the appellant Eagan stood in the relation of trustee to the Elmer R. Sly Company, by virtue of its own written agreement. This excludes any reasonable contention that the appellant stood either in the relation of an individual promisor or as a guarantor of the payment of the $100 per house bonus, to the respondent. There was no profit in the enterprise, and therefore no trust estate was created.

What we have said we think shows conclusively that the finding of the trial court from which we have quoted is not sustained by the testimony, but is contrary thereto. There is nothing in the record upon which any finding could be based to the effect that the appellant has done anything to render himself liable or void the effect of the agreement entered into by the parties to this action. The contention that the quickclaim deeds amounted thereto is without merit, as they were executed only to remove a cloud upon the titles.

The judgment is reversed.

HIRAIDE et al. v. COCHRAN.

Civ. 152.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

Nov. 7, 1930.

1. Physicians and surgeons ⇨18(8).

In action for malpractice, proof of negligence or lack of care or skill on part of physician can only be made by testimony of experts, viz., physicians familiar with practice in particular locality.

2. Physicians and surgeons ⇨18(8).

Unless there is expert testimony, in action for malpractice against physician, showing negligence, plaintiff is not entitled to judgment.

3. Appeal and error ⇨933(1).

On appeal, presumption is in favor of order granting a new trial.

4. New trial ⇨71.

Trial judge is under duty to grant new trial if not satisfied with verdict, notwithstanding substantial conflict in evidence.

5. Appeal and error ⇨979(2).

Order granting defendant a new trial in malpractice action was not disturbed on appeal, where evidence was substantially conflicting and trial judge was not satisfied with verdict.

WARMER, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal from an order granting a new trial in a malpractice action, the complaint charging negligence, lack of care, and lack of skill of the defendant in the performance of his professional duties in caring for Cho Hiraide. The answer denies the negligence, lack of care, and lack of skill. The motion for a new trial was made on a number of grounds, among which was insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict and that the verdict is against the law. The motion was granted upon the ground that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict. The sole question presented by the appellants is whether or not the evidence is sufficient to justify the verdict of the jury. From a careful reading of the brief of the appellants it appears that the appellants have applied the rule on appeal as the rule for the direction of the trial court on the motion for a new trial and contend that if there is sufficient evidence to support a verdict on appeal from the judgment that the trial court commits error if it grants a new trial.

Appellants cite the case of Priestley v. Stafford, 30 Cal. App. 523, 158 P. 776, as authority in support of his contention. This is an action which is an appeal by the defendant from the judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial. The only ground urged for reversal is appellant's contention that the findings are not supported by the evidence, and the appellate court quotes the evidence and finds that there is sufficient evidence to support the judgment. Taylor v. De Vaughn, 91 Cal. App. 318, 324, 266 P. 960, 963, cited by appellants, is a case of an appeal to the same effect. The court there says: "The findings of the trial court have ample support in the evidence." Rankin v. Mills, 207 Cal. 438, 278 P. 1044, also cited by appellants, is an appeal from the judgment. It would seem, therefore, necessary to again review a few of the many cases announcing the rule for the guidance of the trial court in passing upon a motion for a new trial in the determination of this appeal.

The old case of Curtiss v. Starr & Co., 85 Cal. 376, 24 P. 806, is a case in which the plaintiff introduced testimony tending to show certain facts which the jury evidently believed, but from the granting of the motion for a new trial, it must be presumed, the judge did not. In this case the court says: "And if he did not, it was his duty to grant a new trial. The rule as to conflict of evidence does not apply in the trial court. The judge should set aside the verdict whenever he is not satisfied with it upon the evidence, and his order in that regard will not be disturbed on appeal if the evidence is substantially conflicting. Dickey v. Davis, 39 Cal. 569; Sherman v. Mitchell, 46 Cal. 580; Irving v. Cunningham, 58 Cal. 306; Breckenridge v. Crocker, 68 Cal. 403, 9 P. 426."

In Gordon v. Roberts, 162 Cal. 506, at page 509, 123 P. 288, 289, the court says: "And, if there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, the trial court will not be deemed to have abused its discretion when it has determined that the verdict or the finding is against the weight of the evidence, and that there should be a new trial. 'When the evidence is conflicting, the trial court is authorized to review it; and if, in its opinion, the verdict is against the weight of evidence, it is its duty to grant a new trial.' Warner v. Thomas, etc., Works, 105 Cal. 409, 38 P. 960. See, also, Bjorman v. F. B. R. Co., 92 Cal. 500, 28 P. 591; Cole v. Wilcox, 99 Cal. 549, 34 P. 114; Bledsoe v. Decrow, 132 Cal. 312, 64 P. 397."

In the case of Marr v. Whistler, 49 Cal. App. 364, at page 369, 193 P. 600, 602, the court says: "The wide extent of the discretion of the trial court in granting or denying a new trial for insufficiency of the evidence is well-nigh axiomatic. Its action in such matters is conclusive upon the appellate court unless there has been an abuse of discretion. When there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, the trial court will not be deemed to have abused its discretion when it has determined that the verdict, or the finding, is against the weight of the evidence, and that there should be a new trial. [Citing cases.] * * * 'Even in cases where there may not appear to be a conflict in the evidence, and where all the proofs seem to be favorable to the one or the other of the parties litigant, the question as to the probative force or evidentiary value of the testimony, in a proceeding on a motion for a new trial based upon the ground that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict, is one whose determination is with the trial court. The rule (elementary and commonly familiar in our system of jurisprudence) is that the plaintiff in a civil action must establish his case by a preponderance of proof, but, although many witnesses may testify directly in favor of his position, and no adversary testimony directly adduced, it is still with the jury, in the first instance, and finally with the trial court, where a new trial is asked on the ground stated, to say whether such testimony, when subjected to the legal tests whereby the probative value of evidence is to be judged, measures up to the requirement of the law as to the degree of proof essential to the support of an issue of fact.' Otten v. Spreckels, 24 Cal. App. 251, 257, 141 P. 224, 226. In such cases the presumption is in favor of the order and against the findings, or the verdict." Condee v. Gyger, 126 Cal. 546, 59 P. 26; Hass v. Mutual, etc., Ass'n, 118 Cal. 6, 49 P. 1056; Clohan v. Kelso, 42 Cal. App. 67, 183 P. 349.

In Smith v. Royer, 181 Cal. 165, 183 P. 660, 663, the court says: "In a jury trial a party is entitled to two decisions on the evidence—one by the jury and one by the trial court, and the trial court is not bound by a conflict in the evidence." Citing cases.

In Estate of Wall, 183 Cal. 431, 191 P. 687, the court says: "The trial court in acting upon a motion for a new trial, particularly on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict or findings, has a wide discretion, and its action thereon, either for or against the motion, will not be disturbed on appeal, unless it clearly appears to the appellate court that the discretion was abused. This proposition has been so often decided that it is unnecessary to cite authorities in support of it."

In this case three eyewitnesses (daughters of the decedent) testified directly and positively that the decedent acknowledged the signature to the document proposed as a codicil to them and declared the same to them to be a codicil to her will and, that two of them then and there at her request signed their names thereto in her presence and in the presence of each other. The contradiction thereof consisted of the evidence of three other children of the decedent to the effect that in their opinion the signature to the codicil was not the signature of the decedent and the testimony of a handwriting expert to the effect that after comparing the same with numerous admittedly genuine signatures of the decedent it was his opinion that the signature to the codicil was not genuine. There was other testimony in the record also. The court said: "It is obvious that in this state of the evidence it was within the discretion of the court to grant a new trial. If he believed the evidence of the witnesses for the proponents, it was his duty to do so. While it is true that on cross-examination the said witnesses contradicted themselves and showed evidence of considerable agitation, there was nothing from which, as a matter of law, we can say the court should have refused to credit their testimony. The judge who tried the case was the judge who granted the new trial, and he saw and heard the witnesses as they were testifying, and was in a much better position to determine their credibility than this court could possibly be. It is unnecessary to consider the other points presented in the motion for a new trial. Upon this ground alone the order must be affirmed."

For further citation of authorities on the subject of insufficiency of the evidence as a ground for the granting of the motion for a new trial, see 20 Cal. Jur. 117; Hayne's New Trial and Appeal, p. 467; Conwell v. Varain, 20 Cal. App. 521, 130 P. 23, and cases there cited.

[1, 2] Appellants' brief concedes a conflict in the testimony, there being the testimony of Dr. Herbert A. Johnson, Dr. Claude E. Stein, and the testimony of the defendant himself in support of the defendant's contention. In support of the complaint there is the testimony of Dr. Cowles and lay witnesses. Without setting out the testimony in detail, there was a direct conflict in the evidence. Respondents urge that in cases of this kind proof of negligence or lack of care or lack of skill on the part of a physician can only be made by the testimony of experts, viz., physicians familiar with the practice in the locality. Unless there is such testimony showing negligence, no judgment can be sustained. Perkins v. Trueblood, 180 Cal. 437, 181 P. 642; Houghton v. Dickson, 29 Cal. App. 321, 155 P. 128; Linn v. Piersol, 37 Cal. App. 171, 173 P. 763. With such contention the appellants do not take issue and, of course, could not because it is the recognized rule in this state.

[3-5] The presumption is in favor of the order granting a new trial. There was a substantial conflict in the evidence. The trial judge was the judge who granted the motion for a new trial; he saw the witnesses and heard them testify and was in a better position to determine their credibility than this court can possibly be. It was his duty to grant the new trial in this case if he was not satisfied with the verdict. Under such circumstances, the order granting a new trial will not be disturbed on appeal. The order appealed from must therefore be affirmed.

Order appealed from affirmed.

Action by Erl H. Richardson, individually,

BURROUGHS, Justice pro tem.

On July 14, 1922, the plaintiff Erl H. Richardson and the defendants James W. Hislop and A. C. Myers entered into an agreement of partnership under the name of Clay Glow Tile Company, by which they agreed to engage in the business of buying, selling, and retailing goods, wares, and merchandise for cash, on a commission basis or otherwise, but more especially to deal in clay and tile products, including terra cotta and ornamental tile of all descriptions; together with any other articles or products appertaining or belonging thereto.

The partnership was to continue for one year unless sooner terminated as provided in said agreement and hereinafter set forth.
It was further agreed that the capital stock of said copartnership was $1,000, to be subscribed for and distributed as follows: Erl H.
Richardson, 60 per cent; James W. Hislop, 20 per cent; A. C. Myers, 20 per cent. It was further provided that Richardson should be the manager of the business and should do his best to dispose of the entire output of a certain clay and tile plant, said output to be contracted for with James W. Hislop, A. C. Myers, W. A. Hislop, L. J. Hislop, and C. E.
Cummings, a partnership doing business under the firm name of Hislop & Myers. It was further provided that Richardson's services above referred to were to supervise the architectural arrangement, drafting and color arrangement of tiles. It was also provided that compensation was to be arranged with Richardson for any special designs of fountains, fireplaces, or other special lay-outs. If the use of any special design was granted without charge by Richardson, it was understood that such special design, also the models, molds, and dies were to become the property of Richardson in consideration of such use and were to be delivered to the latter upon demand by him, and that the Clay Glow Tile Company should market and dispose of the clay and the other products contracted for with Hislop & Myers on a margin of gross profit of 25 per cent. It was also agreed that in addition to the 60 per cent. interest owned by Richardson in said business, he should receive a salary equal to 10 per cent. of the 25 per cent. gross profit to be made by the partnership firm on the clay and tile products purchased under the contract to be made with Hislop & Myers.

The partnership of Clay Glow Tile Company should continue from year to year unless sixty days before the beginning of the new year one of the partners should give notice in writing to the other partners of a desire to terminate the same.

It was also agreed that the interest of James W. Hislop and A. C. Myers was in reality their interest in the copartnership of Hislop & Myers, the copartnership hereinbefore referred to. On the same day Eri H. Richardson, James W. Hislop, and A. C. Myers, as copartners, under the name of Clay Glow Tile Company, hereinafter called the "purchasers," and James W. Hislop, A. C. Myers, W. A. Hislop, L. J. Hislop, and C. E. Cummings, copartners, doing business under the firm name of Hislop & Myers, hereinafter called "sellers," entered into an agreement, hereinafter referred to as "the selling contract," wherein it was recited that it was an exclusive contract between the parties and was to cover the "Western States of America and Hawaii," that it was an exclusive contract for the entire output of said sellers' plant, within said territory. It was further provided that all material embraced by said agreement should bear the trade name Clay Glow Tile Company or any other name or mark furnished by the purchasers and none other. It was also agreed that all designs furnished by the purchasers to the sellers and all models and molds made from designs belonging to the purchasers should at all times be and remain the property of the purchasers. Other provisions of the selling agreement will be hereinafter referred to.

On February 26, 1923, E. H. Richardson and Hislop & Myers entered into an agreement, hereinafter called the closing agreement, by the terms of which the firm of Hislop & Myers sold to said Richardson all their right, title, and interest in the Clay Glow Tile Company and all assets thereof, which included the 25 per cent. discounts from dealers' prices on all sales made, and all orders dated up to March 1, 1923, and agreed to deliver to Richardson any and all assets within their possession or in the possession of the firm known as Hislop & Myers. Hislop & Myers also agreed to take the new Ford coupé and pay the amounts so far invested by Clay Glow Tile Company, and to pay all amounts still due thereon. Hislop & Myers also agreed to deliver to E. H. Richardson, or order, tiles at Clay Glow's net prices for the sum of $500 advanced to them by Clay Glow Tile Company, or the same could be deducted, together with any other amounts due Clay Glow Tile Company, from any outstanding amounts due them from the Clay Glow Tile Company. It was further provided that upon the completion of such payments and deliveries, E. H. Richardson was to pay to Hislop & Myers the balance due them by sixty days acceptance, whereupon E. H. Richardson would and did release them to sell their wares to any and all dealers or to other persons without any claim whatever. Upon completion of the above deliveries and payments that contract dated July 14, 1922, "will become null and void."

The second amended complaint upon which the cause was tried contains four separate counts. So far as necessary to an understanding and decision of this case, it is alleged therein that up to and including the date of the closing contract, the defendants had rendered a full and true account to the Clay Glow Tile Company, in accordance with the terms of the sellers' agreement above referred to, and have received all sums of money due to the Clay Glow Tile Company, therein provided. But from and after said date defendants have refused to render said accounts or make any payments thereunder, although they have continuously made clay and tile products at their plant and sold the same. It is then alleged that defendants have violated the terms of the closing agreement in that they had in their possession under the seller's agreement, divers and sundry properties and assets of the Clay Glow Tile Company, including numerous designs furnished by plaintiff Richardson to the Clay Glow Tile Company, for the use of Hislop & Myers, and models and molds made therefrom, all of which were then and there the property of plaintiff Richardson and said Clay Glow Tile Company. That defendants failed and refused to return to plaintiff, as required by the closing agreement, said property and although frequent demand has been made therefor, defendants have refused to return the same and still retain them in their possession. It is alleged that because of the defendants' failure to return said property, the seller's agreement is still in full force and effect. It is further alleged that since February 26, 1923, the date of the making of the closing agreement, there has become due to plaintiff as commission in accordance with the terms of the sellers' agreement, $200,000, no part of which has been paid.

A second cause of action is based upon the original partnership between Eri H. Richardson, James W. Hislop, and A. C. Myers, in that by virtue of his interest in the Clay Glow Tile Company, Eri H. Richardson is entitled to 60 per cent. and a salary equal to 10 per cent. of the gross profits accruing to said partnership, Clay Glow Tile Company, from the sellers' contract. It is further alleged that under said sellers' agreement he is entitled to $200,000 commissions and that he has been damaged to the extent of his interest in the Clay Glow Tile Company to the extent of $140,000. The third cause of action has been abandoned.

As a fourth cause of action it is alleged that by reason of the failure of the defendants to deliver to Eri H. Richardson special designs, models, and molds made in accordance with the terms of the sellers' agreement, and not delivered to Richardson in accordance with the terms of the closing agreement, and which the defendants have continued to use since February 26, 1923, that the use thereof was and is of the value of $200,000. They also pray for a return of the models.

By answer the defendants deny the material allegation of the complaint wherein it is alleged that the defendants have violated any of the terms of the several contracts. They also allege that the defendant California Art Tile Company is a corporation and the successor in interest of Hislop & Myers. They also plead laches and estoppel as a defense. A counterclaim in the amount of $562.02 upon an open book account is alleged. There is a supplemental complaint based upon the same causes of action in the sum of $20,000 alleged to be due under the sellers' contract, since the filing of the complaint. The allegations of this supplemental complaint are denied by defendants.

The court found that all four causes of action and also the cause of action set forth in the supplemental complaint arose out of the same series of transactions and that the subject-matter is the same; that the first cause of action based on the sellers' agreement above referred to was abrogated by the closing agreement of February 26, 1923; that the original contract of partnership was also terminated by the same agreement; that after the day when the closing agreement was signed neither the Clay Glow Tile Company nor Eri H. Richardson at any time made any effort to sell any of the products of Hislop & Myers or their successors, the California Art Tile Company, nor did they or either of them maintain any office or salesmen for that purpose, nor did they or either of them thereafter offer to buy any products made by the defendants; that immediately after February 26, 1923, the defendant California Art

Tile Company organized its own sales force and through this agency alone were its products sold; that the California Art Tile Company (also Hislop & Myers) performed all the conditions of the closing agreement, except that it did not return to Eri H. Richardson certain molds that were in the possession of the California Art Tile Company at the time the closing agreement was executed; that after signing said last-named agreement Eri H. Richardson kept and retained the 25 per cent. discount referred to in the closing agreement, amounting in all to the sum of $1,800, and received from the California Art Tile Company tiles at Clay Glow net prices, as provided for in the closing agreement; that E. H. Richardson has never returned nor offered to return to the California Art Tile Company any of the property received or retained by him under the said agreement, and has never demanded the return of the molds or any other property of his in the possession of the California Art Tile Company, but said Richardson did at various times after the execution of the closing agreement demand that the California Art Tile Company pay him for the use of said molds and certain models and designs which he claimed were in their possession. Nor did Richardson before commencing this action notify defendants that the sellers' agreement was in effect, except that he at all times notified them that they had certain models, molds, and designs in their possession by virtue of the closing agreement and demanded compensation for their use; that after February 26, 1923, defendants did not have in their possession any designs or models or any other property belonging to plaintiff except certain molds hereinafter referred to.

The court also found that the plaintiff was by his conduct estopped to deny the force and effect of the closing contract; that he was also guilty of laches in bringing the action. The court further found that certain molds belonging to Richardson under the terms of the closing agreement were retained by the defendants; that their use to the California Art Tile Company was worth the sum of $727, which was the greatest value to plaintiff or to any other person or concern for any purpose whatever. That the closing agreement had been substantially performed by both parties, except that defendants failed to deliver said molds for which failure plaintiff could be adequately compensated in damages. It was also found that the California Art Tile Company was entitled to recover $510 on its counterclaim, and it was adjudged that plaintiff recover $217. The plaintiffs appeal from the judgment.

Appellant claims that the respondents failed to comply with the provisions of the closing agreement and therefore the sales contract is in full force and effect, and that appellant is entitled to recover all sums which would have been due him as though there had never been any attempt to terminate the sales contract and both parties had fully complied with its terms. The court found that the sales agreement had been abrogated by the closing agreement; that the latter had been substantially performed, but that the California Art Tile Company, the successor of Hislop & Myers, had not returned to appellant certain molds that were in its possession at the time of the execution of the closing agreement; that no demand had been made upon the defendants for the return of said property to the plaintiff; that the value of the use of said molds could be readily compensated by a money judgment; that the value of the use of said molds was $727. The court also found that the partnership agreement between Eri H. Richardson, James W. Hislop, and A. C. Myers was terminated by the closing agreement. These findings of the court are all attacked upon the ground that they are not sustained by the evidence. The evidence shows without conflict that under the closing agreement appellant received $1,800 for the assets of the Clay Glow Tile Company, provided for in the first paragraph of said agreement; that the defendants took the Ford coupé and paid to appellant all sums invested in said automobile and made all subsequent payments and all further sums remaining due on said coupé, all as provided in the second paragraph of said agreement. That defendants also delivered to appellant tiles at Clay Glow's net prices for the sum of $500 advanced to them by Clay Glow Tile Company, all as provided in the third paragraph of said agreement. The dispute between the parties rests upon the alleged failure of the defendants to return to appellant certain designs, models, and molds in accordance with the provisions of the selling agreement. Appellant claims he is entitled to damages for their use by the defendants. Upon this subject the evidence of William Hislop is to the effect that the models made from Richardson's designs were made into molds and the molds were worn out and replaced before the signing of the closing agreement; that the defendants had no original designs prepared by Richardson; that they had models prepared from his designs which were always destroyed in the making of the first mold. The witness never saw any of Richardson's designs that had not been made into molds before February 26, 1923. So far as the witness knew there were none. He was the person who had the matter in charge. The appellant testified that the cost of making the ordinary molds was from three to five or six dollars. A. C. Myers testified that a mold of the seal heads cost eight or nine dollars. Will Hislop testified they had about seventy molds. The court found that appellant was entitled to recover for the use of all the molds, $727. A. Clay Myers testified the appellant did not ask that defendants return any designs, models, or molds, but he claimed he was entitled to pay for their use by the defendants. The same witness testified that appellant never offered to assume the burdens imposed upon him by the selling agreement.

There is further evidence to sustain the findings of the court and there is also evidence which raises a conflict, but we are not concerned with the weight of the evidence, that having been resolved by the trial court.

It is claimed by appellant that where a controversy is intended to be settled by a closing agreement, and this closing agreement is violated by one party, the other party has a right to elect to sue for the breach of the closing agreement or to sue upon the original contract or claim, and he cites as the leading case thereon Scheeline v. Moshier, 172 Cal. 565, 158 P. 222, 224. However, we are of the opinion that the case cited is not in point. When the closing agreement was entered into, according to plaintiff's complaint, there was no controversy between the parties, the complaint itself alleges that all claims and accounts were settled in full at the time the closing agreement was executed. In the case of Scheeline v. Moshier, supra, an action was pending to collect an amount claimed to be due on a promissory note. A stipulation was filed whereby plaintiff agreed to take an amount less than actually due on the note, payable in installments on specified dates, with the provision that if default were made plaintiff might take judgment for the full amount of the note. It was held that as default had been made the plaintiff was entitled to maintain another action on the original note. The court says: "It was by its terms made conditional. The acceptance of $1,500 (less than the sum admitted to be due) was to take place 'providing' the payment thereof was made in the 'manner' therein specified; not otherwise. * * * Upon failure to pay any installment at the stated time, the condition failed. * * *"

In the case at bar the closing agreement recites that in consideration of $10 and "the following mutual covenants and agreements," then follows a recitation of the covenants to be performed by each one of the parties and a further covenant that upon the performance thereof, Richardson will and does release defendants to sell their wares to other dealers or other persons without hindrance or claim, and upon completion of said deliveries and payments the contract dated July 14, 1922, will become null and void. In Williston on Contracts, § 671, p. 1294, it is held that: "Courts are disinclined to construe the stipulations of a contract as conditions precedent, unless compelled by the language of the contract plainly expressed. The reason of this disinclination is that such a construction prevents the court from dealing out justice to the parties according to the equities of the case." In the same volume, section 665, p. 1282, it is said: "As a matter of construction, it seems better to favor bilateral contracts than unilateral, and in bilateral contracts better, where the meaning of the agreement is doubtful, to construe words as involving a promise by the party who is expected to do the act in question than as words of condition. Such a construction protects both parties to the transaction, and also does not involve the consequences that a slight failure to perform wholly destroys all rights under the contract. The law recognizes the propriety of this rule of construction * * * Especially words appropriate for condition have not been given their natural meaning where the consequence would lead to injustice, and a violation of the probable intent of the parties."

In Antonelle v. Lumber Company, 140 Cal. 309, at page 318, 73 P. 966, 969, it is said: "We are satisfied that the stipulations of the parties in the contract upon this whole subject were not conditions precedent, but, in effect, simply covenants. As said by Parsons: 'Words of proviso and condition will be construed into words of covenant when such is the apparent intent and meaning of the parties.' * * * 'The whole context also of the document is to be considered. * * * The construction depends upon the intention of the parties, to be collected in each particular case from the terms of the agreement itself, and from the subject-matter to which it relates. Whether a provision in a contract is a stipulation * * * or a condition * * * is to be gathered from the whole document.' Wharton on Contracts, § 555." The following cases also pertain to the same point: Green County v. Quinlan, 211 U. S. 582, 29 S. Ct. 162, 53 L. Ed. 335; Kauffman v. Raeder, 108 F. 171, 47 C. C. A. 278, 54 L. R. A. 247; First National Bank v. Bowers, 141 Cal. 253, 262, 74 P. 856.

[1, 2] The evidence discloses that the respondents were endeavoring to terminate the selling agreement; this was testified to by appellant and respondents alike. At the time of the execution of the closing agreement, there was no dispute between the parties; all obligations on both sides had been fulfilled. The closing agreement fixes no dates when payments were to be made or goods delivered. It contemplated an immediate fulfillment of its terms. We are of the opinion that notwithstanding the language of the last two paragraphs of the closing agreement said closing agreement constitutes a "novation." Section 1530 of the Civil Code defines a novation as a substitution of a new obligation for an existing one. Section 1531 of the Civil Code provides that a novation is made "by the substitution of a new obligation between the same parties, with intent to extinguish the old obligation." In Beckwith, as Administrator, etc., v. Sheldon et al., 165 Cal. 319, 131 P. 1049, it is held that where there has been a novation the original contract is not revived by a breach of the new one. Before recovery could be had on the old contract the party must rescind and must as a condition place the other party in status quo. In the instant case no such attempt has been made. The contention of the appellant is not well founded.

[3] Defendants plead estoppel. This plea is sustained by the following evidence: The agreement of partnership between Eri H. Richardson, J. W. Hislop, and A. C. Myers (Exhibit A), and the sellers' agreement were executed on July 14, 1922, and were acted upon by both parties until February 26, 1923, when said agreements were superseded by the closing agreement. It was well known to plaintiff that the defendants were seeking an abrogation of the contracts. Upon the execution of the closing agreement the defendants reorganized the business, established their own sales agency, and continued manufacturing clay products. Their business increased from a very small amount previous to the execution of the closing agreement to nearly a quarter of a million dollars in 1925. The appellant was among their customers. According to the testimony of the defendants, plaintiff never hinted or suggested that the sales agreement was still in force. Under the sales agreement the plaintiff was obligated to organize and maintain a sales force to sell the entire output of defendants' factory. None of these things was ever done or attempted to be done after the closing agreement. Plaintiff also received from defendants the balance due on the Ford automobile. He received $1,800 in cash, profits made by Clay Glow Tile Company, up to February 26, 1923, and $500 worth of the products of respondents' plant owing Clay Glow Tile Company and has retained all these benefits.

We think under these circumstances he is now estopped to claim the benefit of defendants' skill and labor. 10 Cal. Jur. § 14, p. 626; Carpy v. Dowdell, 115 Cal. 677, 47 P. 695; section 1963, subd. 3, Code Civ. Proc.: 10 Cal. Jur. § 18, pp. 633, 634.

[4] It is also contended that under the fourth count of the complaint the plaintiff was entitled to damages for the retention and continued use by defendants of plaintiff's designs, models, and molds; that the designs which were made by him had a particular value as the product of the mind, and a measure of damage equal only to the cost of production of the design is far less than its real value.

The court awarded plaintiff $727 as damages under this count. The appellant had not copyrighted any of the designs. All of them had been published before February 26, 1923. We are therefore satisfied that the case comes within the provisions of sections 980 and 983 of the Civil Code. Section 980 provides: "The author of any product of the mind, * * * has an exclusive ownership therein, * * * which continues so long as the product and the representations or expressions thereof made by him remain in his possession." Section 983 provides: "If the owner of a product of the mind intentionally makes it public, a copy or reproduction may be made public by any person, without responsibility to the owner, so far as the law of this state is concerned."

[5] In State v. State Journal Company, 75 Neb. 275, 106 N. W. 434, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 174, 13 Ann. Cas. 254, it is held that it is only through the provisions of the copyright law that the work of authors, designers, and inventors can be protected as their individual property. In the instant case it is argued by counsel for appellant that the relation between plaintiff and defendant is a contractual one and does not arise from the law last cited. However, we have already held that the other contracts were superseded by the closing contract, and therefore the rule of law above stated is applicable here. Complaint is made of the court's refusal to admit evidence to establish the value of the use of the plaintiff's designs. The court allowed evidence and awarded damages for the reproduction cost, but sustained the objection made because plaintiff had no property right in such noncopyrighted designs. We think the court was right in its ruling under the authorities last above cited.

We are of the opinion that no useful purpose would be served in further discussion of the case. Under the holding of this court on the several points passed upon, the judgment must be affirmed.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Automobiles ⇨242(8).

Defendants had burden of proof as to contributory negligence of plaintiffs, whose automobile left highway while passing defendant's car.

Facts disclosed that, as truck was moving along highway, defendant's and plaintiff's cars approached from the rear, and that, when about 50 feet away, driver of plaintiff's car sounded his horn, and started to pass both defendant's car and the truck; and that, when front wheels of plaintiff's car were opposite the rear wheels of defendant's car, the latter turned out suddenly to the left and across plaintiff's path; and that, to avoid a collision, plaintiff's driver was compelled to leave the highway, whereupon car ran into bank, resulting in injuries to plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, Colusa County; Ernest Weyand, Judge.

Action by A. T. Munoz and wife against Anna E. Kennedy and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and the defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Len H. Honey, of Stockton, for appellants.

Everett M. Glenn and Downey & Chester, all of Sacramento, for respondents.

Mr. Justice pro tem. TUTTLE delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries received in an automobile accident. The court, sitting without a jury, gave judgment for plaintiffs, and this appeal is taken from the judgment.

Two grounds are relied upon for a reversal. The first is, that the court erred in denying a motion for a nonsuit, based upon the contributory negligence of plaintiffs. The second is, that the finding of the court that defendant was negligent is not supported by the evidence.

From the record it appears that on January 29, 1929, James Allen Joy, fourteen years of age, was driving an automobile in a northerly direction on the highway, near Arbuckle, Cal. His sister, Althea, aged twenty, was with him. His car was a very old one. It had formerly been a taxicab, and was equipped with a box body built in the rear of the cab. It is referred to in the evidence as a "truck," and was traveling at a speed of some twenty miles per hour. Defendant Kennedy was the owner of a Chrysler coupé which was being driven by defendant Moulton. Miss Kennedy and her grandmother were passengers. The coupé was equipped with a rear view mirror, and the window upon the driver's side was open. The third car involved was being driven by plaintiff A. T. Munoz, who was accompanied by his wife (plaintiff Daisy V. Munoz) and their small child.

As the truck was moving along the highway, the coupé approached from the rear and moved into a position some twenty-five feet behind the truck. Plaintiffs' car now also came up from the rear, at a speed of some thirty-five miles per hour. When about fifty feet away, the driver of plaintiffs' car sounded his horn and started to pass both the car and truck. When the front wheels of plaintiffs' car were opposite the rear wheels of defendants' car, the latter turned out suddenly to the left and across the path of plaintiffs. In order to avoid a collision, plaintiffs' driver was compelled to leave the highway and run upon loose gravel, where his car skidded and ran into a bank, resulting in serious and permanent injuries to Mrs. Munoz. It was admitted by the driver of defendants' car that she did not look into the rear view mirror before attempting to turn out. The occupants of the truck testified that they heard but one signal given from the rear. They were unable to state which car gave that signal. In view of the fact that plaintiffs testified that their horn was sounded some fifty feet in the rear of the coupé, the trial judge could reasonably have inferred that defendants gave no signal when they attempted to pass the truck.

[1-4] It is first urged that the court erred in denying the motion for a nonsuit, for the reason that the evidence shows that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. It is also contended that the finding of the court that plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence is without any support in the evidence. The burden of proof upon this issue rests upon defendant. 19 Cal. Jur. 698. "Ordinarily, of course, the question whether a plaintiff has been guilty of contributory negligence is one of fact for the jury. It becomes a question of law for the decision of the court only where the facts are undisputed, and, even then, only where, on those facts, reasonable minds can draw but one conclusion on the issue of plaintiff's negligence." Globe Indemnity Co. v. Hook, 46 Cal. App. 700, 189 P. 797, 798. The argument of appellant is "that plaintiff could have applied his brakes and continued on the pavement behind defendants' car, or could have slackened his speed and proceeded upon the dirt and gravel at the side of the road in a safe fashion, where there was ample room for the passage of an automobile." It is well established that negligence is not absolute, but always relative to the particular circumstances upon which it is sought to be predicated. We cannot say here as a matter of law that it was the absolute duty of plaintiff to have followed the course here outlined by appellant. It was the peculiar province of the trial court to pass upon this question of fact. It is also contended that the accident was caused by the excessive speed of plaintiffs' car. There is evidence that plaintiffs were traveling at a lawful rate of speed, and our inquiry ends there. We cannot say, as a matter of law, that the speed at which plaintiffs were traveling was excessive under the circumstances. That was a question of fact, also, for the trial court.

Concluding this phase of the case, we might add that the entire argument of appellant is one which might well have been directed toward the trial court upon the facts of the case, but it presents no question of law for the determination of this court. We cannot say, from the facts of the case, that reasonable men can draw but one inference, and that an inference pointing unerringly to the negligence of the plaintiff contributing to the injury. Reaugh v. Cudahy Packing Co., 189 Cal. 335, 208 P. 125.

[5] The other contention made by appellants is that the finding of negligence upon the part of defendants is not supported by the evidence. This point is equally devoid of merit. The driver of defendants' car, without giving the signal required by law (California Vehicle Act, § 125, subd. b [St. 1923, p. 517]), attempted to pass the truck. Acting thus in violation of the law, she turned directly in the path of plaintiffs, who were in a lawful position upon the highway, and plaintiffs were forced off the highway, where their car went out of control. A finding of negligence upon the part of defendants under such circumstances cannot be disturbed by this court. To hold otherwise would be tantamount to a flagrant usurpation of the functions of the trial court.

No meritorious showing for a reversal having been made, the judgment must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

Ex parte YEOMAN et al.
Cr. 2027.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California.
Nov. 10, 1930.

Habeas corpus ⇨85(1).

Evidence held insufficient to connect defendant with offense charged or any other offense requiring discharge on writ of habeas corpus.

Transcript of proceedings at preliminary hearing of petitioners for habeas corpus showed two men ran from bank which was held up and escaped in Ford car driven by woman, but license number of such car differed from license number of Ford car owned by petitioner. None of witnesses identified petitioner as driver of car and did not identify her car as one used by fleeing men to escape.

Application by Alvin Yeoman and another for writ of habeas corpus.

Writ granted in part, and denied in part.

S. S. Hahn and Gordon M. Gale, both of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

ARCHIBALD, Justice pro tem.

In this proceeding a writ was issued as to the petitioner Lillian Yeoman and denied as to petitioner Alvin Yeoman. Return to the writ was made by William I. Traeger, sheriff of Los Angeles county, but no appearance was made for or on behalf of that officer at the time of hearing.

An examination of the reporter's transcript of proceedings had at the preliminary hearing of petitioners shows that two men ran from the bank which was held up and escaped in a Ford car driven by a woman. One witness testified that the license number of the car in which the men were driven away was 1-B-61-27. It appears that petitioner Lillian Yeoman had a Ford car with license number 1-R-43-59. None of the witnesses identified Lillian Yeoman as the driver of the car in question, nor did they identify her car, which was afterwards found, as the one in which the fleeing men escaped.

It is the contention of petitioner Lillian Yeoman that her detention is illegal for the reason that no evidence was introduced tending to connect her with the offense charged, or with any other offense. In view of the foregoing we must agree with the position taken.

The petitioner Lillian Yeoman is discharged from custody.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 19, 1930.

1. Appeal and error ⇨1011(1).

Trial court's finding on conflicting evidence on issue whether work was completed by contractor suing to foreclose lien, in accordance with contract, is conclusive.

2. Mechanics' liens ⇨132(1).

Claim of contractor's lien filed within 10 days after completion of work held not premature (Code Civ. Proc. § 1187).

Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, authorizes filing of claim for contractor's lien at any time "within sixty days after the completion of his contract."

3. Mechanics' liens ⇨288(1).

Defendants in action to foreclose contractor's lien held not, as matter of law, entitled to credit for payment made and price of suit made for plaintiff.

There was testimony to the effect that the payment made was for extra work, and that the suit of clothes made by defendant for plaintiff was not accepted by plaintiff because unsatisfactory.

4. Pleading ⇨258(3).

In action to foreclose contractor's lien, denying application to file second amended answer when trial was practically completed held not abuse of discretion.

Defendants were permitted to amend their answer on day case came up for trial, and subsequently made application to file second amended answer when trial was practically completed. Proposed amended answer made but little change in issues as formerly presented.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles C. Montgomery, Judge.

Action by J. Cowan against Harry Herman and wife and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant named and wife appeal.

Affirmed.

William A. Spill, of Pasadena, for appellants.

D. M. Potter and A. J. Getz, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

Mr. Presiding Justice FINCH delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an action to foreclose a contractor's lien for an amount alleged to be due the plaintiff for moving and remodeling a building belonging to the defendants Harry and Esther Herman. The defendant Security Trust & Savings Bank was made a defendant on the ground that it held a mortgage on the property, subject and subordinate to the plaintiff's lien. Judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff, and the Hermans have appealed.

[1] The complaint alleges and the appellants' answer admits the execution of a contract for the doing of the work for the price of $1,920. The complaint alleges that the plaintiff did extra work of the reasonable value of $251. The answer admits that there is due the plaintiff for extra work the sum of $14. The complaint alleges that the work was completed on the 14th day of August, 1926, and that the plaintiff duly filed his claim of lien on August 18, 1926. The answer denies that the contract was fully performed or completed by the plaintiff, specifying certain particulars in which appellants claim the work was incomplete and defective. The court found in favor of the plaintiff for the amount of the contract price and the admitted sum of $14 for extras. The evidence is conflicting as to whether the work was completed in accordance with the terms of the contract, and therefore the court's finding on that issue is conclusive.

[2] Appellants contend that "respondent's claim of lien was premature," because filed under ten days after the completion of the work. Under the provisions of section 1187 of the Code of Civil Procedure, such a claim may be filed by a contractor at any time "within sixty days after the completion of his contract."

[3] Appellants contend that they are entitled to credit for $175 claimed by them to have been paid on the contract price and $85 for a suit of clothes made by defendant Harry Herman for the plaintiff. There is testimony to the effect that the $175 mentioned was paid for extra work, and that the suit of clothes was not accepted because unsatisfactory. Under such circumstances it cannot be held, as a matter of law, that the appellants are entitled to the credits claimed.

[4] Appellants contend that the court erred in refusing them permission to file an amended answer. The complaint was filed August 20, 1926. The appellants' answer was filed August 30, 1926. The case came on for trial on December 2, 1927. On that day the appellants were permitted to amend their answer. The application to file an amended answer was made on December 12, 1927, when the trial was practically completed, the testimony covering over 300 pages of the transcript on appeal. The proposed amended answer made but little change in the issues, and it cannot be held, under the circumstances stated, that the trial court abused its discretion in denying the application.

The judgment is affirmed.

Albert A. Rosenshine, Elbert W. Davis, and J. H. Hoffman, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

Respondent has petitioned this court for a rehearing. In his petition he asserts that the pledge of bonds was given to secure the deposit of $54,547.62 only. He urges that, if the former order of this court is carried out, it will result in an overpayment to appellant.

Appellant has filed an answer to the petition for rehearing in which it is asserted that the pledge secured the total deposits in the sum of $64,285.69, from which it would follow that no overpayment would result.

We have examined the record again, and are not prepared to decide which sum the pledge purported to secure. We believe that this should be definitely determined by the trial court. Therefore the following is stricken from the last paragraph of the opinion in this case filed on October 21, 1930: "With directions to the court below to grant the petition of the District and order the payment to it of the dividend of fifteen per cent upon its claim number four hundred thirty-three for $54,547.62."

With the opinion thus modified, petition for rehearing is denied.

"This option will not expire before Sept.
15/1926.

"10 head of cattle to be cut out by party of second and price agreed on by Buyer & Seller.

"[Signed] Pat Mullaly

"John Mullaly."

[1] In legal effect, the writing was no more than an offer unsupported by consideration.

The evidence shows that on September 1st, fifteen days before the expiration date of the option, and before it was revoked by defendants, it was accepted by Grieve in so far as it applied to the cattle. Before September 1st, Grieve had sold all of his rights under the option to a lease of the realty to one D. Q.
Adams, under a proposition whereby Adams, when he consummated the lease with defendants, was to pay Grieve thirty-five cents an acre profit. The evidence likewise shows that on September 1st Adams tendered to defendants a check for $500 as part payment on the lease, and likewise tendered to defendants for their signatures a formal lease, naming Adams as lessee. The defendants refused to sell the cattle or to enter into the Adams' lease. Grieve thereupon brought this action, framing his complaint in two counts. The first cause of action was for damages sustained by virtue of defendants' refusal to lease the land, and the second cause of action was for the damages sustained by virtue of defendants' failure and refusal to sell the cattle. The court, sitting without a jury, after evidence had been adduced substantially as set forth supra, entered its judgment in favor of the defendants on the first cause of action, and in favor of plaintiff on the second cause of action. Each party appealed from so much of the judgment as was adverse to him.
The appeal of the defendants was subsequently dismissed on motion of the plaintiff. We are now concerned only with the decision of the trial court with reference to the lease.

[2-4] The result reached by the trial court is undoubtedly correct. The writing of August 21st in no way bound Grieve, and, being unsupported by consideration, it in no way bound defendants until accepted. It amounted to an offer to Grieve to enter into the two contracts any time before September 15, 1926. It is elementary that an offer may be revoked any time before acceptance, and this rule applies in cases where the offer states, as it does here, that it shall remain open for a designated period. Civ. Code, § 1586; 6 Cal. Jur. 51, § 29. It is equally elementary that an offer to contract is not assignable; it being purely personal to the offeree. In this case the offer was made to Grieve. The evidence does not disclose any acceptance by him. Adams attempted to accept the offer, not as the agent or representative of Grieve, but in his own right. This is conclusively shown by the fact that Adams tendered to the Mullalys a lease for their signatures, naming him, Adams, as lessee. This was not an acceptance of the offer made to Grieve. The evidence is likewise clear that, at the time Adams made his purported acceptance, defendants, in the presence of Grieve, clearly revoked the offer that had been made to Grieve. This, as we have seen, defendants had a legal right to do.

The judgment is affirmed.

CRAIG, Acting P. J.

[1, 2] By a complaint consisting of several counts or causes of action, the petitioner instituted a suit in the Superior Court for $500 alleged to have been earned as commission while in the employment of the defendants therein named. A demurrer interposed upon the ground that said court had no jurisdiction of the action was sustained, and the plaintiff has petitioned for a writ of mandamus to require the overruling of the demurrer and a trial of the issues.

The Superior Court is without jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action. Scott v. Superior Court (Cal. App.) 292 P. 290. The complaint contains certain allegations as to the inability of the plaintiff to ascertain the amount of business transacted by defendants, and prays an accounting, but, since the amount alleged to be due the plaintiff is elsewhere stated as a definite sum, the averments are not sufficient to confer jurisdiction. *Kinley v. PEOPLE v. VALLIER.

Cr. 1996.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California.

Nov. 20, 1930.

1. Homicide ☞116(6).

Threats never justify homicide or attempt to take life, though admissible to throw light on circumstances surrounding moment of affray.

2. Homicide ☞332(3).

Evidence, though conflicting, being sufficient to sustain conviction for murder in second degree, conviction was not disturbed.

Evidence sustained conviction for second degree murder as against contention crime was manslaughter.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles W. Fricke, Judge.

Charles Vallier was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he appeals.

Affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and James S. Howie, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SCHMIDT, Justice pro tem.

Appellant was convicted in the lower court of murder in the second degree, and from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial has appealed to this court.

On the evening of February 15, 1930, appellant was engaged in a pool game in a room on Central avenue in the city of Los Angeles with one Jess McDonald, with $3 wagered on the result of the game. It seems that the decedent, Elijah Wade, was the backer of McDonald, and towards the close of the game injected himself into the game by various remarks addressed to appellant. Upon appellant's remonstrance, the decedent, Wade, used abusive and boisterous language to appellant, resulting in a belligerent attitude between Wade and appellant, each toward the other, the former having picked up a pool ball, apparently with the intent of throwing same at appellant, and appellant taking his cue by the smaller end in an attitude of striking Wade. Before further trouble, however, others in the room stepped between the belligerents, among them one Flournoy, the pool hall manager, who succeeded in having Wade leave the hall. As Wade was leaving, he uttered some threats at appellant, and then, accompanied by a cousin by the name of Miller, went north on Central avenue. Up to this point there is no substantial conflict in the evidence. Shortly afterwards appellant left the pool hall, and some seventy-five feet northerly therefrom overtook Wade and Miller. The evidence is in conflict as to the length of time that appellant remained in the pool hall before leaving to go north on Central avenue; the evidence is conflicting as to whether appellant overtook Wade and Miller, or whether, as appellant was hurrying northerly on Central avenue, Wade and Miller stepped from between two automobiles in the street and accosted appellant. The evidence also is in conflict as to whether anything was said or done towards appellant by either Wade or Miller immediately prior to appellant's striking Wade with his pocketknife, or whether appellant hurriedly overtook Wade and Miller, and without warning struck Wade with the open blade of his pocketknife. The evidence is undisputed that appellant did strike decedent with his pocket knife about one and one-half inches above the clavicle on the inner third of the right side of the chest, the blade penetrating inwardly and downwardly, cutting between the lungs and the pleura, and causing a deep penetrating wound into the lung; that the blade of the pocketknife used broke off and remained in the body of Wade until later removed by a physician; that as a result of the injury traumatic pneumonia set in, from which Wade died some days afterwards.

[1] Appellant complains that the trial court incorrectly and erroneously stated the law and thereby misled the jury, as follows: "The court instructs the jury that threats alone never justify a homicide or an attempt to take life though admissible in evidence to throw light on the circumstances surrounding the moment of the affray." We cannot agree with this contention. The instruction was a correct pronouncement of the law.

[2] Appellant further contends that the evidence was insufficient to warrant or sustain the conviction of the appellant, claiming that the evidence as a whole was reasonably reconcilable with the hypothesis of innocence. There being ample evidence in the record to sustain the verdict of guilty, this court will not disturb the finding of the jury thereon.

[3] It is further contended that the degree of the crime at best is manslaughter and not second degree murder, and in support thereof appellant cites People v. Elmore, 167 Cal. 205, 138 P. 989, 991. The facts in the Elmore Case differ from the facts in the case at bar. In the Elmore Case the stabbing occurred in the heat of passion during a fight with the deceased in which the decedent was the aggressor. It was said therein: "All the circumstances tend to show that Elmore was acting in good faith and really desired to avoid any quarrel or difficulty."

From all the testimony in the case at bar the jury had a right to believe, and by their verdict evidently did believe, the witness who testified that appellant substantially ran after Wade, and, upon overtaking him and Miller, deliberately and without any necessity stabbed Wade. The evidence being in conflict, and there being sufficient evidence to support the verdict, this court will not disturb same.

No other points need be discussed.

Judgment and order affirmed.

SPENCE, J.

Plaintiffs brought an action against defendant for damages resulting from an automobile collision. After a judgment in favor of defendant on a trial by jury, a new trial was granted. The defendant appeals from the order granting the new trial.

[1] The order read "Motion for new trial granted." It will therefore be presumed that it was not based upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence. Code Civ. Proc. § 657. In support of the trial court's order granting the new trial, respondents rely upon error in the instructions to the jury.

[2] Appellant's first contention is that the new trial should not have been granted as there was no evidence to support a verdict for plaintiffs. We cannot agree with appellant in this regard. The accident happened in March, 1928, in a circle at the intersection of five streets in San Francisco. This circle has a radius of eighty feet and traffic from Taraval street, Montalvo avenue, Dewey boulevard, Kensington way, and Claremont boulevard enter upon it. Plaintiffs entered from Taraval street and were proceeding in a general easterly direction almost directly across the circle to Kensington way. Defendant entered from Dewey boulevard proceeding in a general southwesterly direction with the intention of proceeding around the post in the center of the circle and then south on Claremont boulevard. The machines collided near the center of the circle, the front of defendant's Chevrolet striking the left rear portion of plaintiffs' Studebaker. The record presents the usual conflict of evidence which ordinarily appears when witnesses attempt to describe the events surrounding the collision of moving vehicles at an intersection. The testimony relating to the speed of the machines and to their relative positions as they entered and traversed the intersection was in sharp conflict. It will serve no useful purpose to review the testimony in detail. It was plaintiffs' theory that they had first entered the intersection on defendant's right at a lawful speed; that they were entitled to the right of way and entitled to assume that the defendant would yield the right of way; that after observing the approach of defendant, plaintiff had directed his attention to traffic coming in on his right from Claremont boulevard; that defendant had approached the intersection at a high rate of speed, had failed to reduce his speed or to yield the right of way, and had attempted to turn his machine in the intersection without first seeing that this movement could be made in safety. It was defendant's theory that he had first entered the intersection at a lawful speed; that he had slowed down to permit plaintiffs to pass; that plaintiffs were traveling at a high rate of speed; and that the collision occurred when his machine was practically at a standstill. Under the evidence it is our opinion that a close case was presented to the jury for their determination and that there was sufficient evidence, if believed by the jury, to support a verdict for the plaintiffs and likewise sufficient evidence, if believed by the jury, to support a verdict for the defendant.

[3-5] Appellant next contends that there was no error in the instructions to the jury and further that if error did exist, it was not prejudicial. Among the instructions there was but one "formula" instruction, which instruction was the one complained of by respondents on the motion for new trial. This instruction read as follows: "I instruct you that, if you believe from the evidence that plaintiff, S. H. Pope, saw the automobile of the defendant approach the circle, at the intersection of Dewey boulevard and Kensington avenue, at a high rate of speed, then I instruct you that it was the duty of said plaintiff to be vigilant and to exercise ordinary care to avoid collision with the automobile of defendant and, if you find from the evidence that plaintiff failed to exercise such vigilance and ordinary care, then your verdict will be against the plaintiff and in favor of the defendant." This instruction obviously omitted the essential element of proximate cause. "In order that the negligence of a plaintiff may release a defendant from liability such negligence must contribute proximately to the injury complained of." 19 Cal. Jur. 649, and cases cited. It has been repeatedly held that a "formula" instruction directing a verdict under certain conditions must include all the conditions necessary to support such verdict. Rush v. Lagomarsino, 196 Cal. 308, 319, 237 P. 1066; Starr v. Los Angeles Ry. Corp., 187 Cal. 270, 275, 201 P. 599; Pierce v. United Gas & Electric Co., 161 Cal. 176, 184, 118 P. 700; Sinan v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Ry. Co. (Cal. App.) 284 P. 1041. In order to entitle defendant to a verdict it was essential that the negligence, if any, of plaintiffs be a proximate cause of the injury and it was error to omit this essential element from the foregoing instruction. There may be some doubt as to whether this error was prejudicial. The trial court evidently believed that it was. In granting a motion for new trial on the ground of erroneous instructions, it is proper that a wide discretion should be allowed to the trial court, and the order granting the new trial should not be disturbed unless there appears to be an abuse of discretion. Thompson v. California Construction Co., 148 Cal. 35, 82 P. 367; Associated Fruit Co. v. Marone, 68 Cal. App. 358, 229 P. 868; 20 Cal. Jur. 140. It does not appear that the trial court abused its discretion in granting the motion.

BARNARD, J.

This is an action for damages for injuries sustained by the plaintiffs while riding as guests in an automobile driven by the defendant. The accident occurred near Deming, N. M., about 10 o'clock on the evening of December 12, 1927. The defendant, driving a Willys Knight automobile equipped with four-wheel brakes, was proceeding west along a main graveled highway, the traveled portion of which was 18 feet wide. At the point where the accident occurred a combination cattle gate and cattle guard was located upon the highway. A post stood in the center of the roadway, on the south side of which was an iron gate, which was closed at the time, and on the north side thereof was a cattle guard so constructed as to permit automobiles to cross. This cattle guard, being seven or eight feet in width, was the only passageway open to automobiles at that time without opening the gate across the south half of the road. The post and gate were painted white, and the defendant had passed over this cattle guard on a previous occasion when he traveled east. As he approached the cattle guard on his right side of the road, defendant was traveling at a speed of 30 miles per hour. He observed the cattle guard when about 200 feet therefrom and at the same time saw the lights of approaching cars on the other side of the gate, one of these cars being somewhat nearer than the others. When he was about 6 or 8 feet from the cattle guard, he saw the first of the approaching cars make rather a straight turn into the north half of the road, and directly into his path. As soon as he observed this, he put on his brakes, but the two machines collided head-on. When the two cars came to rest, the rear wheels of defendant's Willys Knight were from 2 to 4 feet west of the cattle guard, and the other car, a Chevrolet, stood about 5 or 6 feet away, both cars being badly damaged. Both of the plaintiffs were asleep in the rear seat of defendant's car at the time of the collision. The only evidence as to how the accident occurred was the testimony of the defendant, who was examined under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure, his testimony being then adopted as their own evidence, by the plaintiffs. At the conclusion of plaintiffs' case, the court granted a motion for a nonsuit, and, from the ensuing judgment, this appeal is taken.

[1] Appellants' first point is that the motion for a nonsuit was insufficient, in that it failed to sufficiently state the grounds therefor. Appellants quote the motion as follows: "At this time, the defendant again moves for a nonsuit on the ground that the evidence of the plaintiffs being all in, there is not a sufficient case made for a jury," and cites Henley v. Bursell et al., 61 Cal. App. 511, 215 P. 114; Belcher v. Murphy, 81 Cal. 39, 22 P. 264, and other cases. The record shows that, in the motion as made, immediately after the language above quoted, counsel continued as follows: "The evidence clearly shows that the defendant was without negligence in this case. In support of this, Your Honor," etc. Counsel then proceeded to argue the motion. We think the one ground upon which the motion was made and granted was thus sufficiently stated to apprise the other party of the nature of the ground relied upon, in accordance with the reasoning of the cases cited.

[2-6] The next question raised is that the evidence presented a question of fact, as to the negligence of the respondent, which should have been left to the jury. The rule is that, where a driver of an automobile is sued by his guest for injuries sustained by the guest through the negligent operation of the automobile, the burden is upon the plaintiff to show negligence upon the part of the defendant. Morris v. Morris, 84 Cal. App. 599, 258 P. 616. There are, of course, cases where, under the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, the negligence of the defendant may be inferred from the circumstances. We think this is not such a case, that no inference of negligence on the part of the respondent here arises from the circumstances shown by the evidence, and that it was incumbent upon the appellants to affirmatively prove such negligence. Appellants argue that negligence is shown by the fact that the only passageway open at the time of the accident was the one over the cattle guard, on the north side of the road; that the respondent continued at a speed of approximately 30 miles an hour after he saw the cattle guard and when he saw the lights of other cars approaching; and that he did not slow down until within 6 or 8 feet of the cattle guard, at which time he put on his brakes. In this connection, appellants argue that the respondent did not have the right of way, and that each driver was bound "to stop and let the other pass if necessary." This calls to mind a law which was once proposed in a Legislature in another state, to the effect that, when two trains approached an intersection, both should stop and neither should proceed until the other had passed. Appellants argue that the ordinary rules of law as to the right of way did not here apply, but that the situation came under the rules of law applying to the right of way on single-trail roadways. While our attention is not called to any California case upon that point, appellants cite 42 Corpus Juris, page 943, §§ 661-663, as showing the rules of law relied upon. We think the situation, however, was not that of a single-trail roadway, but rather that of an ordinary highway with an obstruction existing thereon. It was established at the trial that the law of New Mexico at that time required a driver of an automobile to travel upon his right-hand side of a highway, unless his left-hand side thereof was clear and unobstructed for a distance of at least 50 yards ahead. We think the respondent, under the circumstances shown by this record, was entitled to assume that the driver of the approaching car would obey this law. In Gornstein v. Priver, 64 Cal. App. 249, 221 P. 396, 401, the court said: "The general rule is that one to whom a duty of care is owing by another has the right to assume that the person who owes such duty will perform it; and, in the absence of reasonable ground to think otherwise, it is not negligence on the part of the one to whom the duty is owing to assume that he will not be exposed to a danger which can come to him only through a violation of that duty by the person owing it."

In 19 Cal. Jur. at page 596, the rule is thus stated: "One who is himself not negligent is entitled to rely upon the presumption that others will exercise due care, so that it is not negligence to fail to anticipate danger which can come only from a violation of law or duty upon the part of another."

In Robinson v. Clemons, 46 Cal. App. 661, 190 P. 203, 204, the following language is used: "Any one, the most careful, about to cross a highway and observing another vehicle approaching at a distance of from 100 to 150 feet, would not deem it necessary to stop or to do any particular thing to avoid a collision. He would properly assume and have a right to assume that the other car was not violating all rules of prudence by excessive speed; that he had plenty of time to cross and act accordingly. This would be the attitude of any reasonable man under the circumstances, and therefore the plaintiff was not guilty of a want of ordinary care in pursuing his journey."

is ordinarily not excessive or reckless. The respondent, so proceeding, could not be charged with negligence until something happened to warn him that danger existed. As he proceeded on his right-hand side of the road, the lights of approaching cars on his left-hand side of the road would not be such warning. Had these lights been over on his side of the road they might have constituted a warning, even though he felt they had no right to be there. But as they continued upon their own side of the road, he had a right to assume that they would not at the last minute suddenly turn into his pathway. The only direct evidence shown by the record is that of the respondent, who testified that, when he was within 6 or 8 feet of the cattle guard, the other car made rather a straight turn directly at him. The only circumstantial evidence upon this point is that after the accident there were to be seen skid marks showing that the Chevrolet car had skidded for 20 or 30 feet. This, with the position of the cars after the accident, indicates that the Chevrolet car was coming at some considerable speed, and that, when the driver saw the gate was closed in front of him, he put on his brakes and turned to his left side of the road. We find nothing in the record to show that the defendant was not proceeding in a proper manner up to the point where he saw that the approaching car, in disregard of the law and all common prudence, was turning into his pathway, and it fully appears that when this occurred he put on his brakes and did all he could to stop. Under such circumstances, we think the appellants have failed to meet the burden of proof which is upon them.

[8] A nonsuit may properly be granted where the evidence, viewing it in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, will not support a verdict in his favor. The rule is stated in 9 Cal. Jur., at page 556, as follows: "Although the early practice in England and in this country was otherwise, it is now settled that a mere scintilla of evidence will not justify a judge in leaving a case to the jury. Judges are no longer required to submit a case to a jury merely because some evidence has been introduced by the party having the burden of proof, unless the evidence be of such a character as that it would warrant the jury to proceed in finding a verdict in favor of the party introducing such evidence. Therefore, to avoid a nonsuit, the evidence of the plaintiff must be sufficient to raise more than a mere surmise or conjecture that the fact is as alleged. It must be such that a rational, well-constructed mind can reasonably draw from it the conclusion that the fact exists. The court may grant the motion when, viewing the evidence of the plaintiff in its most favorable aspect for him, it is of the opinion that the evidence will not support a verdict in his favor, or where the evidence does not establish a prima facie case."

In our opinion, the evidence shown by this record would not have been sufficient to sustain a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, and the motion for a nonsuit was therefore properly granted.

The judgment is affirmed.

[1-4] The plaintiff, as the assignee of David H. Glickman, commenced an action to recover $730 alleged to be due and owing for services rendered the defendants at their request for an agreed sum. The defendant Biltz was not served. The defendant corporation appeared and answered. A trial was had before the trial court sitting without a jury. The trial court made findings in favor of the plaintiff, and, from a judgment entered thereon, the corporation has appealed and has brought up a typewritten transcript. It was the theory of the plaintiff that he was employed by Norman Biltz, and that the latter was the authorized agent of the defendant corporation, having authority to employ the plaintiff and fix his compensation. On the other hand, it was the theory of the defendant that Biltz was employed by the corporation as a broker, and that his compensation was fixed on a commission basis, and that Biltz had no authority to incur any obligations whatever against the defendant corporation. The defendant contends that there is not one scintilla of evidence to show that Biltz had any authority to bind the corporation nor that he attempted to do so. We think the contention must be sustained. An examination of the record shows that there was no evidence introduced showing, or tending to show, that Biltz attempted to employ the plaintiff on the account of the defendant corporation. No minute entry, resolution, or by-law was introduced. If the corporation has a manager, the record does not disclose the fact, nor who that manager may be. The plaintiff testified that he received a telephone message from Warren Murphy, asking him to call and have a talk with Norman H. Biltz. Neither Murphy nor Biltz was called as a witness or in any manner gave any evidence on the trial. As to what authority either of those men possessed was not testified to by any witness. The plaintiff claims that Norman H. Biltz had ostensible authority to employ the plaintiff. That claim is not supported by any evidence in the record, because the record does not disclose that at any other time or place either Murphy or Biltz ever employed the plaintiff in the same or any other capacity for themselves or for any one else. In this same connection the plaintiff contends that the defendant is estopped, but no estoppel was pleaded by the plaintiff, the trial court made no finding thereon, and this court may not assume to do so. Blood v. La Serena, 113 Cal. 221, 41 P. 1017, 45 P. 252. Furthermore, the elements of an estoppel were not present. 1 Cal. Jur. 732, § 34. The plaintiff's talks with Biltz took place at the offices, 693 Sutter street. At least some of the plaintiff's work was done at the same office. That office immediately adjoins a room occupied by the defendant corporation. The record discloses the fact that the president and secretary of the defendant corporation have their offices in the latter room. Presumably the books of the corporation are in that room, but at no time did the plaintiff examine the books of the corporation or make any inquiry of the president or secretary as to what authority Biltz had to hire employees for the defendant corporation.

If we are correct as to what has been said above, and we have no doubt but that we are, it then becomes unnecessary to discuss any other point made in the briefs.

It follows that the judgment should be reversed and it is so ordered.

109 Cal. App. 467

WILSON v. ANDERSON et al.
Civ. 4204.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.
Nov. 10, 1930.

1. Quieting title ⇨50.

In action to quiet title, court may provide for establishing and enforcing of such trusts in relation to property involved as equities require (Code Civ. Proc. § 738).

2. Quieting title ⇨50.

In action to quiet title, judgment that conveyance be made by defendant upon execution of note and trust deed to him for amount due constituting lien on premises was improper.

3. Mortgages ⇨608½.

Court could not compel one holding deed in legal effect a mortgage to execute conveyance back except upon payment of money due.

4. Mortgages ⇨32(1).

Deed taken as security for payment of debt is "mortgage" (Code Civ. Proc. § 726).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Mortgage," see Words and Phrases.]

5. Mortgages ⇨380.

Where deed is in legal effect a mortgage, it must be foreclosed as provided in statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 726).

6. Quieting title ⇨50.

Plaintiff holding deed in legal effect a mortgage held not entitled to judgment quieting title which would exclude defendants from right of redemption.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Stanley Murray, Judge.

Action by Anton W. Wilson against Helen M. Anderson, individually and as administratrix of the estate of E. M. Anderson, deceased, and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Reversed and remanded, with directions.

Owen C. Emery, of Glendale, for appellants.

C. M. Johnson and H. J. Brady, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

Mr. Justice PLUMMER delivered the opinion of the court.

The plaintiff had judgment against the above-named defendants and appellants, quieting title to the west one-quarter of lot 732, tract 3126, recorded in book 33, page 51, of Maps, records of Los Angeles county, subject to a mortgage of record thereon for $2,000. From this judgment the above-named defendants appeal.

The complaint in this action is in the ordinary form of an action to quiet title. The defendants, by way of answer, denied the allegations in the plaintiff's complaint as to his ownership of the real estate involved herein, and alleged that the right, title, and interest of the defendants were superior to the alleged right or title or interest of the plaintiff in and to the lands described. The answers then, by way of further defense and cross-complaint, set forth that on or about the 27th day of April, 1925, a certain judgment was entered in an action begun by Helen M. Anderson as administratrix of the estate of E. M. Anderson, deceased, action numbered 157108, in the county of Los Angeles, wherein and whereby it was decreed that Helen M. Anderson, as executrix of the estate of E. M. Anderson, deceased, was the owner in fee of the real property described in plaintiff's complaint in this action; that it was further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that Anton W. Wilson, the defendant in action No. 157108 and the plaintiff herein, should forthwith execute and deliver to Helen M. Anderson, as executrix of the estate of E. M. Anderson, deceased, a deed of grant in and to said property, subject to a mortgage of $2,000, and that at the same time, and by the same judgment, the court decreed that the said Helen M. Anderson, as executrix of the estate of E. M. Anderson, deceased, should deliver to Anton W. Wilson, the plaintiff in this action, and the defendant in action No. 157108, a promissory note for the sum of $5,360.08, due on or before April 1, 1926, with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, and, as security for the payment of said promissory note, to simultaneously execute and deliver to said Anton W. Wilson a deed of trust in the usual form of the Title Guarantee & Trust Company, as a second incumbrance on said property. It is further set forth in the answers filed by the defendants that that portion of the judgment just referred to decreeing that Helen M. Anderson, as executrix of the estate of E. M. Anderson, deceased, should execute and deliver to Anton W. Wilson a promissory note and deed of trust covering the property described herein, to secure the payment of the sum mentioned, was, at the time of the rendition and entering of said judgment, contrary to law and the statutes of this state, and void and unenforceable. The answers further set forth that the said sum of $5,360.08, found to be owing to the said Anton W. Wilson, should have been made payable out of the estate of said E. M. Anderson, deceased, in due course of administration. The defendants further prayed that their title to the property involved be quieted as against all claims of the plaintiff, and for general relief. The plaintiff's answer to the defendants' cross-complaint contains denials of the allegations in the defendants' answers, and sets forth that the deed mentioned in the cross-complaint filed by the defendants was to be executed and delivered simultaneously and conditionally upon said Helen M. Anderson, as executrix of the estate of E. M. Anderson, deceased, executing and delivering a note and trust deed in the amount and for the purposes hereinbefore mentioned. The cross-complaint further alleges that more than one year has elapsed and no payment has been made of the amount found due the plaintiff in this action, and prays that the title or claim of Helen M. Anderson, as executrix of the estate of E. M. Anderson, deceased, be declared forfeited by reason of default in making payment of the amount found due the plaintiff in this action, and also contained a prayer for general relief.

The record in this action shows only a stipulation entered into between the parties and the findings and judgment entered in action No. 157108. The stipulation is as follows: "It is stipulated that Anton W. Wilson has refused to execute and deliver to Helen M. Anderson, as executrix of the estate of E. M. Anderson, deceased, a deed of grant to the west one-quarter of lot 732, tract 3126, Los Angeles county, as per map recorded in book 33, page 51 of maps, as directed in the action entitled 'Helen M. Anderson, Executrix of the Estate of E. M. Anderson, Deceased, vs. Anton W. Wilson, file No. 157108', for the reason that Helen M. Anderson, the said executrix, has refused to execute and deliver to Anton W. Wilson a note secured by deed of trust on the above-mentioned property in the sum of $5,360.08, as directed in said action. Further stipulated that none of the sum of $5,360.08 has been paid. Further stipulated that the file in said action number 157108 shows that the attorneys for both plaintiff and defendant in said action O. K.'d the findings of fact and judgment in said action. It is further stipulated that the file in said action number 157108 be admitted in evidence."

Just what the judgment roll in action No. 157108 discloses does not appear from the record presented upon this appeal, as only the findings and judgment in said action are included within the records before us. From the findings presented to the court, made and entered in said action, and introduced in evidence in this action, we summarize the following:

On or about the 11th day of July, 1927, Helen M. Anderson and Edward M. Anderson, now deceased, executed and delivered to Anton W. Wilson a trust deed covering certain real property situate in Glendale, Los Angeles county, to secure the payment of the sum of $7,497.31. At the same time the title to certain personal property, consisting of the stock, wares, and merchandise of a certain business known as the Pioneer Electric Company, was vested in the said Anton W. Wilson, as further security for the payment of the above-mentioned sum. Thereafter the title to said personal property by the said Andersons and said Wilson was transferred to one Edna W. Hamilton for certain real property situate in Imperial county, and the title to said real property, with the consent of said Andersons, taken in the name of Anton W. Wilson, with the intent and purpose that he should hold the same as security for the payment of the sum of money hereinbefore mentioned, and, likewise, as security for all expenses and disbursements that should be incurred in the management, control and disposition of said lands in Imperial county. Finding No. V of the court in said action No. 157108, introduced as testimony in this action, reads as follows: "That said defendant Anton W. Wilson received title to the said Imperial land as agent for the said firm of Anderson and Anderson and for the said Edward M. Anderson, since deceased, but with an interest therein and a lien thereon to repay and reimburse himself for all moneys advanced, and for any and all expenses and taxes properly incurred by him in the management, control and transfer of said Imperial land, or of any property or properties received in exchange or substituted therefor; and said Anton W. Wilson was authorized to make exchanges or substitute other properties for said Imperial land as he might deem advisable, and hold the same as additional security in the same way he held said Imperial land, and had formerly held the said Pioneer Electric Company business; and the court further finds that said Anton W. Wilson has managed and controlled the said properties received or substituted by him, with that due and proper care required of an agent, and has made exchanges therefor and substituted other properties in place of said Imperial land, with the due and proper care required of an agent. That the said defendant Anton W. Wilson informed the plaintiff and Clarence M. Anderson, from time to time, as to the details of the transactions, transfers and other matters in connection with the exchange of the Imperial land and all other properties received therefor, and all of said transactions, transfers and disposals of said properties were either duly authorized by said plaintiff or approved and ratified by her, as stated in the last paragraph." The finding then set forth transactions relating to the real estate, and the coming into the possession and control of said Anton W. Wilson, and in his name, the property involved in this action. The conclusion of the court, after making these findings, and the finding that the estate of E. M. Anderson, deceased, was indebted to Anton W. Wilson in the sum of $5,360.08, was to the effect that the title to said property vested in said estate, and a deed of conveyance should be made by the said Anton W. Wilson to Helen M. Anderson, as the executrix thereof, upon the execution and delivery by said executrix of a promissory note conditioned for the payment to said Anton W. Wilson of the sum of $5,360.08, on or before the 1st day of April, 1926, and secured by a trust deed to be executed by the said executrix. Judgment was entered accordingly. As shown by the stipulation hereinbefore set forth, the conditional part of the judgment has never been complied with. The deed conveying the title to the premises has not been executed and delivered by Anton W. Wilson to Helen M. Anderson, as executrix of the estate of E. M. Anderson, deceased, for the reason that Helen M. Anderson, as the executrix of the said estate, has declined to execute and deliver the note and trust deed provided for in the judgment. The record does show that Anton W. Wilson did tender a deed as provided for in the judgment, but compliance by Helen M. Anderson, as executrix of the estate of E. M. Anderson, deceased, with the conditions on her part to be performed, was declined and refused, and the deed, therefore, was never delivered. Thereafter, and after the expiration of a year from the date of the entry of said judgment, this action was begun, based upon the theory that Helen M. Anderson, as executrix of the estate of E. M. Anderson, deceased, was in default, and that the plaintiff, Anton W. Wilson, was entitled to a judgment quieting his title to the premises involved, which judgment was entered and is now before us upon appeal.

[1] It is contended by the appellants that the only judgment which the court was authorized to enter in action No. 157108, in relation to the sum of money in said action found due Anton W. Wilson, would have been one directing payment of said sum out of the funds of the estate of E. M. Anderson, deceased, in due course of administration, as provided for in section 1504, Code of Civil Procedure, and a number of cases are cited where judgments have been entered upon accounts and claims due from and owing by estates. This contention, however, overlooks the essential fact that the property in this action is charged with a lien in favor of Anton W. Wilson. Title was taken in his name with the understanding, as found by the court, that it should be so taken and held by Anton W. Wilson in order to secure repayment to him of the sums of money heretofore referred to. This placed the estate in the position of not being entitled to have its title to the premises quieted, or, rather, as not being entitled to a conveyance of the premises until, and upon condition of making payment to Anton W. Wilson, the holder of the title, of the amount of money owing to him, as found by the court, and constituting a charge upon the premises, and this would be true even though the sum due Anton W. Wilson was barred by the statute of limitations. Only one case needs to be cited in support of what we have stated, to wit, Boyce v. Fisk, 110 Cal. 107, 42 P. 473. In that case, where it appears that the debt was barred, the court nevertheless held that judgment quieting title could only be entered upon payment of the debt, and that the form of the judgment should have provided for quieting the title upon payment of the debt within a specified time, and in the event of failure so to pay, the action should be dismissed, and title would remain vested in the one to whom the debt was owing, and in whose name the title stood, just as though no action had been prosecuted.

What we have said is further supported by the case of De Leonis v. Hammel, 1 Cal. App. 390, 82 P. 349, 351, where, in an action to quiet title, the court held as follows: "But where, as here, the facts upon which plaintiff's claim is based are alleged, there is authority to grant any proper relief within the limitations of section 580 of the Code of Civil Procedure. And appropriate remedies, such as cancellation, reconveyance, or decrees quieting title, or establishing or enforcing trusts, or determining the priorities of opposing equities, may be had, as between proper parties, under our system, whenever they are required upon equitable considerations and are justified by the pleadings and proof in the case. Campbell v. Freeman, 99 Cal. 546, 34 P. 113; Tuffree v. Polhemus, 108 Cal. 670, 41 P. 806; Collins v. O'Lavery, 136 Cal. 31, 68 P. 327; Zellerbach v. Allenberg, 99 Cal. 57, 33 P. 786; Rollins v. Forbes, 10 Cal. 299; Angus v. Craven, 132 Cal. 691, 64 P. 1091." The authorities cited abundantly show that under the provisions of section 738, Code of Civil Procedure, the court, in an action involving adverse claims to real property prosecuted upon a complaint seeking to quiet title of the plaintiff, may enter such judgment as the equities of the case require, and provide for the establishing and enforcing of such trusts in relation to the property involved as the equities of the case justify or demand.

The facts set forth in the record in this case show that the trial court, in action No. 157108, was authorized to and should have entered a judgment to the effect that the plaintiff's title to the premises involved be quieted; that a conveyance be made by Anton W. Wilson to the plaintiff in said action upon, and only upon, payment to him of the amount due from the estate of E. M. Anderson, deceased, and which constituted a charge and a lien upon the premises involved, and for the security, the payment of which Anton W. Wilson then and there held the legal title.

[2, 3] We come now to the form of the action before us upon this appeal and the rights therein to which the respective parties may be entitled. The amount of the lien held by Anton W. Wilson against the real property described in the complaint has already been litigated and adjudged by the trial court in action No. 157108. It is therein determined that Anton W. Wilson is entitled to payment of a certain sum; that he has a lien against the described real property to secure the payment thereof; the estate is found to be the real owner of the property, and should have the title thereto transferred to the executrix of the estate of E. M. Anderson, deceased, upon payment of the sum so found due. The form for carrying the judgment into effect is such as to be unenforceable. The court could not compel the executrix of the estate of E. M. Anderson, deceased, to execute the promissory note or the trust deed therein provided for. Nor could it compel Anton W. Wilson to execute a conveyance unless and only upon payment to him of the moneys to secure the payment of which the premises stood charged. Therefore we come now to the question of remedies.

[4-6] The plaintiff in this action holds a deed which is, in legal effect, only a mortgage. We do not need to cite authorities, which are numerous, to the effect that, if a grant, bargain, and sale deed is taken as security for the payment of a debt, the instrument, though couched in the form of an absolute conveyance, is, in truth and in fact, nothing more than a mortgage, and for the foreclosure of which only one action can be prosecuted, as provided for by section 726 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Thus the right of the plaintiff in this action was not for a judgment quieting title, which would exclude the appellants from any right of redemption or from the opportunity of making payment of the sums due the plaintiff, and therefore the judgment as entered herein cannot stand. However, the answers and cross-complaints of the appellants in this action supply all the necessary facts, together with the evidence introduced by stipulation of the parties, to justify the trial court in directing a reformation or amendment of the plaintiff's complaint, if deemed necessary, and then proceeding as though the action had originally been commenced to foreclose the lien of the plaintiff upon the premises involved, and, in effect, to enforce the judgment in action No. 157108. In so doing, the action of the trial court would have been, and should have been, in line with the opinion in the case of Randall v. Duff, 101 Cal. 82, 35 P. 440, 441, an action prosecuted to quiet title, and where, in the original action, all of the parties had not appeared. The court said: "Among the consequences of the omission to make the successors of William R. Duff parties to the foreclosure of the Ritchie and Fiebig mortgages was the necessity of prosecuting another action in some form to bar or determine their right of redemption; and the present action by the purchaser under the foreclosure proceedings, though in form an action to quiet title, is in effect nothing more nor less than a suit to foreclose the mortgages as against the plaintiffs in Duff v. Duff, [101 Cal. 1, 35 P. 437] just as their cross complaint is in effect a suit to redeem. In the form which the litigation assumed through the mistake or choice of the plaintiff and his predecessors he was subjected to the necessity of relitigating in this action the validity and amount of the mortgage liens, but the mortgagees could not by their disregard of the regular procedure for the enforcement of their rights compel the defendants to relitigate with them or their successor, in what is practically another suit to foreclose their mortgages, the rights finally determined in the action of Duff v. Duff." In the case at bar, the rights of the parties, as we have stated, are fully determined in action No. 157108, and only the question of procedure and form of action to enforce those rights is involved.

Without further citation of authority, it is evident that the judgment as entered in this action, as we have said, must be reversed and the cause remanded to the trial court with directions to permit the amendment of the complaint herein, if the plaintiff is so advised, so as to correspond with and set forth all the facts which appear in the answers and cross-complaints filed by the appellants, the plaintiff's answer thereto, and the evidence introduced in this cause, showing all that is essential to support an action to foreclose a mortgage, and then proceed to determine whatever additional sums, by way of interest and other expenses, if any, chargeable as a lien against the premises described, and to direct foreclosure and sale in accordance with the provisions of the Code regulating the foreclosure and sale of mortgaged real estate. And it is so ordered.

Homestead §57(3).

Evidence that lot contiguous to lot with dwelling claimed as homestead was used for chicken yard and garden justified holding that it was part of homestead.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; James W. Bartlett, Judge.

Action by Barbara Davis against C. W. Lockwood and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Caesar A. Roberts, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Charles P. Johnson, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HOUSER, J.

The purpose of the action in the lower court was to set aside and to subject to the lien of a judgment theretofore rendered in another action brought by plaintiff against defendants a homestead which, preceding the date of the entry of the said judgment, had been declared by one of the defendants on two town lots, each of which was contiguous to the other and upon one of which lots both of the defendants resided. The size of each of the lots was approximately 42 by 133 feet. The action was predicated upon the asserted ground that the lot other than the one upon which the dwelling of defendants was located could not properly be regarded as a part of the legal homestead of defendants, for the reason that it was not used or occupied by them. Judgment was rendered in favor of defendants, and plaintiff appeals therefrom.

On the trial of the action, among other things, the evidence included testimony given by one of the defendants to the effect that for "at least ten years" next preceding the date when the homestead was placed on the two lots, the so-called vacant lot in question had been used by defendants "for a chicken yard and garden," and that it had "fruit trees on it," which consisted of an orange, a lemon, a walnut and a fig tree. Another witness testified that for "seven years that I know of * * * Mrs. Lockwood has a chicken yard on the back end of it, and every summer, every year, she has a garden there; and in the summer when she is not working she cleans that yard up, cut down all the weeds, and cleans it all up. And she has some fruit trees on it, and the trail from her house on that side is pretty well over in that lot."

The cases of Englebrecht v. Shade, 47 Cal. 627; Arendt v. Mace, 76 Cal. 315, 18 P. 376, 9 Am. St. Rep. 207; In re Allen, 2 Cal. Unrep. Cas. 835, 16 P. 319; and Skinner v. Hall, 69 Cal. 195, 10 P. 406, are authorities which in principle clearly sustain the ruling of the trial court as to the sufficiency of the evidence herein upon which to rest the judgment.

No other point being seriously presented by appellant, it is ordered that the judgment be, and it is, affirmed.

BALCONADES BALLROOM, Inc., v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO.

Civ. 7528.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 2, California.

Nov. 18, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 18, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 12, 1931.

1. Corporations §665(3).

Superior court had jurisdiction of action by foreign corporation, qualified to do business within state, upon chose in action assigned to corporation in another state before it qualified to do business within state.

It was claimed that the assignment was void because made before time when corporation qualified to do business within state. The assignment, however, made in another state, was not void, and, if it became unenforceable within state, that is question which superior court would have jurisdiction to determine.

2. Corporations ⇨661(1).

Foreign corporation qualified to do business within state obtained right to sue.

3. Corporations ⇨639.

Where assignment to foreign corporation was made in another state, California law respecting transactions by corporation within state was inapplicable.

Mandamus proceeding by the Balconades Ballroom, Inc., against the Superior Court in and for the City and County of San Francisco, E. P. Shortall, Judge, to compel respondent to proceed with the trial of a certain action.

Writ granted.

Edward A. Cunha and Harry I. Stafford, both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Taaffe & Taaffe, of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, P. J.

This is an original proceeding in mandamus to require the respondent court to proceed with the trial on its merits of an action instituted in that court by petitioner. The respondent has appeared by demurrer and answer, but has submitted the latter without proof; hence we may confine our discussion to the points of law involved.

Petitioner is a Nevada corporation, incorporated in that state on May 14, 1928. On that date certain individuals residing in California delivered to petitioner at Lovelock, Nev., a written assignment of personal property, including a chose in action. On October 8, 1928, the petitioner duly qualified under the laws of this state to do corporate business in California. On May 24, 1929, it commenced an action in the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco to recover upon the chose in action above mentioned. The cause was set for trial before a jury, and, after the plaintiff had presented a portion of its evidence, the defendants moved to dismiss the action upon the grounds that the court was without jurisdiction and that the plaintiff did not have legal capacity to sue. The motion was granted on the first ground only, and, lest it be argued that the order is good if supported by either ground, it is sufficient to say that the petitioner concededly qualified to do business in this state long prior to the commencement of the action, and, as assignee of the claim, manifestly had legal capacity to sue on it.

[1] On the question of jurisdiction, the defendants raised a wholly false issue. It was their claim that the assignment was void because made prior to the time when the corporation qualified to do business in the state.

But the assignment was executed and delivered in another state—delivered to a corporation which admittedly was qualified to receive it. Hence the assignment was not void when made and delivered to the Nevada corporation. If it became unenforceable in this state at some future date because held by a corporation which may have thereafter run afoul of some of the laws of this state, that is precisely the question which the superior court would and should have jurisdiction to determine.

Thus, a court may find that a claim is barred by the statute of limitations, and, if that defense is raised, judgment must go for defendant; it may find that a sale of corporation property was made in violation of the Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 673), or that an attempted sale of realty was in violation of law and hence unenforceable, but no one would contend that the court did not have jurisdiction to hear and determine those issues.

[2] In the case before the respondent court, the petitioner, having admittedly qualified to do business in this state, thereby obtained the right and capacity to sue. If the assignment upon which it sued was invalid for any reason, or if the assigned claim was invalid or unenforceable for any reason, the court and jury manifestly had jurisdiction to hear and determine those issues. The cause being one in which a trial by jury is a matter of right, the plaintiff was entitled to have those issues submitted to the jury.

This is not a case like Cahill v. Superior Court, 145 Cal. 42, 78 P. 467, and others cited by respondent where the question of jurisdiction is a question of fact to be determined by the trial court upon evidence taken for that purpose. Manifestly in such a case an appellate court should not by mandamus override the findings of the trial court based upon the evidence which it has heard. But this is a case like Temple v. Superior Court, 70 Cal. 211, 213, 11 P. 699, where the Supreme Court say: “* * * The court cannot, by holding without reason that it has no jurisdiction of the proceeding, divest itself of jurisdiction. * * *” This and many other cases are cited in Hennessy v. Superior Court, 194 Cal. 368, 374, 228 P. 862, where a portion of the Cahill opinion is cited to the effect that, when the trial court has decided as a matter of law upon its construction of the Constitution and statute that it is without jurisdiction, mandamus to the Supreme Court is the proper remedy.

[3] The assignment having been delivered in the state of Nevada, the “transaction” took place in that state, and the laws of this state relating to the transaction of business by corporations in this state have no bearing upon that transaction. When thereafter the corporation came into this state and qualified to transact business under the corporate laws of this state, it brought with it the assignment of this chose in action, which was an asset—a property right subject to the laws of property in this state. That the corporation had the legal capacity to sue in an effort to enforce this property right in a trial before a jury, and that the superior court had jurisdiction to hear and determine the cause, is manifest.

Let a peremptory writ issue as prayed.

6. Wills ⇨423.

Decree admitting will to probate is, as to all persons interested in will, conclusive for purposes of administration as decree in personam.

7. Judgment ⇨812(3).

Judgments in rem are binding on person not party to, or participant in, proceeding only so far as status, title, or other res is adjudicated.

8. Taxation ⇨856.

Tax imposed by inheritance tax law is on right to succeed to property of estate rather than on property itself.

9. States ⇨191(1).

State, without its consent, express or implied, cannot be sued.

10. Wills ⇨423.

Right of state to collect inheritance tax cannot be prejudiced by findings of court in proceeding for probate of will.

11. Wills ⇨423.

Executor, as respected liability of estate for inheritance tax, was not estopped by his testimony relating to residence of deceased on hearing of petition for probate.

12. Judgment ⇨666.

Estoppel of judgment is operative only when it is mutual.

13. Estoppel ⇨58.

Essential element of "estoppel by conduct" is that party asserting it was injured or misled by conduct of opponent.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of David Bloom, deceased. On objections by Ray L. Riley, as State Controller, and by Jonas Bloom, executor of the estate of David Bloom, to a report filed by the inheritance tax appraiser, fixing the amount of estate tax. From an order that no inheritance tax was due, Ray L. Riley, as Controller, appeals.

Affirmed.

Herbert Kaufman and W. Urie Walsh, both of San Francisco (W. H. H. Gentry and A. W. Brouillet, both of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Brobeck, Phleger & Harrison, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

This is an appeal by the state controller from an order entered in the above matter determining that no inheritance tax was due the state of California, and directing a refund of the inheritance tax previously paid.

*Hearing granted 2 P.2d 763.

David Bloom died testate in the city and county of San Francisco on September 16, 1925. On September 25, 1925, Jonas Bloom, the executor and respondent herein, filed his petition for an order admitting the will to probate, and on October 8, 1925, the same was duly admitted to probate. The petition alleged, and the court found, that the decedent at the time of his death was a resident of said city and county. In due course of administration of the estate, the inheritance tax appraiser appointed by the court filed his report fixing $64,268.81 as the amount of the tax, of which $57,145.24 was charged against the distributive share of respondent, and finding that the decedent died a resident of the city and county of San Francisco. On September 7, 1927, the state controller filed objections to the report, alleging that certain corporate stock owned by decedent had been undervalued by the appraiser and that a copartnership interest of decedent had not been included in the report. On December 13, 1928, objections to the report were filed by respondent, following which amended and supplementary objections thereto were filed on his behalf individually and as executor. These objections alleged that the report was incorrect in finding that the decedent died a resident of the above city and county, and that he was a resident of San Salvador at the time of his death; that consequently the stocks and bonds foreign to the state of California and which were owned by decedent were not subject to an inheritance tax in this state. The parties stipulated as to the value of the property in question, and also that the decedent had an interest in certain partnership accounts which were not mentioned in the report. After a hearing, the court found upon the evidence that decedent died a resident of San Salvador, and the order appealed from was entered accordingly. The evidence sufficiently supports the finding that decedent was a resident of San Salvador, but, as stated, the order admitting the will to probate contained a finding that the decedent died a resident of the city and county of San Francisco, and the controller contends that respondent is conclusively bound thereby. The parties also stipulated that the only matter to be determined on appeal is the legal effect of the order in the above respect, but appellant makes the further contention that respondent by reason of his testimony in support of the petition for the probate of the will is also estopped to assert that decedent was not a resident of the said city and county.

[1-5] A proceeding for the probate of a will is one instituted for the purpose of establishing the status of a written instrument. State of California v. McGlynn, 20 Cal. 233, 81 Am. Dec. 118; Estate of Parsons, 196 Cal. 294, 237 P. 744. While the order admitting the same to probate is conclusive in subsequent proceedings as to the ultimate fact of the will, it is not save as to parties litigant (Clapp v.

Vatcher, 9 Cal. App. 462, 99 P. 549), or for the purpose of the proceeding itself (Estate of Relph, 185 Cal. 605, 198 P. 639), conclusive as to the facts upon which the question of will or no will depends (Gridley v. Boggs, 62 Cal. 190), or, quoting from Freeman on Judgments (5th Ed.), § 1524: "When the same issues arise with respect to a different subject matter." As was said in Brigham v. Fayerweather, 140 Mass. 411, 5 N. E. 265, with regard to such decrees, "strangers though bound to admit the title or status which the judgment establishes are not bound by the findings of fact." Thus it has been held that an order admitting a will to probate is not conclusive as a decree in rem as to the mental condition of the testator or other facts upon which the validity of the instrument depends (Gridley v. Boggs, supra), or as to matters incidental, though necessarily adjudicated, such as to relationship of the parties to decedent (Sorensen v. Sorensen, 68 Neb. 483, 94 N. W. 540, 98 N. W. 837, 100 N. W. 930, 103 N. W. 455), or the fact of the death as against strangers in a collateral proceeding (Mutual Benefit Life Ins. Co. v. Tisdale, 91 U. S. 238, 23 L. Ed. 314; Carroll v. Carroll, 60 N. Y. 121, 19 Am. Rep. 144; In re Rowe, 197 App. Div. 449, 189 N. Y. S. 395, affirmed 232 N. Y. 554, 134 N. E. 569; Day v. Floyd, 130 Mass. 488; Steele's Unknown Heirs v. Belding [Tex. Civ. App.] 148 S. W. 592). It has also been decided in numerous cases that an adjudication upon the question of residence of the testator in a proceeding for the probate of the will is not conclusive upon strangers in a matter not involving the validity of the order granting letters testamentary. Dallinger v. Richardson, 176 Mass. 77, 57 N. E. 224; Colvin v. Jones, 194 Mich. 670, 161 N. W. 847; Matter of Horton, 217 N. Y. 363, 111 N. E. 1066, Ann. Cas. 1918A, 611; Smith v. Smith's Executor, 122 Va. 341, 94 S. E. 777; Thormann v. Frame, 176 U. S. 350, 20 S. Ct. 446, 44 L. Ed. 500; Overby v. Gordon, 177 U. S. 214, 20 S. Ct. 603, 44 L. Ed. 741; Dunsmuir v. Scott (C. C. A.) 217 F. 200. In Tilt v. Kelsey, 207 U. S. 43, 28 S. Ct. 1, 4, 52 L. Ed. 95, the court, in passing upon this question, said: "Upon principle and authority, that adjudication, though essential to the assumption of jurisdiction to grant letters testamentary, was neither conclusive on the question of domicil, nor even evidence of it in a collateral proceeding."

[6] Appellant, in support of his contention, has cited certain California cases. In Estate of Dole, 147 Cal. 194, 81 P. 534, and Estate of Davis, 151 Cal. 327, 86 P. 183, 90 P. 711, 121 Am. St. Rep. 105, orders admitting wills to probate were attacked on the ground that the testator was a nonresident of the county, and in Estate of Parsons, supra, a petition for partial distribution was opposed upon the ground that a portion of the will, the whole of which had been admitted to probate, had been revoked by the testator. Also in Estate of

Relp, supra, the proceeding was in effect an attack upon an order granting letters of administration made upon the ground that the decedent was resident in another county. In each of these cases it was held that the orders could not be questioned collaterally, and none is an authority for the proposition that the findings upon which the orders were based were conclusive upon strangers in proceedings not involving the validity of the orders. In Estate of Barton, 196 Cal. 508, 238 P. 681, the testator died in San Diego county, where his will was admitted to probate, the finding in the order being that he was a resident of that county at the time of his death. The will was executed in Rhode Island, where the testator was then domiciled. He owned certain foreign corporate stock which by the terms of the will was bequeathed to one Charles E. Blake, a resident of Rhode Island, but who predeceased the testator. Under section 1343 of the Civil Code this legacy lapsed upon the death of Blake. Upon the filing of the petition for distribution, Blake's heirs filed objections to the distribution of the stock to the residuary legatee, alleging that the testator, contrary to the above finding, was domiciled in Rhode Island at the time of his death and that under the laws of that state the legacy did not lapse. A demurrer to the objections filed was sustained, and the stock distributed to the residuary legatee. On appeal from the decree it was held following Estate of Relp, supra, that the findings of jurisdictional facts supporting the order were final adjudications in all subsequent stages of the administration; also that, while the fact that the testator died in San Diego county leaving estate therein was sufficient to give the court jurisdiction to make the order (Code Civ. Proc. § 1294, subd. 2), nevertheless Blake's heirs were privileged to appear and oppose the admission of the will to probate on the ground that the testator was a resident of the county, and, having failed to do so after due notice, were concluded by the finding. While a decree admitting a will to probate as a judgment in rem is conclusive only as to the status adjudicated, it is, nevertheless, as to all persons interested in the will who, being notified to appear at the probate, might come in, or who, had they come in, would have been heard on any question which the court might properly determine at the hearing, as conclusive for the purposes of administration as a decree in personam. Garwood v. Garwood, 29 Cal. 514; Estate of Allen, 176 Cal. 632, 169 P. 364; Freeman on Judgments (5th Ed.) § 1524; 15 Cal. Jur. Judgments, §§ 180, 181, pp. 117, 118. This was the gist of the decision in the Estate of Parsons, supra, on this question, and all that is necessary to support that decision.

[7, 8] The above cases make it plain that judgments in rem are binding upon persons who are not parties to or participants in the proceeding only so far as the status, title, or other res constituting the subject-matter is adjudicated. Estate of Blake, 157 Cal. 448, 108 P. 287. It is well settled that the tax imposed by the Inheritance Tax Law (St. 1921, p. 1500, as amended) is on the right to succeed to the property of the estate rather than upon the property itself. Estate of Letchworth, 201 Cal. 1, 255 P. 195. The statute makes no provision for notice to the state or any officer thereof of hearings upon petitions for the probate of wills or for letters of administration, and before the appointment of the inheritance tax appraiser the state is a stranger to the proceeding. Any other rule would afford opportunity for fraud, of which unscrupulous persons would not be slow to take advantage.

[9, 10] While the state may be concluded by a judgment in rem as to the res with respect to which the judgment was rendered, as, for example, the validity of the organization of irrigation districts (People v. Linda Vista Irr. District, 128 Cal. 477, 61 P. 86; People v. Perris Irr. District, 132 Cal. 289, 64 P. 399, 773), or the genuineness of a will duly admitted to probate (State v. McGlynn, supra), nevertheless it has been held that judgments of this character do not conclude the state or its agencies unless the law authorizing the proceeding contemplates such result, since the state, without its consent, express or implied, cannot be sued (Berton v. All Persons, 176 Cal. 610, 170 P. 151), and also that the right of the state to collect an inheritance tax cannot be prejudiced by the findings of the court in a proceeding for the probate of a will (Estate of Holt, 61 Cal. App. 464, 215 P. 124).

[11-13] We find no merit in appellant's further contention that as between the state and the executor the latter is estopped by his testimony at the hearing of the petition for the probate of the will. The estoppel of a judgment is operative only when it is mutual (34 Cor. Jur. Judgments, § 1407, p. 988), which was not the case as to the state. Moreover, it is an essential element of an estoppel by conduct that the party asserting it was injured or misled by the conduct of his opponent (10 Cal. Jur. Estoppel, § 20, p. 636), which is not contended to be the fact here.

The conclusions of the trial court are supported both by the facts and the law, and its order should therefore be affirmed.

The order is affirmed.

WARE v. McPHERSON et al.*

Civ. 7360.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 2, California.

Nov. 20, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 20, 1930. Hearing
Granted by Supreme Court Jan. 19, 1931.Damages $\Rightarrow$ 131(1).

$3,000 for physical injuries held excessive by $2,500, where plaintiff did not suffer any broken bones, major lacerations, or permanent disorder.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by Howard F. Ware, a minor, by Arthur F. Ware, his guardian ad litem, against Charles McPherson and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Reversed unless modification accepted.

Treadwell, Van Fleet & Laughlin, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Vincent W. Hallinan and James J. Roach, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J.

The plaintiff was injured by being hit by defendants' automobile. He commenced an action to recover damages. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $3,000. From a judgment entered on that verdict, the defendants have appealed and claim that the verdict is excessive. In their brief the defendants recite much of the evidence as to the plaintiff's injuries.

The plaintiff testified as follows: He was injured around the knee, and had several cuts on both legs. His right eye had a large cut over it. One arm was strained a bit, and his chest hurt him very badly. His nose was hurt. He bled at the nose very badly, and his arm and eye were bleeding. The accident occurred on April 10, 1927. The action was tried August 22, 1929. At the time of the trial, the plaintiff testified that he still felt the effects of his injury—his knee bothered him, his lungs bothered him, and his head bothered him quite a bit. If he tries to engage in athletics, his knee gives away on him. When he runs down the track, his right knee gives under him, and he has to turn himself about and stop. Occasionally when he walks it does the same thing, or when he stands still. These things happen very frequently sometimes, and at other times just occasionally. At the time of the accident, he was attending the Polytechnic High School in San Francisco. He was active in athletics, and took part in soccer, basketball, and track athletics. After the accident he went back to school and finished that year, and then took a post graduate course. There is no evidence the plaintiff missed a day at school or that he was laid up as a result of the injury. In May, 1927, about a month after the injury, he took part in the field day exercises and ran in the 75-yard dash and in the relay race. He was unable to indulge in athletics after he went back to school. He could get around on his knee, but it was stiff. He had been running in 100-yard race and the 220. After he returned to school, he could manage to run them, but could not run them fast. His knee would bother him an awful lot. At the time of the trial, he was unable to play basketball. Regarding his chest at the time of the trial, he stated that he had short wind. At the time of the accident there was a sharp pain across the chest. The soreness in the chest was gone after about a week. At the time of the trial, if he exercised himself very much, his wind was short. As to the cut over the eye, no stitches were taken in it. Before the accident, the plaintiff's nose was straight, but at the time of the trial the plaintiff testified when he gets a cold one nostril is very hard to breathe through. His nose does not bother him right now. If he does very violent exercise, he breathes through his mouth. Since the accident, his head bothers him. He has headaches sometimes, and then it is very hard to work at figures. He cannot concentrate for any long period the way he used to do. He is engaged in bookkeeping and billing. He has trouble in concentrating on figures. If he figures on something for a while, he just stares at it, and it means nothing to him. He did not have any trouble like that before the accident occurred. Nor did he have any difficulty in school work. During the last year he did not seem to get down and concentrate on his subjects. He had a nosebleed on the morning of the trial. Prior to the accident he had a few nosebleeds as the average person has. He has a nosebleed every two weeks. He has dizzy spells, but was not bothered that way before the accident. At the emergency hospital the plaintiff received first aid and was then taken to the St. Francis Hospital. At the latter place the doctor examined the plaintiff thoroughly. That was Dr. Green. After making a thorough examination, the doctor washed the cuts, told the plaintiff how to treat himself, and said he would call again. The doctor came to see him once or twice. The plaintiff was sure he came once. That call was within a week after the accident. After the accident, the plaintiff's mother was at the St. Francis Hospital and he visited her there and on some occasions saw Dr. Green. When the plaintiff first saw Dr. Green, he told him about the injury to his knee, and Dr. Green advised him to place it in hot water and put Epsom salts and hot applications on it. The plaintiff followed that treatment for a couple of weeks. The pain did not leave on the first treatment, and Dr. Green took an X-ray. The doctor did not prescribe any further treatment after the X-ray was taken, except he told the plaintiff to keep on adding hot applications. He continued the treatment for a week or more. The plaintiff complained to Dr. Green of pains in his chest and the difficulty of breathing. The doctor made a thorough examination, and told him to rub his chest with salve and things like that. The plaintiff applied the salves for about two weeks. He did not complain to Dr. Green about any injury to his nose. Within a week after the accident, he suffered a nosebleed, but he did not tell that fact to Dr. Green. He has never consulted any doctor about the bleeding of the nose, has never had any treatment for it. He did not call to the attention of Dr. Green any injury about his head. Neither has he ever called it to the attention of any other physician. Everybody has a nosebleed now and then, and so did the plaintiff before the accident. Sometimes he would not have any nosebleeds and sometimes he would. That had been through all of his life. He gets the dizzy spells every once in a while. Sometimes they come twice a week and sometimes three times a week. He has never consulted Dr. Green about that nor any other physician. When the X-ray was taken, it was taken around the knee. That was the only portion of his body of which an X-ray was taken. On July 12, 1929, when the plaintiff gave a deposition, he was examined regarding nosebleeds and injury to the knee, and was asked if he had any other complaints. He replied, "Just that nervousness." It is more or less where machines are concerned—sudden stopping of machines or squeaking of brakes. He did not mention anything else because he was too nervous.

Dr. Mansfelt examined the plaintiff a day and a half before the trial. He examined the plaintiff's nose, and testified that it showed a deviated septum and apparently a healed fracture. The general appearance of the nose showed it had been fractured. The plaintiff has a rundown condition and seems somewhat nervous. He weighs 125 pounds, and should weigh 145 pounds. In reply to a hypothetical question, the witness stated that the plaintiff's rundown condition was probably due to the shock of the accident. Objectively he did not find very much of an indication of nervousness, but all the witness could assume was what the plaintiff told him. The nosebleed might be the result of trauma to the nose at the time of the accident. In his examination he did not find definite symptoms of the trauma or fracture, but very suggestive symptoms of an old fracture of the nose. The left nostril is very small, due to the deviated septum. To put the nose in proper condition, it would necessitate an operation of straightening the septum. That operation would require the removal of a part of the bony structure.

Dr. Green testified that after the accident he was called upon to treat the plaintiff. He examined him at the St. Francis Hospital. He examined him thoroughly, and found the plaintiff suffering from contusions on the knees, a laceration over the eye, nothing to indicate any serious nature whatsoever. At the time of the examination, the plaintiff complained that the knees were paining him. His main complaint was as to his knees, and there was a slight cut over his eye. He did not complain regarding his nose. He did not speak about pain in his chest. Under his examination, the witness found there were no fractured bones. The second time the witness went to see him, the witness did nothing. After the first examination, the plaintiff complained again of his knee. The witness took an X-ray and produced the negatives in court and testified regarding them. The X-ray was taken eight days after the accident. One of the pictures shows an old-standing condition in the knee. That condition is what is called "Osgood Slater's disease." That condition was not produced by the accident. It could not have been so produced. It is a condition that a recent injury could not possibly produce. Osgood Slater's disease is not uncommon. It is caused by indirect trauma. You would probably see evidence in the left knee the same as in the right. After he had taken the X-ray and pronounced him as having no fracture, he made no further examinations and did not see him at all. He never complained to me of nosebleeds, nor that a deep breath would cause him pain, nor that he had difficulty in concentration, nor that he had previously been to specialists. The peculiarity shown in the X-ray was not caused by being hit by the automobile. The X-ray shows nothing in the line of fracture or injury to the knee.

Dr. Kyle testified that the X-ray contained no evidence of any recent injury. They do show Osgood Slater's disease. That disease may be due, as far as we know, to continuous small trauma—continuing trauma—such as exercise. That disease is never the result of a direct injury to the knee. There is nothing in the X-rays that shows any evidence of an injury at that time. The disease shown by the X-ray could not have been the result of the injury only eight days prior. The soft tissues could have been injured within eight days without the X-ray showing it, but not the bony tissues. Unless it was at a time when the disease was active, it is very doubtful whether trauma would aggravate the Osgood Slater disease. If a person is endeavoring to run and take violent exercise, Osgood Slater's disease does not tend to have the leg give way and throw the person to the ground.

The record contained no evidence contradicting the testimony given by Dr. Kyle.

About a week prior to the trial, Dr. Silberman examined the plaintiff. He testified that he examined him with respect to his various injuries complained of. The plaintiff complained of a cut over the eyebrow, of bruises to both elbows, and minor lacerations about the elbows, and lacerations about both knees, and particularly about the right knee, and a contusion of the left chest. The plaintiff stated to the witness that the knee bothered him for about a month and was stiff for about a month, and after that it did not bother him. The chest he said caused him some shortness of breath, caused him pain on taking a deep breath or exercising himself. This was felt in the chest, and it all passed away. The plaintiff further stated to the witness that his nose would bleed on an average of once every two weeks. The witness examined him and found a scar under the right eyebrow hardly visible and no traces of any contusion remaining at that time and very minute scars remaining on both knees. He examined the nose and found a deflected septum. The plaintiff also said he had nosebleeds before the accident, but not as frequently as after. The septum was deflected to the left, and the plaintiff could not breathe on that side. Nearly everybody has a deviated septum in some degree or other. The swollen turbinated and deviated septum was not due to the injury, because an injury severe enough to cause a deviated septum and pronounced turbinated bone would have broken his nose. The condition the witness found present in the plaintiff's nose caused the nosebleeds. The plaintiff made no complaint to the witness that required any other extended examination.

In reply to the foregoing, the plaintiff claims that there is other testimony in the record. He quotes much that has already been set forth above. He quotes the testimony of the plaintiff's mother where she testified that prior to the accident plaintiff's nose was perfectly straight, but that since the accident she has noticed a difference. His nose is enlarged and he has a hump on the nose which he never had before. However, the plaintiff sets forth no part of the record showing that the condition of the nose at the time of the trial was referable to any injury received in the accident. He quotes the testimony regarding the claim of loss of power to concentrate, but he quotes no part of the record showing that such loss of power was caused by the accident. Continuing, the plaintiff asserts that under all of the evidence the plaintiff could have suffered a knee injury without the X-ray showing it. Conceding such to be the testimony, it is clear that, if the X-rays did not show the plaintiff's injury to be due to the accident, then the plaintiff was bound to show that fact by other evidence. But he did not do so.

The record shows without conflict that the plaintiff did not suffer from any broken bone or bones, any major lacerations, any intense pain of long or short duration, nor any permanent disorder shown to be the direct or indirect result of injury received in the accident. The record does not disclose any evidence of special damages of any kind or nature. A comparison of the evidence with the verdict convinces us that the jury was moved by considerations foreign to the evidence in arriving at the amount of $3,000 in the verdict. Barrett v. S. P. Co., 207 Cal. 154, 277 P. 481. Moreover the facts are such as to suggest at first blush passion, prejudice, or corruption on the part of the jury. Morris v. Standard Oil Co., 188 Cal. 468, 473, 205 P. 1073. The verdict was clearly excessive in so far as it exceeded the sum of $500.

We believe that a reversal is required unless plaintiff is willing to consent to a modification of the judgment hereinbefore rendered. It is, therefore, ordered that, unless within thirty days from the filing of the remittitur herein in the lower court the plaintiff shall release all but $500 and costs of the judgment rendered by the trial court, such judgment shall be and it is reversed, but that, if within such time plaintiff consent to such reduction in said judgment and releases therefrom all but the sum of $500 thereof and costs such judgment as so reduced shall be and it is affirmed; said judgment for the reduced amount to bear interest at the legal rate from the date of the entry of the original judgment of the superior court and neither party to recover from the other costs on this appeal.

1. Evidence ⇨478(3).

In action for injuries in automobile accident, exclusion of testimony whether defendant was intoxicated at time of accident held error.

2. Evidence ⇨500.

Form of question as to whether defendant in automobile collision case was intoxicated held not improper.

The question was as follows: "What was his apparent condition at the time with reference to being intoxicated or otherwise?"

3. Appeal and error ⇨1056(1).

In action for injuries in automobile collision, erroneous exclusion of evidence whether defendant was intoxicated held prejudicial.

4. Negligence ⇨89(1).

In action by occupants of automobile for injuries in collision, negligence of one plaintiff would not bar recovery by the other.

5. Damages ⇨185(1).

Evidence held to justify award of substantial damages for personal injuries to child.

Medical testimony showed that child suffered fracture of four ribs and depressed fracture of skull.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; T. I. Fitzpatrick, Judge.

Action by James Finn, a minor, by his guardian ad litem, Dorothy Finn, and another, against V. Sullivan. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal.

Reversed.

James F. Brennan, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Daniel W. Burbank, C. F. Laumeister, and Henry Heidelberg, all of San Francisco (Pembroke Gochbauer, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

DOOLING, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiffs and appellants appeal from a judgment against them in an action in which each sought a recovery for personal injuries. Dorothy Finn is the mother of James Finn, who, at the time of the collision out of which the action grows, was an infant 3½ months old. Appellants were riding in an automobile operated by one George B. O'Neal, which was proceeding northerly on Potrero avenue between Seventeenth street and Sixteenth street in San Francisco on May 6, 1929, at about 12:30 a. m., when a collision occurred with an automobile operated by respondent, Sullivan. There were no eyewitnesses of the collision except the occupants of O'Neal's car and respondent. The testimony was sharply conflicting. Appellants' witnesses testified that Sullivan approached them driving on his left side of Potrero avenue at a high rate of speed, while O'Neal was driving on his own right side at less than 20 miles per hour; that, to avoid a collision, O'Neal turned to his left, and at the same time respondent, Sullivan, swung to his right, and the collision occurred. Sullivan, who was the only witness to the facts on his behalf, testified that he was at all times proceeding on his right side of Potrero avenue at about 5 miles per hour, and that the car driven by O'Neal was on the wrong side of the street and collided with his car head on at a high rate of speed.

[1-3] After the collision, O'Neal was the only member of appellants' party to observe and talk to respondent. He testified that he got out of his car and walked over to Sullivan, who remained seated in his car, and asked him to get out and help take care of the injured people, to which Sullivan made no reply. O'Neal was then asked by counsel for appellants: "What was his (Sullivan's) apparent condition at the time with reference to being intoxicated or otherwise?" An objection that this called for the opinion and conclusion of the witness was sustained by the court. This ruling was error. 10 Cal. Jur., pp. 1003, 1004; Bidwell v. L. A. Ry. Co., 169 Cal. 780, 784, 148 P. 197; People v. Monteith, 73 Cal. 7, 8, 14 P. 373; People v. Sehorn, 116 Cal. 511, 48 P. 495; People v. Hill, 123 Cal. 51, 55 P. 692; 22 C. J. p. 599, § 694. Respondent urges that in the form in which it was asked the question was improper. In People v. Monteith, supra, the question approved in the opinion was almost identical in form.

We cannot agree with respondent that this error was not prejudicial. Sullivan's own testimony was that after the collision he left his car and went into a vacant lot and lay down, that he got up and went home about 2 a. m. and there had a drink of whisky and that his dazed condition was caused by injuries received in the collision. He denied that prior to the accident he had had any intoxicants to drink. A policeman who saw Sullivan at 6:30 a. m. testified that he was then drunk. In this state of the evidence, if O'Neal had been permitted to testify that immediately after the accident Sullivan appeared to be drunk, the jury might not only have concluded that he was intoxicated, but for that reason might have discredited his testimony as to how the collision occurred. As it was, if they believed the policeman's testimony, they may have concluded that Sullivan's intoxication at 6:30 a. m. was caused by the whisky he drank at 2 a. m. and that he was sober at the time of the collision. In a case where the evidence was so sharply conflicting and Sullivan's testimony stood uncorroborated by any other witness, it is apparent that serious prejudice may have been suffered by appellants because of this ruling.

The probability that this may have been so is heightened by the following occurrence: The jury twice returned into court to ask that certain instructions be reread to them. On the second of these occasions the court read to the jury an instruction containing the following language: "If, on the subject of the negligence of the said defendant, the evidence is equally balanced, both in weight, quality and convincing effect, the plaintiffs have failed to make out a case against that defendant, and in that event your verdict must be in favor of the defendant, Vincent Sullivan." The following colloquy then occurred between the foreman of the jury and the court:

"The Foreman: Will you read that instruction again, your Honor, slowly?"

"The Court: Yes, I will read it slowly."

This request of the foreman gives force to the idea that some or all of the jurors may have felt that the scales of proof hung even. If so, the excluded testimony might well have been the added weight which would have swung the balance in favor of appellants.

[4] Appellants complain of certain instructions given at the request of the respondent, of which the following is typical: "If you find that plaintiffs, or any of them, were, or was, guilty of negligence, and that such negligence, however slight, was the proximate cause of, or proximately contributed to the injuries or damages suffered by them, or either of them, I instruct you your verdict must be in favor of the defendant, Vincent Sullivan."

That the instructions on contributory negligence were confusing to the jury is shown by the fact that they twice returned into court and had them re-read.

The instruction quoted and other similar instructions in effect told the jury that the negligence of either plaintiff would bar a recovery by the other. This is not the law. Zarzana v. Neve Drug Co., 180 Cal. 32, 179 P. 203, 15 A. L. R. 401. We pass by the obvious observation that a 3½ month old infant cannot be guilty of negligence, because the jury must have known that fact. But the jury may well, under these instructions, have imputed negligence of the mother to her child, if they believed her guilty of any.

[5] Respondent's claim that there was no evidence which would support an award of substantial damages to the child finds its answer in competent medical testimony that the child suffered the fracture of four ribs and a depressed fracture of the skull, which, in the opinion of a physician called by appellants, caused injury to the brain tissue with a reasonable probability of future epileptic attacks or some marked behavior disturbance in later life.

Other claimed errors are not likely to recur on a second trial and need not be discussed.

Judgment reversed.

SPENCE, J.

This action was brought by plaintiff, a girl fifteen years of age, against defendants William S. Tevis, Jr., and Herbert Gordon, to recover damages for personal injuries. Plaintiff obtained judgment in the sum of $500 against both defendants upon a trial by jury. Defendant Tevis alone appeals from the judgment.

[1-3] There is a conflict in the evidence in certain respects, but the facts hereinafter set forth appear in the testimony most favorable to respondent. Defendant Tevis was in the business of renting saddle horses, and defendant Gordon was one of his employees. Among the horses owned by Tevis was one called Mickey, which was known as a "cold jawed" horse, or, in other words, one that had practically no feeling in his mouth and was therefore hard to manage. He was not a kicking or biting horse, but would run away if he could. It was one of the duties of defendant Gordon to exercise the horses. On the evening in question, defendant Gordon was directed by the manager of the stable to take this horse out and exercise him by giving him a long, slow ride. Defendant Gordon had been given instructions to permit no person other than himself to ride any horse belonging to defendant Tevis while exercising it. Gordon rode the horse to the place maintained by plaintiff's parents, where he dismounted and entered to purchase a milk shake. While there Gordon talked with plaintiff and her mother and invited plaintiff to take a ride, assuring them that the horse was a gentle animal. Gordon threw the reins over the horse's neck and was assisting plaintiff in mounting when the horse bolted and ran away. Plaintiff was carried some distance and thrown from the horse, receiving her injuries. The foregoing testimony was adduced from the witnesses called by plaintiff, and at the close of plaintiff's case a motion for nonsuit was made on behalf of defendant Tevis, which motion was denied.

On this appeal appellant's main contention is that the court erred in denying the motion for nonsuit. We are of the opinion that the motion for nonsuit should have been granted. Plaintiff's complaint was drawn in two counts differing only in that the first count charged negligence in inviting and permitting plaintiff to mount the horse, while the second count charged negligence in managing the horse while assisting plaintiff to mount. In both counts it was alleged that the horse was of a vicious disposition, all of which was well known to defendants. The only trait of alleged viciousness shown was the tendency of the horse to run away when mounted. This is not, as contended by respondent, a case analogous to those cases involving attacks by vicious animals. There the liability of the owner knowingly keeping such vicious animal is held to be that of an insurer of the safety of any person injured without fault on the part of the latter and negligence on the part of the owner need not be shown. Clowdis v. Fresno Flume, etc., Co., 118 Cal. 315, 323, 50 P. 373, 62 Am. St. Rep. 238. In the present case it did not appear that the horse had ever attacked anyone nor did he attack plaintiff. The alleged vicious trait was such as to endanger plaintiff only in the event that she mounted the horse. Under these circumstances, the gravamen of plaintiff's causes of action as alleged in both counts was negligence. The fact that the horse had a tendency to run away was material upon this issue of negligence, but would not impose upon the owner the liability of an insurer. It is not contended by appellant that the evidence was insufficient to show negligence on the part of the employee Gordon, but it is urged that appellant cannot be held liable for the negligence of the employee under the doctrine of respondeat superior as it affirmatively appeared that the employee was not acting within the scope of his employment. We believe this contention must be sustained. The general rule is stated in 39 Corpus Juris 1304, § 1502, where it is said: "It is very generally held that a servant has no implied authority to invite or permit a third person to ride on a horse or vehicle in his charge and if, in so doing, the invitee sustains injuries through the negligence of the servant the master will not be liable, as the servant is not acting within the scope of his authority; and especially is this true where the servant is acting in disobedience of express orders not to invite anyone to ride on the vehicle."

In view of our conclusion that the evidence affirmatively showed that the employee was not acting within the scope of his employment and that the motion for nonsuit should have been granted, we deem it unnecessary to discuss the further contentions of appellant relating to alleged error in refusing certain instructions relating to the scope of employment.

The judgment against defendant William S. Tevis, Jr., is reversed.

BURROUGHS, Justice pro tem.

This action was commenced by the plaintiff to recover the sum of $6,650 alleged to be due him as commissions upon a contract for the sale of furniture. There is also a second count in the complaint in quantum meruit for the same amount as stated in the first cause of action. The contract sued upon is dated November 9, 1925, and is between the plaintiff A. A. Chamberlin, as the party of the first part, and N. Gallucci, an individual doing business under the firm name and style of Universal Manufacturing Company, the party of the second part, and hereinafter referred to as the manufacturing company. It is provided in said contract that plaintiff would handle the merchandise line of the manufacturing company in San Francisco for two years excepting the Emporium account; that plaintiff should receive a commission of 5 per cent. on all orders taken and accepted by the factory; that plaintiff should sell not less than $10,000 per month beginning January 1, 1926, otherwise the contract to be void; that plaintiff should not handle any other line but that of the manufacturing company. There is a further provision, "That upon the resignation of the salesman Mr. McKee, now covering the bay towns and San Jose, that territory will be turned over to A. A. Chamberlin." It is claimed by the plaintiff that between January 1, 1926, and March 25, 1927, being the period of his employment by the manufacturing company, he sold to John Breuner Company stores in Oakland, Sacramento, and Stockton, furniture to the amount of $132,698.58; that he also made sales to the Better Homes Furniture Company in the sum of $2,441.94; that he has never received any commissions on said sums and there is now due him as commissions on said sales $6,756.95. The defendant denied the indebtedness and by way of a counterclaim sought to recover the sum of $129.65. The court adjudged that plaintiff take nothing by his action and awarded the defendant the full amount of his counterclaim, together with his costs. From the judgment the plaintiff has appealed.

[1, 2] The appeal is taken upon the sole ground that the findings are wholly unsupported by and directly contrary to the evidence. It is too well settled to require citation of authority that if there is any substantial evidence to sustain the findings they will not be disturbed on appeal. Before examining the evidence we deem it necessary to determine the nature of the contract sued upon. It appears to be the contention of appellant that the contract is an exclusive one, and that the defendant on or about the month of March, 1926, having given plaintiff permission to sell to the Breuner stores, he (the plaintiff) was then entitled to a commission on all sales made irrespective of whether he obtained the orders therefor or not. He cites in support of this position the case of Caro v. Mattel, 39 Cal. App. 253, 178 P. 537. As we read this case, the contract of employment appointed plaintiff as the sole representative of the defendant and the contract was by its terms an exclusive one. The defendant in that case also agreed to pay plaintiff commissions on all sales of his product made in plaintiff's territory. An examination of the contract in the case at bar shows that neither of these elements is present. We believe that the true rule applicable to this class of contracts is that laid down in Golden Gate Packing Company v. Farmers' Union, 55 Cal. 606, where it is held that under a contract the defendant should have the exclusive agency for the sale of plaintiff's products east of the state of California upon a commission basis and it was proved that plaintiff had sold some of its products to other persons to be sent to the states east of the state of California, the court held: "We are unable to discover anything in the agreement which forbade the selling of its goods by the plaintiff to whomever would purchase them in any part of the world. It could not, under that agreement, establish any other agency than that of defendant for the sale of its goods east of the State of California. And there is no evidence tending in any degree to prove that it did. It is not stipulated that the defendant should have the exclusive sale of the plaintiff's goods within the territory mentioned, and there is nothing in the agreement from which we can infer that such was the intention of the parties." In the contract before us there is nothing that makes it an exclusive one for the sale of the manufacturing company's products. We are therefore of the opinion that it is not an exclusive contract and that the defendant was not precluded from selling his goods whenever and wherever he pleased.

[3] The evidence material to a decision of this case is as follows: The defendant Gallucci testified that the plaintiff came to his place of business and consulted with him about giving him work as a salesman; that he returned later to plaintiff's place of business with a formal contract prepared for their signatures. One of the clauses of the contract was that plaintiff should have an exclusive right for the San Francisco territory; that defendant thereupon told him that he would not give nor had he ever given to any salesman exclusive rights in any territory. He also told plaintiff that he would give him 5 per cent. on all goods that the plaintiff would sell when the sales were accepted by the defendant and on reorders of such sales and not otherwise. Plaintiff thereupon left defendant's place of business and again returned with another contract written in long hand with the objectionable clause stricken out. Whereupon the contract was copied on the typewriter by defendant's stenographer and signed by both parties. This evidence was corroborated by Alexander Harris, who was present when the contract was prepared and signed. This witness testified that the defendant told the plaintiff that he would not give any salesman the exclusive right to sell his line in any territory, that he would be paid only on orders that he took and brought in, and that he would obtain 5 per cent. commission on such orders. Plaintiff stated that that was agreeable to him. Defendant told the plaintiff that he himself sold to the John Breuner Company stores. The defendant further testified that he sold all the goods to John Breuner Company during the employment of the plaintiff and that none were sold by or through the plaintiff. He further testified that the goods sold to the Better Homes Company were sold by himself and that the only orders for which he paid plaintiff were those brought in by the plaintiff himself or reorders from the customers brought in by plaintiff; that plaintiff received detailed monthly statements of the amount of the commissions due him and on other occasions his overdrafts where his account had been overdrawn, and that plaintiff made no complaint that they were incorrect or of any omissions or that he was entitled to any more money and that he would pay his overdrafts; that, during the time the plaintiff was employed by the defendant, the plaintiff borrowed $500 from the defendant and repaid the same after leaving the employ of the defendant and at the time of repayment he made no claim for the sums now sought to be collected, but did promise to pay the sum of $129.65, being the amount of the counterclaim. There is further evidence in the record, but we are of the opinion that the foregoing recital is sufficient to support the findings. Having reached this conclusion, no useful purpose would be served by setting out the remaining evidence either for or against said findings as it would only result in a conflict.

[4] Appellant also claims that under the evidence it has been proved that there is a well-established trade usage according to which an agent is entitled to a commission on sales made in the agent's territory. There is evidence supporting such a custom, but irrespective of such a custom, it cannot vary or alter the terms of a written contract. Holloway v. McNear, 81 Cal. 154, 22 P. 514.

We see no reason for a reversal of the judgment, and it is therefore affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; Frank Lamberson, Judge.

Action to establish trust by H. Williams and another against J. H. Hinckley and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal.

Affirmed.

Wm. Ellis Lady, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

J. A. Chase, of Visalia, and W. M. Hiatt, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

Mr. Presiding Justice FINCH delivered the opinion of the court.

The trial court sustained demurrers to the amended complaint herein without leave to amend, and thereafter entered judgment in favor of the defendants for costs. The plaintiffs have appealed from the judgment.

The plaintiffs attempted to state a cause of action to establish a trust in their favor in an oil and gas lease given by the defendants E. M. and Elizabeth Carlisle to the defendant Hinckley on the 3d day of December, 1926. The complaint alleges in substance that during the year 1923 the Carlisles executed an oil and gas lease to F. G. Bogle, who was merely a dummy for defendant Hinckley, covering a section of land, excepting 20 acres thereof; that the lease was not delivered until July, 1924; that, as a part of the transaction between the parties to the lease, it was mutually understood and agreed that Bogle would execute to E. M. Steele a sublease covering the south half of the section of land, for which the Carlisles and Hinckley received a valuable consideration from Steele; that the plaintiffs have succeeded to all of Steele's rights under the sublease; that, for the purpose of defrauding the plaintiffs, the Carlisles and Hinckley entered into a plan or scheme, at a time "not later than the 3rd day of December, 1926," to bring about the forfeiture of the Bogle lease, by failing "to perform the terms and/or provisions" of that lease and, "in furtherance of said plan or scheme, * * * on or about the 3rd day of December, 1926, E. M. Carlisle and Elizabeth Carlisle made, executed and delivered to defendant Hinckley an oil and gas lease, * * * covering the south half" of said section.

It clearly appears from the allegations of the complaint that the plaintiffs' rights, if any, are dependent upon the terms of the sublease. It is not alleged that Bogle assigned to Steele any interest in the lease of 1923, but the allegation is that Bogle executed and delivered to Steele "a sublease agreement, covering the south half of said section."

[1, 2] "The distinction between an assignment of a lease and a subletting is important and well recognized. A transfer of the whole leasehold, leaving no reversionary interest in the transferor, is an assignment and not a subletting, no matter what the parties may call it, or what sort of instrument they may employ to give it effect. This is the rule, whether the transfer covers the whole, or only a part, of the premises. On the other hand, a transfer by a tenant of an estate in the whole premises less than that which he has himself, leaving a reversion in him, is a sublease, making the transferee a tenant of the transferor." 15 Cal. Jur. 745.

[3] The complaint is entirely silent as to the terms of the sublease or the length of the term thereof. Neither is it alleged that the plaintiffs or their assignors have performed any of the terms of the sublease. The term of the sublease may have expired long prior to the commencement of the action and prior to the alleged wrongful acts of the defendants. As said in respondents' brief, there is "no allegation in the complaint that the interest claimed by appellants is or was at the time of filing the complaint, a valid, existing and continuing right." It being impossible to ascertain from the allegations of the amended complaint what the plaintiffs' rights are, if any, it failed to state a cause of action.

[4] Appellants contend that they should have been permitted further to amend, but the record fails to show that they desired or asked permission to make further amendments, nor does it appear that they did not have an opportunity to ask leave to amend after the demurrers were sustained and before the entry of judgment. "A plaintiff may not amend as a matter of right, and in order to be in a position to complain upon appeal of an abuse of discretion in sustaining a demurrer without leave to amend, he must ask permission to amend" (21 Cal. Jur. 119), unless it is made to appear that he had no opportunity to ask such permission. Metzger v. Vestal, 76 Cal. App. 409, 244 P. 942.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Highways ⇨47.

Highway commissioners have discretion in fixing width of public highway which may not be interfered with so long as it is not less than 40 feet and not wider than reasonably necessary (Pol. Code, § 2620).

Pol. Code, § 2620 provides in part that width of all public highways shall be at least 40 feet.

2. Eminent domain ⇨13.

Power to declare what uses of property constitute public benefit rests with Legislature.

3. Eminent domain ⇨19.

Highways constitute "public use" of property of highest character (Code Civ. Proc. § 1238).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Public Use," see Words and Phrases.]

4. Eminent domain ⇨172.

Highway commission becomes quasi judicial body to determine necessary matters in condemning land for highway (Pol. Code, § 363h, as amended by St. 1927, p. 463, § 9).

5. Eminent domain ⇨68.

Necessity for construction of highway at place designated in manner determined by highway commission, and amount of land required, were matters conclusively established by commission's adoption of resolution, where no fraud, bad faith, or abuse of discretion was shown (Pol. Code, § 363h, as amended by St. 1927, p. 463, § 9).

6. Eminent domain ⇨195.

Answer in condemnation proceedings held inadequate to raise issue of fraud, bad faith, or abuse of discretion on part of highway commission.

The answer merely denied that land described was necessary for public use or any use as right of way.

7. Eminent domain ⇨192.

Facts constituting bad faith or fraud on part of highway commission, adopting resolution for condemnation of land, must be specifically alleged.

8. Eminent domain ⇨195.

In condemnation proceedings, evidence that highway was constructed in whole or in part for benefit of private interests held properly excluded under pleadings.

The pleadings did not raise any issue of fraud, bad faith, or abuse of discretion on part of highway commission in adopting resolution of condemnation.

9. Eminent domain ⇨202(4).

Landowners could not prove, as element of damage resulting from taking land for highway purposes, value of sand and gravel from borrow pits along condemned land.

10. Eminent domain ⇨124.

Landowners had no cause for special damages against state for removal of sand and gravel by power company constructing causeway before institution of condemnation proceedings.

11. Eminent domain ⇨317(2).

Title to land acquired by condemnation for highway purposes vests in public easement or right of way with necessary incidents for construction, maintenance, and reasonable enjoyment of same (Pol. Code, § 2631).

12. Eminent domain ⇨112.

Gravel and sand taken from borders of condemned strip for use in constructing highway held "incidental" to reasonable enjoyment of easement, as regards owner's recovery of special damages for such taking (Civ. Code, § 662; Pol. Code, § 2631).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Incident; Incidental," see Words and Phrases.]

13. Eminent domain ⇨112.

Landowners held not entitled to special damages for sand and gravel taken from borders of condemned strips of land for use in constructing highway (Pol. Code, § 2631, Civ. Code, § 662).

14. Eminent domain ⇨192.

Where no special damages were pleaded, none could be recovered in condemnation proceeding.

15. Eminent domain ⇨243(2).

Award of damages presumably included value of materials taken from condemned land and used for highway purposes (Pol. Code, § 2631; Civ. Code, § 662).

16. Eminent domain ⇨131.

Ordinarily, market value of land at time of commencement of condemnation action is measure of damages.

17. Eminent domain ⇨131.

In estimating market value of land taken, all purposes to which land may reasonably be adapted should be considered.

18. Eminent domain ⇨202(4).

That land taken is reasonably suitable for subdivision purposes may be considered in estimating market value, but mere prospective price of lots should not be considered when subdivision has not been made.

19. Evidence ⇨358.

Appeal from Superior Court, Plumas County; J. O. Moncur, Judge.

Action by the People, by and through the Department of Public Works, against George W. Olsen, Nelson A. Olsen, and others. From the decree, the defendants named appeal.

Affirmed.

Roy L. Daily, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Harry A. Encell, of San Francisco, for respondent.

Mr. Justice R. L. THOMPSON delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an appeal on the part of defendants George W. Olsen and Nelson A. Olsen from a decree in a suit involving eminent domain.

The action was instituted by the state of California through its department of public works to condemn a strip of land in Plumas county for highway purposes. The appellants own a tract of land east of the town of Chester bordering on the northern shore of Lake Almanor in that county. The Great Western Power Company owns most of the land involved in this controversy. It was a party defendant in this action. That corporation had acquired water rights in and about Lake Almanor for hydro-electric power purposes, including the privilege of flooding the lands adjacent to the lake. The power company was about to construct a new dam at the southern extremity of the lake where it empties into the north branch of Feather river. It was anticipated this project would result in raising the water of Lake Almanor to the 4,500-foot contour which would submerge the then existing Red Bluff-Susanville highway along the northern border of the lake and flood most of the land belonging to the appellants. The state therefore planned to improve the highway in that vicinity and construct a causeway from the town of Chester easterly a distance of about a mile and a third across Big Meadows and over a depression of considerable depth where Mud creek empties into the lake. Plans for this causeway were accordingly adopted by the highway commission. The elevation of this causeway was to be constructed at least 6 feet above the level of the 4,500-foot contour. The surface of the roadway was to be 24 feet in width. The fill was to have a uniformly increasing base which reached a maximum of 80 feet in width at the lowest point of the swale. At this locality the fill was 35 feet in depth. The construction of this causeway therefore required an enormous quantity of material. It was to cost approximately $200,000. The highway commission adopted a resolution declaring the purpose and necessity of improving the highway, constructing the causeway, and acquiring rights of way therefor over the lands of appellants and the Great Western Power Company. This causeway crossed two 40-acre tracts of land belonging to the appellants. The value of this land was estimated at from $3 to $400 per acre. The first piece of appellants' land sought to be condemned extends easterly from the town of Chester and is situated above the flood-water contour. It is gore-shaped, 1,300 feet in length, with a maximum width of 175 feet and contains 2.31 acres of land. A quarter section of land belonging to the Great Western Power Company intervenes between this gore-shaped piece of appellants' land and their other tract which is sought to be condemned. This latter strip of land is 1,300 feet in length with an average width of 300 feet and an area of about 10 acres. All of the balance of the land belongs to the power company.

This suit was commenced October 11, 1928. It was tried before a jury. The plaintiff established a prima facie case based upon the right of eminent domain. In an effort to show "that the use is a private use and not a public use," the appellants offered in evidence an agreement between the California highway commission and the Great Western Power Company, dated May 27, 1926. This evidence was excluded on the ground that it was incompetent. The document was marked for identification. From this agreement it appears that the Great Western Power Company was actively engaged in raising the flood line of its Lake Almanor reservoir which would of necessity overflow the highway then in use north of the lake. The state department of public works planned to improve that portion of the highway across the lands in controversy in this action at an expense of $14,796. The Great Western Power Company agreed to construct the causeway according to adopted specifications, at its own expense except that the state commission agreed to contribute $15,796 toward the entire cost and, at its own expense, also agreed to surface the roadbed and procure all necessary rights of way. The power company agreed to convey to the state a perpetual easement over its portion of the land for highway purposes and to "defray any cost of said right of way over lands not owned by second party (Great Western Power Company) in the amount over and above the cost of the standard highway width of eighty (80) feet."

Pursuant to this agreement the Great Western Power Company promptly proceeded to construct the causeway "in the summer of 1926." From the record and the briefs of appellants we assume the highway was completed before this cause was commenced. No action appears to have been taken by the appellants to stop the work.

In the construction of the causeway by the Great Western Power Company borrow pits were dug along both sides of the condemned strips of land. These pits were excavated to a depth of about 17 feet at the lowest points. The sand and gravel thus procured were used in the construction of the causeway adjacent to the pits from which they were obtained.

With the purpose of showing special damages to the property condemned, and not on account of severance damages, the appellants asked a witness at the trial "how much material was excavated" from these borrow pits. An objection to this question was sustained on the ground that it was incompetent. The evidence of the value of the land taken ranged from $3 per acre to $400. The sum of $3 per acre was fixed on the theory that the land was suitable only for grazing purposes. One of the appellants testified the largest tract taken was worth $150 an acre. The estimate of $400 an acre was based on the theory that the smaller tract adjacent to the town of Chester might be worth that sum for subdivision purposes for town lots. The jury awarded the power company an aggregate sum of $500. The appellants were given $200 for the gore-shaped piece and $500 additional for the larger strip. In special issues which were submitted to the jury, it was found that no damages accrued by virtue of the severance to any of the land not taken.

The appellants contend that: (1) The condemnation of land for highway purposes is limited to 80 feet in width; (2) the resolution of intention which was adopted by the commission is not conclusive evidence that the proposed condemnation of land is for public use, and that the court erred in precluding them from proving that the highway was intended partially for the private use of the Great Western Power Company and the Red River Lumber Company which subsequently obtained a right of way over the causeway for its tracks; (3) the resolution of condemnation of land was for highway purposes only and not for excavating pits from which to obtain sand and gravel, and the court erred in not permitting them to prove the quantity and value of the materials thus taken.

[1] There is no statutory limitation of 80 feet in width for public highways. Section 2620 of the Political Code merely prescribes 40 feet as the minimum width of a public highway. That section reads in part: "The width of all public highways * * * shall be at least forty feet." This language does not prohibit the acquiring of land for highway purposes in excess of 80 feet in width. The highway commissioners have a discretion in fixing the width of a public highway. This discretion may not be interfered with so long as it is not less than 40 feet in width and is not wider than is reasonably necessary for highway purposes under the circumstances of the particular case which is involved.

It is conceded by the appellants that the resolution which was adopted by the highway commission pursuant to the Statutes of California for 1927, page 463, § 9, which is an amendment of section 363h of the Political Code, is conclusive evidence of the necessity for the construction of the highway in question. It is, however, asserted that this statute is not conclusive evidence of the fact that the proposed improvement is for use as a public benefit; that this is a question for judicial determination. It is therefore claimed that, since the causeway which is involved in this action was constructed partially for the benefit of the Great Western Power Company, and that the Red River Lumber Company was granted a right of way over it for a logging track, the right to condemn the property failed, and that the court erred in refusing to permit the appellants to prove the causeway was not for public use alone.

Section 363h of the Political Code, as amended, authorizes the department of public works to condemn real property for any of the purposes relating to eminent domain which are specified in section 1238 of the Code of Civil Procedure, after first adopting a resolution to the effect that the public interest and necessity require the acquisition of the property described and the construction of the proposed improvements. The statute then provides:

"Said resolution shall be conclusive evidence:

"(a) Of the public necessity of such proposed public improvement;

"(b) That such property is necessary therefor; and

"(c) That such proposed public improvement is planned or located in a manner which will be most compatible with the greatest public good and the least private injury."

[2, 3] The right to exercise the doctrine of eminent domain is bestowed by the people in their sovereign capacity upon the Legislature. The power to declare what uses of property shall constitute a public benefit rests with the Legislature. 1 Lewis on Eminent Domain, 563, § 238; 10 Cal. Jur. 295, § 12. The maintenance of roads is declared by our Legislature to constitute a public use of property. Section 1238, Code Civ. Proc. Highways constitute a public use of property of the highest character. 10 R. C. L. 39, § 35; County of San Mateo v. Coburn, 130 Cal. 631, 635, 63 P. 78, 621; Rindge Co. v. County of Los Angeles, 262 U. S. 700, 43 S. Ct. 689, 67 L. Ed. 1187; 20 C. J. 559, § 43.

[4] By the terms of section 363h of the Political Code, as amended in 1927, the Legislature has delegated to the highway commission, which thereby becomes a quasi judicial body for that purpose, the exclusive authority to determine (1) the public necessity for a designated highway, (2) that particularly described property is necessary therefor, and (3) that the proposed improvement is planned and located in a manner which is most compatible with the greatest public good and the least private injury. These matters having been judicially determined by the commission in the manner provided by law, a resolution to that effect becomes conclusive evidence which, in the absence of fraud, bad faith, or an abuse of discretion, may not be disputed. County of San Mateo v. Coburn, 130 Cal. 631, 63 P. 78, 621; Rindge Co. v. County of Los Angeles, 262 U. S. 700, 43 S. Ct. 689, 67 L. Ed. 1187; 20 C. J. 626, § 112. Except when the Legislature has limited the authority of the commission, it may determine, within reason, what property and how much is necessary for the designated public use.

Some authorities fail to distinguish between the amount of land and the necessity for condemning property as contrasted with the proposed purpose for which it is to be used. 1 Lewis on Eminent Domain, 413, § 163.

[5-8] The necessity for the construction of a highway at the place designated and in the manner determined by the commission, together with the amount of land required therefor, are matters which were conclusively established by the adoption of the resolution. County of San Mateo v. Coburn, 130 Cal. 631, 63 P. 78, 621; Pool v. Simmons, 134 Cal. 621, 66 P. 872; Mendocino County v. Peters, 2 Cal. App. 24, 82 P. 1122. The question as to whether the land was to be devoted to a public use as distinguished from a mere private service may, under adequate pleadings, become a proper issue for the judicial determination of the court. We are, however, of the opinion this issue was not raised by the pleadings in the present case. To raise this issue it is necessary to specifically charge fraud, bad faith, or an abuse of discretion on the part of the tribunal to which the determination of the necessity of resorting to eminent domain is delegated. This was not done in the present case. The appellants' answer does not deny that the property was to be used for a public purpose. The answer contains no affirmative allegation concerning the nature of the use of the property. It merely denies "that all of said land described, or any land * * * is necessary for the public use, or any use * * * as a right of way. * * *" This language does not constitute a denial that the land was intended to be used for a public purpose. It is a mere denial that it is required for that purpose. This language is inadequate to raise the issue of fraud, bad faith, or abuse of discretion. The facts constituting bad faith or fraud must be specifically alleged. The court therefore properly sustained objections to appellants' offer to prove that the highway was constructed in whole or in part for the benefit of private interests.

[9, 10] Nor were the appellants entitled to prove, as an element of damage, in addition to the general damage sustained by virtue of the taking of the condemned strip of land for highway purposes, plus any severance damages which might have been suffered, the market value of sand and gravel which were taken from the borrow pits on the borders of the condemned land. The value of the sand and gravel was included in the general damages assessed in the taking of the land. Moreover, the appellants assert that the causeway was completed before the condemnation proceedings were commenced. The Great Western Power Company constructed the causeway and dug the pits complained of. The appellants took no action to stop the work. They have no cause for special damages against the plaintiff for the removal of the sand and gravel by another party prior to the institution of the eminent domain proceedings. Their remedy for this alleged trespass was to have enjoined the power company from removing the sand and gravel or to eject the company from the premises.

[11] Title to land acquired by condemnation for highway purposes vests in the public only an easement or right of way, together with the necessary incidents for the construction, maintenance, and reasonable enjoyment of the same. Section 2631, Pol. Code; Gurnsey v. Northern Cal. Power Co., 160 Cal. 699, 117 P. 906, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 185. The sand and gravel which were taken from the borders of the land condemned for use in constructing and maintaining the highway at that point were appurtenant and incidental to the use for highway purposes. "A thing is deemed to be incidental or appurtenant to land when it is by right used with the land for its benefit, as in the case of a way. * * *" Section 662, Civ. Code.

[12-15] The gravel and sand which were taken from the borders of the condemned strips of land for use in constructing the highway at that point were necessary and incidental to the reasonable enjoyment of the easement for which the land was condemned. The taking of this sand and gravel created no added burden on the fee retained by the owners, and they are therefore entitled to no special damages on that account. 13 R. C. L. 128, § 112. No special damages were pleaded, and none may be recovered in this action. It must be assumed the appellants were fully compensated for the market value of the land taken. Under the circumstances of this case it must be assumed this award of damages included the value of the materials taken from the condemned land and used for highway purposes at that point. No evidence was adduced, and no offer was made to prove there was any market in that vicinity for the sand and gravel which were taken from the pits. The evidence indicates that the land is of small value. No effort was made to show that the fee was injured or the land damaged by the taking of the sand and gravel. Nor was any effort made to show that these excavations would damage the adjoining land from which the condemned strips were severed. The appellants were fully compensated by the general award of damages. They were awarded the market value of the land.

[16-19] Ordinarily the market value of the land which is taken in eminent domain, estimated at the time of the commencement of the action, is the measure of damages for the condemnation thereof. City of Stockton v. Vote, 76 Cal. App. 369, 244 P. 609; 10 Cal. Jur. 338, § 54; 10 R. C. L. 128, § 12. In estimating the market value, any and all purposes to which the land may reasonably be adapted should be considered. Sacramento So. Ry. Co. v. Heil- bron, 156 Cal. 408, 104 P. 979. When the land is so situated that it is reasonably suitable for subdivision purposes into city or town lots which adaptability would enhance its value, that fact should be taken into account in estimating the market value of the tract. But the mere prospective price of lots which might be procured by the sale thereof should not be considered when a subdivision of the tract has not actually been made. City of Los Angeles v. Hughes, 202 Cal. 731, 262 P. 737. There was no error in excluding the map of appellants' proposed subdivision into town lots, which map had not been recorded. No witness was precluded from considering the availability of the land for subdivision purposes in estimating the market value. Mr. Martin testified in behalf of the plaintiff: "I think that the town lots ought to be (worth) probably around $400 an acre." Respecting this issue, the court said: "You can cross examine him on that, of course." No other evidence as to the value of the land for subdivision purposes was offered.

The judgment is affirmed, appellants to recover costs on appeal.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 17, 1930.

1. Trusts ⇐110.

In action to declare trust in real property defendant purchased at foreclosure sale, on theory defendant promised to redeem property for plaintiff, evidence held not to establish trust ex maleficio.

There was evidence that defendant offered plaintiff $1,000 for her equity in place in question, but that she refused and asked him to make loan to enable her to redeem property, but that defendant refused to make loan. There was also evidence that plaintiff knew of defendant's redemption of property and frequently met and talked with defendant thereafter, and appeared to be perfectly friendly and did not charge him with violating alleged agreement to finance her redemption of place.

2. Trusts ⇐110.

To establish trust ex maleficio, fraud must be shown by clear and satisfactory proof.

Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; Edward Henderson, Judge.

Action by Raphaelita Suytar against C. F. Weineke. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Edgar W. Howell, of Ventura, for appellant.

Blackstock & Rogers and Wayne L. Clark, all of Ventura, for respondent.

Mr. Justice ROLFE L. THOMPSON delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an equitable action to declare a trust in real property which was purchased at a foreclosure sale. The respondent is charged with having procured the title by fraud.

The appellant was the owner of a part of lot 39 of the Rancho Santa Ana in Ventura county, consisting of 29.63 acres of farm land. January 17, 1922, she mortgaged the property to the Home Savings Bank of Ventura for $5,000. For default of payments when they became due, a suit for foreclosure was instituted. The mortgagor failed to appear or answer in that suit, and a decree of foreclosure was rendered October 11, 1924, for the sum of $6,406.39. The following month the property was disposed of at sheriff's sale to one Chaffee for the amount of the judgment. Five other judgment creditors of the appellant were made parties defendant in the foreclosure action. These claims were included in the decree of foreclosure, preserving their rights of redemption. Within the period of redemption, the respondent purchased the equity of one of the judgment redemptioners which was duly assigned to him. The property was then redeemed by the respondent on November 9, 1925, through his attorney Clark, pursuant to the provisions of section 702 of the Code of Civil Procedure, for the sum of $7,175.16. A sheriff's deed to the property was executed and delivered to the respondent, who thereupon took possession and made valuable improvements. The appellant had previously abandoned the occupancy of the premises.

This suit was commenced in July, 1927, to establish a trust in the respondent for the benefit of the appellant on the ground that the property was redeemed and acquired by the respondent by means of fraud. It is contended that a trust ex maleficio was thus created by law in favor of Raphaelita Suytar.

The complaint alleges that, prior to the expiration of the time allowed by law for the redemption of the property from the foreclosure sale, the respondent "promised plaintiff that he would loan her the money to make such redemption; that he would take care of the matter and redeem it for her;

 that she need not look elsewhere for help; that he would take her to the sheriff's office in the afternoon of the last day of the period of redemption (so) that she could redeem said property for herself. " It is not alleged that the appellant ever offered to go with the respondent to redeem the property pursuant to his alleged promise to do so. It is not alleged that the appellant could have procured the money elsewhere with which to redeem the property if she had not relied on the foregoing promise of the respondent. There was no offer or tender to compensate the respondent for the money expended in redeeming the property or making the improvements thereon.

The court found that the appellant had complete knowledge at all times of the proceedings for redemption of the property by the respondent; that the respondent did not promise to redeem the property for the appellant or loan her the money with which to do so, and that the respondent did not deceive or defraud her in that regard. Thereupon judgment was rendered to the effect that the appellant take nothing by her action. From this judgment an appeal was perfected.

[1, 2] The appeal is without merit. There is substantial evidence to sustain every necessary finding to support the judgment.

The respondent testified that in December, 1924, after the sheriff's sale of the property in the foreclosure proceedings, he inquired of a real estate agent by the name of Gabbert for a suitable farm to purchase and was then told of the Suytar property, which was quoted at a valuation of about $8,000. He subsequently interviewed the appellant, and in the course of negotiations offered her $1,000 for her equity in the place, which she refused. "Q. Was there anything said at that time about your making a loan to her for the  redemption of it? A. Not a word." He said that subsequently, in July, 1925, "she asked me to make the loan.  I told her I was not in the loaning business. ***"

"Q. Did you ever at any time  offer to loan her the money to redeem this property.  A. Never.  In March  of 1925,  she brought it up again.  I told her that I would be willing to take an assignment and redeem it in my own name,  and I agreed to give her a contract to buy it back at a reasonable profit.  She never accepted it.

"Q. Was there ever a contract made or arrangement reached between you on that basis at all? A. Never."

The respondent went abroad soon after this conversation and did not return until November 5, 1925, which was five days before the equity of redemption expired. During this interval he neither saw nor communicated with the appellant. On the day of his return, the appellant sent for him and again asked him to finance the redemption of the property for her. In reply to this request, he testified:

"I told her absolutely no. * * * I told her it was out of the question, that I couldn't do anything.

"Q. Did you on that occasion, or any occasion say to her or promise her that you would redeem the property for her? A. Never.

"Q. Did you * * * tell her that she should not worry, that you would take care of it for her? A. I did not."

November 9th was the last day upon which the property could be redeemed. About 3 o'clock in the afternoon of that day the respondent consulted with his attorney, Mr. Clark, who informed him that he might purchase the equity of one of the judgment redemptioners and thus redeem the property. The respondent assumed that the appellant could not and would not redeem the property. On the afternoon of the last day authorized, he therefore obtained an assignment of the interest of one of the judgment creditors who was a party to the action and redeemed the property in the name of his attorney. From the time of his last conference with the appellant on November 5th, the respondent did not again see her until after the redemption had been completed. The respondent took title and immediate possession of the property and proceeded to construct and make valuable improvements.

Among the circumstances which persuaded the respondent that it was financially unsafe for him to advance the money to the appellant for the purpose of redeeming the property was that, during her ownership of the premises, the cultivation and improvements had been sadly neglected, and that no part of the interest on the indebtedness nor taxes were paid. The appellant knew of the redemption of the property by the respondent and frequently met and talked with him thereafter. On these occasions she appeared to be perfectly friendly toward him. She did not criticise his purchase of the property and did not charge him with violating the alleged agreement to finance her redemption of the place. The first intimation of a charge by appellant of bad faith or fraud on the part of the respondent was brought to his attention by the filing of the complaint. By her conduct she seemed to acquiesce in his purchase of the place. She visited the premises and talked with him about the improvements. She endeavored to sell to him machinery and household equipment which had been used on the property. Indeed, she apparently anticipated a loss of the place, for prior to respondent's taking possession she abandoned the property and secretly removed a bathtub and certain plumbing.

This suit was not commenced until eighteen months after the redemption of the property. The facts of this case do not establish a trust ex maleficio. They indicate negotiations which did not culminate in an agreement. Fraud must be shown by clear and satisfactory proof. 12 R. C. L. 436, § 183. The evidence in this case falls far short of that requirement. Certainly the findings are amply supported by persuasive testimony.

The judgment is affirmed.

In re McDONNELL'S ESTATE.

FITZGIBBON v. McDONNELL et al.
Civ. 7513.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 2, California.
Nov. 17, 1930.

1. Wills ⇨55(1).

Facts held not to show, or justify inference of, lack of testamentary capacity.

There was evidence that decedent was 72 years of age at execution of will; that he had been sick at times and suffered from various ailments, but that at time will was made, and before and after its date, he was not confined to house. There was evidence that he was parsimonious, ill-tempered, peculiar in dress and manners, solitary in habits of living, unpleasant mentally and physically, and that as a young man he had injured his head. Contestant testified that continuously thereafter he was "insane," but did not further explain, though record disclosed that after accident testator engaged in business and acquired estate disposed of by will.

2. Wills ⇨50.

Mental capacity to understand nature of act, understand and recollect nature and situation of property, and remember and understand relations to persons having claims upon testator's bounty and affected by provisions of will, is sufficient testamentary capacity.

3. Wills ⇨52(1).

Testator's soundness of mind will be presumed.

4. Wills ⇨163(1).

In will contest, undue influence will not be presumed, but must be proven by person alleging fact.

5. Wills ⇨326.

In will contest, contestant not calling at-testing witnesses, nonsuit held not error as to count charging undue influence; no activity by proponent being shown.

6. Wills ⇨166(2).

In absence of evidence that beneficiary was active in procuring will or participating in execution, claim of undue influence arising from confidential relationship is not well founded.

7. Wills ⇨166(1).

Evidence held insufficient to show will was executed under undue influence.

8. Wills ⇨326.

In will contest, where contestant did not make out prima facie case as to lack of testamentary capacity or undue influence, nonsuit held properly granted to proponent.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thomas F. Graham, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of James McDonnell, deceased. Contest by Nora Fitzgibbon to prevent the probate of decedent's will, opposed by James McDonnell, proponent, and others. From a judgment of nonsuit, contestant appeals.

Affirmed.

Dunne, Dunne & Cook, of San Francisco, for appellant.

John J. Barrett and Frank I. Barrett, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J.

James McDonnell died in San Francisco on December 5, 1927. He was a resident of San Francisco and left estate there. He left him surviving as his only heirs two sisters, Ellen McDonnell and Mrs. Nora Fitzgibbon, and seven nieces and nephews, children of a deceased brother. The decedent left a will in which he named James McDonnell, one of his nephews, as executor. The nephew offered the will for probate, and Mrs. Fitzgibbon, one of the sisters, filed a contest. The contest was answered and a trial was had in the trial court before the court sitting with a jury. At the end of the contestant's case the proponent of the will made a motion for a nonsuit. The motion was granted, and, from a judgment entered thereon, the contestant has appealed. In her contest she set forth two counts. In one count she pleaded that the testator was of unsound mind, and in the other count she pleaded that the testator was acting under undue influence. A hearing was had on both counts, and we will discuss the case as made out as to each count in the order stated.

[1-3] As the heirs of decedent were collateral, it may not be said that the will was unnatural. 26 Cal. Jur. 697. There was evidence that at the time the will was made the decedent was seventy-two years of age; that at times he had been sick and had suffered from bladder trouble, dropsical conditions, dizzy spells, and other ailments, but at the time the will was made and before and after that date he was able to be out and was not confined to the house. There was evidence that he was stingy, ill tempered, dictatorial, and repulsive in personal habits. He entertained perverse opinions and unreasonable prejudices. He was peculiar in his dress and manners. He did not associate intimately with his kith or kin or others. There was some evidence that he had a poor memory. He was solitary in his habit of living. He was not a pleasant person mentally or physically. When he was a young man he injured his head. The contestant testified that continuously after that he was "insane." She did not further explain. However, the record discloses that after that accident the decedent came to America, engaged in business, acquired the estate disposed of by the will, invested his moneys in the stock of the First National Bank of San Francisco, or deposited it in savings banks, or loaned it on notes secured by mortgage on real estate. The foregoing facts do not, whether we take them separately or collectively, show that at the time of making his will the decedent did not have sufficient mental capacity to enable him to understand the nature of the act he was doing and to understand and recollect the nature and situation of his property and to remember and understand his relations to the persons who had claims upon his bounty and whose interests were affected by the provisions of that instrument. He had capacity to make a will. Estate of Smith, 200 Cal. 152, 252 P. 325. It will be presumed that the decedent was of sound mind, and no inference to the contrary may be based on the evidence contained in the record.

[4-8] Before proceeding to discuss the second count, it may be helpful to state that the decedent came to this country, located in San Francisco, and engaged in the saloon business. For a time immediately prior to April 18, 1906, his nephew James McDonnell worked for him as barkeeper. After that date the decedent again opened up a place of business, but the nephew did not return to work for him, but opened up a saloon of his own. When the prohibition enactments went into effect both decedent and the nephew retired from the liquor business. About the time the decedent retired from business he went to live in the house of the contestant and paid her $2 a week. From the time the decedent came to San Francisco and down to the date of his death his relations were friendly with his nephew and the nephew acted as a helper in some business transactions. During the same time the decedent made certain loans to his nephew. At the time of the death of the uncle the nephew owed him $21,000 on a promissory note secured by a mortgage on real estate in San Francisco. In the month of June, 1925, the decedent left the home of the contestant and went to reside with a niece, Mrs. Dasmann. The date of that departure does not clearly appear. In one place the contestant said that it was Sunday, May 31, 1925, and at other places she gave other dates, but in one place she stated that it was Sunday, June 22, 1925. Shortly prior to the time the decedent moved out he and the contestant had something of a dispute. We need not pause to state the exact facts in that connection. The contestant stated that she had turned around a street corner and that she saw the decedent step into an automobile driven by James McDonnell. The will was executed according to the face thereof on June 25, 1925. No direct evidence was given by any witness to the effect that any undue influence was exercised by any person or persons over the decedent at the time the will was executed—nor at any other time. The proponent testified that he did not know that a will was to be executed or was executed until after the death of the decedent. Neither of the subscribing witnesses and no other person gave any evidence regarding the execution of the will, the manner in which it was executed, the place at which it was executed, or by whom it was executed. It will not be presumed that a person has exerted undue influence, but it must be proved by the person alleging the fact. The contestant asserts that under certain circumstances undue influence may be inferred. Conceding that that is so, it is sufficient to state that no fact was introduced into evidence on which undue influence can be inferred in the instant case. As the contestant did not call the attesting witnesses, at least as to the count we are now discussing, the trial court did not err in granting the nonsuit. 26 Cal. Jur. 768. In this connection it should be stated that the contestant asserts that the proponent James McDonnell occupied a confidential relationship to the testator, and that, if the will is upheld, the nephew gains an advantage from the testator, and such transactions are presumed to be entered into by the latter without sufficient consideration and under undue influence. The same attack has been made frequently, but where, as here, there is no evidence that the beneficiary was active in procuring the execution of the will or participating in the execution of the will to any extent the claim is not well founded. Estate of Ricks, 160 Cal. 450, 453, 461, 117 P. 532; Estate of Anderson, 185 Cal. 700, 717, 198 P. 407; Estate of Shay, 196 Cal. 355, 237 P. 1079; Estate of Baird, 176 Cal. 381, 382, 384, 385, 168 P. 561. For the reasons stated, we think the contestant did not make out a prima facie case, and that the trial court did not err in granting the motion for a nonsuit.

The judgment is affirmed.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 15, 1930.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court.

Jan. 12, 1931.

1. Malicious prosecution §56.

Plaintiff in action for malicious prosecution must show want of probable cause, as well as malice.

2. Malicious prosecution §32.

In action for malicious prosecution, malice is inferable from want of probable cause.

3. Malicious prosecution §21(1).

In action for malicious prosecution, proof that defendant acted bona fide on counsel's advice, after full and fair disclosure of all facts within his knowledge, constitutes complete defense.

4. Malicious prosecution §71(2, 3).

In action for malicious prosecution, whether prosecution was malicious, or defendant fully and fairly communicated to counsel all material facts within his knowledge, or acted bona fide on advice received, are jury questions.

5. Malicious prosecution §71(2).

In action for malicious prosecution, question of probable cause is for jury, where evidence is conflicting or raises different inferences.

6. Malicious prosecution §64(1).

Evidence held to sustain recovery by tenant, suing for malicious prosecution instituted by landlord for alleged nonpayment of rent (Pen. Code, § 537).

7. Malicious prosecution §64(1).

Plaintiff in action for malicious prosecution could not recover attorney's fees for defending criminal case, in absence of evidence fees were paid or liability incurred.

8. Malicious prosecution ☞69.

$5,000 held not excessive for malicious prosecution; plaintiff being confined in jail for seven hours.

Evidence showed that plaintiff, who was woman of refinement, was confined with six other prisoners, including immoral women and drug addicts, and that her arrest was given considerable publicity in newspapers, causing great humiliation and mental and physical suffering.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by Latane Torney against Chris Petersen. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Modified and affirmed.

Hugh K. McKevitt, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Ford & Johnson and Fletcher A. Cutler, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

This is an action for damages for malicious prosecution. A jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $5,250. A motion for a new trial was denied, and the defendant has appealed from the judgment entered upon the verdict. It is contended that the verdict is unsupported, that the damages awarded were excessive, and that the trial court erred in its instructions to the jury.

The defendant was the owner of an apartment house in San Francisco. In February, 1927, the plaintiff rented a furnished apartment therein for herself and her son, who was about 12 years of age. She agreed to pay therefor a monthly rental of $75 and to make additional payments for electricity, gas, and laundry service. According to her testimony she brought to the apartment wearing apparel for herself and son, with certain toys belonging to the latter. Her former husband was an officer in the regular army, and later an army cot and blankets belonging to the government were sent to the apartment by him and previous to her departure therefrom were openly removed. She occupied the apartment until December 20, 1927, to which date she had paid the defendant the sum of $723.24. During that month she became ill and was advised by physicians to receive treatment at a hospital. The manager of the apartment house visited the apartment before plaintiff left and was advised of her intentions and also of the fact that she was taking certain clothing and other articles with her. When leaving, plaintiff requested that the apartment be held for two days or until she could ascertain the length of time necessary for her to remain away. The manager refused this request, and plaintiff was told that if she wished to keep the apartment she must send notice from the hospital. This notice was not given, and plaintiff was notified that the apartment was not being held for her. She left therein a coat and other garments which the manager later stated in substance that she was holding as security for the rent. The latter visited the plaintiff at the hospital and was informed as to the probable duration of her stay, and was also told that plaintiff would call at the apartment house with regard to the unpaid balance owing for rent. At this time plaintiff surrendered her key to the apartment, another key which she held having been previously surrendered. She remained at the hospital for six weeks, when after telephoning the manager of her intention she removed to a hotel in San Francisco. Thereafter she visited the home of a friend, where she received a letter from defendant which was addressed to the hotel mentioned, inclosing a statement of account. In this she was charged for the rent of the apartment for the time she was in the hospital, the balance claimed being $256.87. Upon receipt of the statement she telephoned the manager disputing the amounts charged, particularly the charge for rent during the period last mentioned. She afterwards went to reside in another hotel in San Francisco where a second statement was rendered for a balance of $327.98, of which the arresting officer demanded payment as the alternative of her being taken into custody. The criminal complaint, which was drawn by an assistant district attorney of the city and county of San Francisco, was sworn to by defendant before a police judge of the municipality, and charged plaintiff with the crime defined in section 537 of the Penal Code, commonly known as defrauding an innkeeper. This complaint alleged in substance that plaintiff with intent to defraud the defendant obtained at his inn, restaurant, and boarding house, food and accommodation without paying therefor; further that having obtained credit and accommodation at his inn and boarding house, she fraudulently absconded and removed her baggage therefrom without paying for her food and accommodation. A warrant was issued thereon and plaintiff was arrested on March 20, 1928. She was confined in the San Francisco city prison from 10 o'clock a. m. to 5 o'clock p. m. of that day when she was released on bail. She was subsequently tried upon the charge and acquitted.

The circumstances attending her arrest and detention were, according to her testimony, as follows: The arresting officer, after demanding payment of the account last rendered, which plaintiff refused, placed her under arrest. Not being dressed for the street she requested permission to change her clothing, which the officer permitted, but insisted on being present. She was then taken to jail and confined in a cell with six other prisoners, among whom were immoral women and drug addicts, whose conduct as she described it was extremely offensive. She further testified that the experience caused her great humiliation and mental distress, and it was shown that the arrest was given considerable publicity in the San Francisco newspapers. According to the defendant he had no personal acquaintance with the plaintiff, but on the day the latter left the apartment and went to the hospital he was advised of the fact. He also knew that after she left the hospital she telephoned his manager with reference to the first statement sent her. He testified that all of the facts were disclosed by him to his attorney and to a deputy district attorney of the city and county, who advised that a prosecution would lie against the plaintiff. Two of the attorneys were unable to recall in detail the statements made to them by the defendant, but they remembered that they were consulted and upon the facts presented advised that a criminal offense had been committed. A third testified that defendant stated that plaintiff left the apartment and went to the hospital with his consent with the understanding, however, that she would return to the apartment, but that he later ascertained that she had taken with her all of her effects of value. The attorney was not told, however, that the bill rendered was disputed or that a second statement differing from the first was rendered, and none of the attorneys testified that defendant made claim that food was furnished or that plaintiff failed to pay for anything other than was set forth in the bills rendered. The manager testified that she was told by plaintiff of her intention to go to the hospital and that she requested that the apartment be held for her; also, that she visited plaintiff at the hospital and there obtained the return of one of the keys to the apartment.

Notwithstanding the allegations of the criminal complaint, it is not contended that plaintiff obtained food at any inn, restaurant, or boarding house conducted by the defendant or failed to pay for anything other than as shown by the statements rendered, which covered rent, gas, electricity, laundry service, charges for cleaning the apartment, and for the breakage and loss of certain household articles.

[1-6] In order to recover, it was incumbent upon the plaintiff to show want of probable cause for the prosecution as well as malice on the part of the defendant. McKenna v. Heinlen, 128 Cal. 97, 60 P. 668. Malice, however, may be inferred from a want of probable cause. Lacey v. Porter, 103 Cal. 597, 37 P. 635. For the purpose of justifying a prosecution alleged to have been malicious and without probable cause, a defendant may show that before commencing the prosecution he was advised by counsel after a full and fair disclosure of all the facts within his knowledge that a crime had been committed, and that he acted upon the advice in good faith. Johnson v. Southern Pacific Co., 157 Cal. 333, 107 P. 611. This has been said to be an affirmative defense, by way of confession and avoidance (16 Cal. Jur., Malicious Prosecution, § 11, p. 742), and if proved will constitute a complete defense to the action (Griswold v. Griswold, 143 Cal. 617, 77 P. 672). Whether the prosecution was malicious (Lacey v. Porter, supra) or a party has fully and fairly communicated to counsel all the material facts which he knew (Seabridge v. McAdam, 108 Cal. 345, 41 P. 409) or acted in good faith upon the advice received (Potter v. Seale, 8 Cal. 217; Ball v. Rawles, 93 Cal. 222, 28 P. 937, 27 Am. St. Rep. 174; Murphy v. Davids, 181 Cal. 706, 186 P. 143) are questions for the jury. And where on the question of probable cause the evidence is conflicting, or different inferences might be drawn from the evidence, it is the province of the jury to determine whether or not the facts sustain an inference of probable cause. Franzen v. Shenk, 192 Cal. 572, 221 P. 932. Here the evidence was such that these questions were properly submitted to the jury, and we are satisfied from the facts and circumstances shown that their implied findings thereon are fully sustained.

[7] Defendant complains of an instruction that the jury might consider the reasonable value of the services of plaintiff's attorney in defending the criminal prosecution, not exceeding, however, the amount of damages asked in that connection, namely, $250. As defendant contends, there was no evidence that any attorney's fees were paid or a liability therefor in that or any amount was incurred by plaintiff in the proceeding. And it is evident from the amount of damages allowed by the jury, namely, $5,250, that the above claim was included therein.

The jury was also instructed as follows: "If you find from the evidence that the refusal of plaintiff to pay the bill presented to her by defendant for accommodation at the Marianna apartments was made in good faith and because she had not agreed to pay rent for the apartment while she was in the hospital and that such claim was known to the defendant and that it was made under such circumstances as would lead a reasonable person to believe that it was made in good faith and if you further find that the defendant instituted the prosecution of plaintiff maliciously with intent to compel plaintiff to pay said bill to escape said prosecution, you may find a verdict for plaintiff even though you are unable to determine the merit of such bill." As urged by defendant, the instruction ignores the element of probable cause. This, however, was fully covered in other instructions wherein the jury was charged that, before she could recover, plaintiff must prove that defendant prosecuted the criminal action both maliciously and without probable cause.

[8] It is further contended that the damages allowed were excessive and that the same appear to have been awarded under the influence of passion and prejudice. With the exception of the amount which appears to have been allowed for attorney's fees alleged to have been incurred in defending the criminal action, we cannot say that the damages awarded were excessive. The plaintiff was shown to be a woman of refinement, and considering the indignities to which she was subjected, the amount was not more than commensurate with her mental and physical sufferings. Moreover, her physical condition at the time as described by her physician was such that the experience was reasonably calculated to have the effect claimed by her.

The evidence was sufficient to support the verdict, and with the exception of the erroneous allowance of attorney's fees, which will require a modification of the judgment to that extent, the record discloses no error which would justify a reversal. The judgment is accordingly modified by deducting therefrom the sum of $250, and as so modified is affirmed. It is further ordered that appellant recover his costs on appeal.

STELLA et al. v. SMITH.

Civ. 4089.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

Nov. 8, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 8, 1930.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court.
Jan. 5, 1931.

1. Sales ⇨391(1).

Buyers of grapes advancing money on contract were entitled on breach of contract by seller to recover amount advanced.

2. Sales ⇨197.

Agreement to purchase grape crop constituted contract to sell rather than a sale.

The agreement provided that seller was to sell to buyer all grapes of 1927 crop, at a price of $42.50 per ton, to be delivered at certain station at seller's cost, purchaser to furnish boxes in proper season, all grapes to pass government sugar test for shipping.

3. Sales ⇨266, 272.

Statutory warranties of soundness and merchantability were not implied in respect to sale of grapes in existence at time sale was made (Civ. Code, § 1768).

4. Sales ⇨48.

Buyer of grapes under agreement to purchase total crop had right to reject them if they were so picked and packed as to violate law (St. 1927, p. 1845).

5. Sales ⇨396.

Buyer of grapes, in order to rely upon right to reject them as picked and packed in violation of law, must have so pleaded.

6. Sales ⇨150(2).

Seller of grapes under agreement requiring him to pick grapes and deliver them for shipment was obligated to pick grapes with reasonable care and use ordinary care to avoid injury.

7. Sales ⇨396.

Complaint to recover amount advanced on agreement to purchase grape crop was sufficient, as respected buyer's breach for failure to pick grapes in proper manner.

The complaint, in addition to setting forth the contract for purchase of grapes and payment of amount advanced thereon, stated that defendant refused and failed to deliver grapes according to the terms of agreement and asked that he be required to repay the amount advanced.

8. Evidence ⇨571(6).

Opinion of witness with 20 years' experience in packing and shipping grapes, respecting condition of grapes, was entitled to weight.

9. Sales ⇨181(12).

Evidence supported finding, in buyer's action to recover amount advanced on contract to purchase grape crop, that grapes were unfit for shipping.

10. Evidence ⇨383(4).

Certificates by state and federal authority that grapes were fit for shipment, though competent evidence on such question, were not conclusive (St. 1927, p. 946).

11. Appeal and error ⇨1011(1).

Finding of trial court on conflicting evidence with substantial evidence to support it will not be disturbed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sutter County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Action by Genaro A. Stella and others against E. C. Smith. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Newton A. Johnson and Harris, Willey, Griffith & Harris, all of Fresno, for appellant.

Erling S. Norby, of Marysville, for respondents.

Mr. Justice pro tem. SHIELDS delivered the opinion of the court.

On August 20, 1927, the plaintiff, doing business under the name of Nuestro Fruit Company, entered into a contract with the defendant Smith for the purchase of grapes. Their agreement was sought to be expressed by a brief writing, which provided that E. C. Smith, the defendant, agreed "to sell to the Nuestro Fruit Company, of Yuba City, Calif., all the tons of Zinfandel grapes, 1927 crop, at a price of $42.50 per ton; to deliver grapes at Alamendra Station on the Sacramento Northern Railway at his own cost; purchaser to furnish boxes in proper season; all grapes must pass Government sugar test for shipping, second crops Zinfandels included." Plaintiffs paid to the defendant $2,000 as an advance on the purchase price of the grapes. One carload of the grapes was delivered, and accepted and paid for by plaintiffs. Immediately thereafter a large quantity of grapes, about one thousand lug boxes, were tendered by defendant in further performance of his contract. Plaintiffs refused to receive them, claiming that they were unfit for shipment, and that they did not satisfy the terms of the contract between the parties. Much correspondence followed between the parties which need not be particularly referred to herein. Defendant sold the grapes to other parties, and plaintiffs began this action to recover the $2,000 previously paid to the defendant, this sum having been intended to be applied to the payment for the grapes which plaintiffs refused to receive. By a previous telegram and letter the plaintiffs had notified defendant that because of what they called his breach of the contract they regarded the contract at an end and they demanded of defendant the return of this $2,000 prepayment.

[1] If plaintiffs were correct in their contention that defendant had breached his contract, they were entitled to this remedy. "An action for money had and received, to recover money paid under a valid contract" can be maintained where it can be shown "that the defendant has been guilty of a breach thereof." 17 Cal. Jur. 614.

Plaintiffs' complaint was in three counts, the first of which, while informal, was substantially for money had and received. The remaining two counts were based upon the contract, and recognized its existence. At the trial, however, plaintiffs abandoned their second and third causes of action and elected to proceed upon the cause of action first stated. At the trial plaintiffs proposed to show that the grapes as tendered did not comply with the requirements of the contract in that they were soft, mouldy, and that mixed with them in the boxes were leaves, stems, green grapes, and litter, and that, as a consequence, they were unfit for shipment. To such evidence the defendant made much general objection.

[2-5] The case seems to have been tried with some confusion as to the issues. Plaintiff in his complaint, after setting forth the contract, and the payment of the $2,000 above mentioned, simply states, in reference to the grapes agreed to be delivered, that "defendant refused and failed to deliver said grapes according to the terms of said agreement," and asked that he be required to repay the $2,000. It will be seen that plaintiffs did not indicate in what particular defendant so failed. So far as the pleading was concerned, the court was left in doubt as to whether the crop of grapes as they matured were not merchantable, or whether they were so improperly picked and packed that they were not fit for shipment, or whether he relied upon the theory that the grapes as packed and offered for delivery failed to comply with the requirements of the "California Fruit, Nut, and Vegetable Standardization Act of 1927." St. 1927, p. 1845. But by elimination the theory upon which it could properly have been tried is easily determined. It could not have been maintained upon the theory first above mentioned. The contract herein was not a sale; it was a contract to sell. The subject of the sale was in existence at the time the sale was made, and as a consequence the warranties of soundness and merchantability provided by section 1768, Civil Code, were not implied. So if the crop of grapes, as grown, had been properly picked and tendered to plaintiffs in the condition in which it had matured, they would have been bound to have accepted them. Kenney v. Grogan, 17 Cal. App. 527, 120 P. 433; Carpenter v. Grogan, 18 Cal. App. 505, 123 P. 538. The complaint makes no objection to the crop, which was the subject of the contract as the same was grown and matured upon the vines. It is likewise true that, if the grapes were so picked and packed as to violate the requirements of the Standardization Act above referred to, they might properly have been rejected. MacRae v. Heath, 60 Cal. App. 64, 212 P. 228. But it would seem that, if this were the ground upon which plaintiffs refused to accept the grapes, they should have so pleaded in their complaint, and the court should have found the facts of such violation. Neither of these things were done, and thus the third theory suggested above may be disregarded. This leaves the second theory announced above; that the grapes were so picked and packed as to violate the contract and to justify the plaintiffs in rejecting them. We will inquire as to whether or not this question was involved and was put in issue.

[6-8] Under the contract here defendant was to pick the grapes and to deliver them for shipment to the plaintiffs. This obligated defendant to pick the grapes with reasonable care and skill and to take ordinary care to avoid injuring or destroying them. If they were not so picked, or picked in such a manner that when tendered to plaintiffs they were unfit for shipment, plaintiffs could properly have rejected them, and could then have maintained this action. The complaint herein does not in terms declare upon this alleged breach of the contract. But it is broad enough to include it, and the action was tried upon the theory that the fitness for shipment of the grapes was the question in issue. This appears very clearly from the entire record, but specifically from a statement by defendant in his closing brief, where he says: "It is not and never has been our position that the sole duty resting on us in order to comply with the terms of the contract was to furnish grapes of the specified sugar content. We have always recognized that there are certain provisions as to quality which the law implies. One of these is that the grapes must be fit for shipment." So the question of soundness and merchantability of the fruit as picked and tendered became substantially the only issue in the case and this question was very thoroughly tried. The trial court found that the grapes "were unfit for shipping, in that said grapes when so tendered were mouldy, and were mixed with leaves and stems, green grapes and other refuse." It will be noted that it is not found in terms that the picking and packing of the grapes was so improperly or negligently done as to violate the contract. But from the facts found it conclusively appears that it was in the character of the picking and packing of the grapes that the breach occurred, and not in the character of the crop, as in the cases of Kenney v. Grogan, and Carpenter v. Grogan, supra. If this finding, therefore, is supported by substantial evidence, it must be accepted, no matter how convincing the evidence to the contrary may have been. In support of the finding the record discloses the testimony of a number of witnesses called on behalf of the plaintiffs. Genaro Stella, one of the plaintiffs, testified that when defendant's employees started to pick the second carload of grapes (the ones which were rejected) "they were picking everything that was on the vines, green, and water bearing and mouldy and everything that was on the vines." He was asked to "estimate" what per cent. of mildew grapes were in the boxes. He replied, "Every box there was five or six or seven pounds of mildew grapes or mouldy grapes." Asked as to the condition of the other grapes, he replied: "The water bearing were all cracked and running out, they were really wet." Objection is now made that the "estimate" of the witness is no more than a guess and does not constitute evidence. No objection was made to the question at the time it was asked, nor was any objection made to the competency of the witness, nor to the lack of foundation laid. The answer might well be considered the statement of a fact. But if an opinion, the witness being presumptively competent after twenty years in packing and shipping grapes to express one, his opinion was entitled to such weight as the court saw fit to give it. Another witness testified that he examined fifty or more of the boxes of grapes, and that every one of them had mouldy grapes in them. Another stated that he examined eight or ten of the boxes and that he "found a lot of soft grapes among them, mostly in the bottom, and some mould in them." The witness Strange testified that he examined forty or fifty boxes, "and there were many soft grapes in them, and some mouldy ones." He further testified that he found this condition scattered through the boxes, and that each box contained some soft grapes and some mouldy ones. Helen Stella, another of the plaintiffs, testified that she observed the condition of the grapes tendered for acceptance. She said that there were quite a number of mouldy and cracked berries in each box that she looked at. Asked to estimate the probable percentage of mould that was in each box, she answered again, without objection, "Anywhere from five to six per cent, and some as high as seven per cent of bad grapes." The grapes were purchased for shipping. The contract itself shows this; they were to pass "the Government sugar test for shipping." They were to be delivered in boxes at a railway station. It was testified that defendant had been told that the grapes were to have been shipped "back East."

They clearly should have been picked with a view to this condition. Packed as they were, the plaintiff Stella testified: "If you put water-bearing grapes in the box, it cracks and heats up, and all the box gets in one mash, and mush up."

[9] Clearly, if this evidence were believed, over conflicting and contrary evidence, it was sufficient upon which to found the finding announced by the court. At the trial defendant introduced a number of certificates issued by state and federal authority under the provisions of the "California Fruit and Vegetable Certification Act". Stats. 1927, p. 946. These certificates set forth that the grapes were fit for shipment under the conditions prescribed by the Standardization Act above mentioned. But this, as we have seen, was not the issue here. The issue was whether or not the grapes had been picked and packed in a reasonably careful manner and in such a way as to be fit for shipment, as required by the contract.

[10, 11] Undoubtedly these certificates were competent evidence upon this question. But they were not conclusive. By the very terms of the statute under which they were issued they are made only prima facie evidence of the facts certified. Unquestionably they make a most impressive showing. But the rule that where there is a conflict in the evidence, and where there is substantial evidence to support it, the finding of the trial court will not be disturbed, is too old and too well settled for us to disregard it.

The judgment is, accordingly, affirmed.

HARRIS v. STATE INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al.
Civ. 7463.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California.

Nov. 24, 1930.

Master and servant ☞376(2).

Employee sustaining injury causing hernia held entitled to disability indemnity in addition to compensation for operation as against contention injury merely accentuated previous hernial condition.

The Industrial Accident Commission denied compensation for loss of time on theory that strain to which claimant had been subjected caused merely an accentuation of his previous hernial condition. Claimant testified without contradiction that he had never had any hernia before accident, nor any indications of one. Industrial Accident Commission had previously made study of medical aspects of hernia, and on basis of information gathered had concluded that hernia would not occur, especially when incurred under circumstances of apparently slight strain, unless there was pre-existing weakness of the peritoneal sac. However, there was no evidence in record setting forth these medical aspects of the case.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Law by William J. Harris, claimant, opposed by the City of Monterey Park, employer. The Industrial Accident Commission awarded only part of compensation claimed, and claimant brings certiorari.

Award annulled.

P. O. Gunness, of Monterey Park, for petitioner.

Edward O. Allen, of San Francisco, for respondent Industrial Accident Commission.

WORKS, P. J.

Petitioner was an employee of the city of Monterey Park. According to his testimony, he and others "were putting in a fire hydrant joint. Had it all coupled together, probably three or four hundred pounds of pipe, and I was down in the ditch, and I had a bar running in under the hydrant and pipe, * * * and in slipping it over the bank toward the edge of the bank, the bank caved in, and the bar moved, it [evidently the hydrant and pipe] slipped right down the bar, * * * [and] I had to hold it." He further testified that he then said "to the boys" that he "got an awful strain," and that he felt a "little stinging sensation" in the right groin. It later developed that he was afflicted with a hernia. He testified that he had never had a hernia before the incident we have described, nor any indications of one, and this evidence went undisputed.

At the hands of the respondent Industrial Accident Commission, petitioner was allowed compensation in the form of a surgical operation to correct the hernia, but was denied compensation for the loss of time involved in his troubles upon the theory that the strain to which he had been subjected caused merely an accentuation of a previous hernial condition. He asks that the award be annulled to the end, if we determine that he is entitled to it, that he be allowed compensation also for time lost.

At the oral argument the counsel for the Industrial Accident Commission said: "He was operated on at the expense of the insurance company, and it was found to be a fresh hernia; that is, there were no adhesions indicating that it was of long standing. And there is no doubt but that the man felt that he had never had hernia, or anything resembling hernia, in his life before. My reason for wishing to make a distinction between making full compensation and allowing an operation only is that the Commission has long ago made a thorough study of the medical aspects of hernia, and on the basis of information gathered from professional sources they have concluded that a hernia will not occur, especially when it is incurred under circumstances of apparently slight strain, unless there is a pre-existing weakness of the peritoneal sac. * * * And we admit that there was no evidence in the record setting forth these medical aspects of the case, as there was in the Bige Case [referring to Bige v. Industrial Accident Commission (Cal. App.) 287 P. 577], the reason therefor being that the Commission has so many of these cases that it had forgotten to complete the record in this case."

The following colloquy then occurred:

"Presiding Justice Works: We understood from the argument advanced in support of the petition that the only point is that the record on its face does not sustain any such finding. Justice Thompson suggests the question as to whether or not that assembled information which the Commission has can be used under those circumstances.

"Mr. Allen: That is a question also, and we admit that readily. All that I wanted to make clear was that this inferior tribunal has so many of this very same kind of cases before it that it sometimes slips up when it should have completed the record.

"Presiding Justice Works: If we should follow you on that question we should have to assume that this strain to which the man was subjected in lifting the pipe was so slight that it justified the Commission in relying upon that information that it had assembled, and we would also have to assume that it had assembled that information.

"Mr. Allen: Yes."

Under the circumstances thus disclosed we think petitioner was entitled to compensation for disability indemnity in addition to the compensation by operation. Singer v. Industrial Accident Commission (Cal. App.) 287 P. 567.

Award annulled.

We concur: CRAIG, J.; IRA F. THOMPSON, J.

HARTFORD v. SILVERMAN et al.
Civ. 6024.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division I, California.

Nov. 17, 1930.

Automobiles ¶160(1).

Motorist obstructing sidewalk at night, refusing to move, may be liable to pedestrian, slipping on curb when attempting to walk around automobile.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Clair S. Tappaan, Judge.

Action by Louise Hartford against Sam Silverman and another. A judgment for defendants in the municipal court was affirmed on appeal to the superior court, and, from such judgments, plaintiff appeals.

Appeal from municipal court dismissed, and judgment of superior court reversed.

Collamer A. Bridge, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Joe Crider, Jr., and Elber H. Tilson, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HOUSER, J.

The action upon which the appeal herein is predicated was originally brought in the municipal court of the city of Los Angeles. Among other things, the complaint therein contained a statement of the following facts, to-wit: At night, in the city of Los Angeles, plaintiff was lawfully walking on a public sidewalk, at which time and on which occasion one of the defendants (who was the minor son of the other defendant) was seated in an automobile of which he was in charge and which automobile was parked and stopped upon said sidewalk in such manner as to obstruct the passage of plaintiff upon said sidewalk; and that, although requested by plaintiff to do so, said defendant refused "to propel said vehicle into the driveway * * * and thereby render it possible for plaintiff to proceed along said sidewalk." Thereupon it became and was necessary "for plaintiff to walk around said automobile in the vicinity of the curb line * * * and that in so doing and while using due care and caution in that behalf, plaintiff was caused to fall violently to the pavement by reason of the fact that one of her feet slipped or became caught in a portion of said driveway or curb which plaintiff had been unable to see and discover by reason of the darkness, and notwithstanding the fact that she was proceeding in a careful and cautious manner around said automobile." As a result of the injury thus received by plaintiff, she suffered certain damages, etc. The demurrer of defendants to the complaint upon the ground that it failed to state a cause of action was sustained by the judge of the municipal court without leave to amend the complaint, and judgment was thereupon rendered in favor of defendants. On appeal to the superior court, the judgment theretofore rendered in the municipal court was affirmed. It is from such judgments that the appeal herein is taken.

Although the decisions by the appellate courts of this state with reference to the liability of defendants in circumstances analogous to those which have been hereinbefore set forth are by no means harmonious or consistent one with the other, it is believed that the weight of authority sustains the conclusion that, assuming the existence of the facts as stated in the complaint herein, a jury would be justified in returning a verdict in favor of plaintiff. *McKune v. PHILLIPS v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY.

Civ. 7537.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California.

Nov. 18, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 9, 1930.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court.

Jan. 12, 1931.

1. Receivers $\S$ 56.

One not party to action in which receiver was appointed for corporation would not seem to be in position to ask that receivership be restrained.

2. Prohibition $\S$ 17.

Before seeking prohibition to stay contempt proceeding, petitioner must first present claim to lower court.

Petition did not show that petitioner had called attention of court below to his claim that such court was acting in contempt proceeding without jurisdiction by reason of alleged invalidity of orders appointing receiver, and petitioner's remedy was to first present his defense to lower court upon hearing of contempt proceeding.

Application by M. G. Phillips for writ of prohibition prayed to be directed to the Superior Court in and for Los Angeles County, William C. Doran, Judge, to restrain enforcement of an order appointing a receiver.

Writ denied.

Cooper & Collings, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Holbrook, Taylor & Tarr & Horton, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

ARCHBALD, Justice pro tem.

The petitioner asks a peremptory writ of prohibition restraining respondents from enforcing or carrying into effect an order appointing a receiver for the Stock & Realty Assurance Corporation, and also from proceeding in a matter wherein petitioner was cited to appear before respondent to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt in taking from the possession of the receiver so appointed the sum of $185.35 and for preventing said receiver from taking possession of the books and records of said corporation, of which petitioner is alleged to have been president.

The petition alleges the corporate existence of said Stock & Realty Assurance Corporation under the laws of the state of Nevada and its authorization to do business in this state; that "for a period of one month last past petitioner has been president of said corporation" and one of its directors; that on July 25, 1930, on complaint filed against said corporation, on an ex parte application respondent court made an order appointing A. D. McLeod receiver of said corporation, which order was amended July 28, 1930, on ex parte application to said court and an order was also made directing the sheriff of Los Angeles county to assist said receiver in taking possession of all the assets, books and papers of said corporation; that by virtue of said assistance said receiver took possession and now has the control of said assets, books, and papers. It is further alleged that, in making the order appointing said receiver, said court acted in excess of its jurisdiction, in that no cause of action existed for the appointment of a receiver; that, by reason thereof, petitioner refused to turn over the "books, assets and property of said corporation to said receiver, and that on or about August 1, 1930, petitioner was served with said order to show cause why he should not be punished therefor for contempt. It is further alleged that petitioner "is not a party to said action, except as an officer of said corporation," that said corporation has demurred to said complaint and also moved to vacate and set aside the order appointing receiver, and that said motion and demurrer were argued before respondent Hon. William C. Doran, "who took the same under advisement and has not decided same." The petition was filed herein on August 11, 1930. There is also an allegation in said petition that said court is "illegally and unlawfully proceeding to exercise its jurisdiction and to cite and threaten to punish your petitioner for contempt." There is also the bare allegation that "petitioner has no plain, speedy or adequate remedy at law."

[1] Petitioner not being a party to the action in which the receiver was appointed would not seem to be in a position to ask that the receivership should be restrained, and the corporation itself has taken the proper steps to raise the validity of such appointment before the court making it.

[2] So far as the contempt proceeding against petitioner is concerned, the petition does not show that he has in any way called the attention of the court below to his claim that such court is acting in such proceeding without jurisdiction by reason of the alleged invalidity of the orders appointing said receiver, and the authorities hold that the remedy in such a case is for petitioner to first present his defense to the lower court upon the hearing of the contempt proceeding. Wessels v. Superior Court, 200 Cal. 403, 253 P. 135; Southern Pacific R. R. Co. v. Superior Court, 59 Cal. 471, 475; Chester v. Colby, 52 Cal. 516.

The Supreme Court in the case of Commercial Bank v. Superior Court, 192 Cal. 395, 397, 220 P. 422, 423, in laying down the rule above mentioned, also uses the following language: "However, the trial of contempt proceedings has sometimes been stayed by a writ of prohibition where it is manifest from previous orders or decisions of the court that it will proceed notwithstanding a lack of jurisdiction." Such a situation is not shown by the petition filed herein, and the petition shows on its face that petitioner has a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the trial court, which must be taken before application for a writ of prohibition is made here.

The peremptory writ of prohibition is denied.

BEYER v. CARRASCO et al.
Civ. 6120.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 1, California.
Nov. 21, 1930.

1. Appeal and error ⇨965.

Order granting change of venue should not be reversed, in absence of clear abuse of discretion.

2. Venue ⇨52(1).

Court's discretion in granting change of venue for convenience of witnesses in action on administrator's bond, which arose in county to which action was transferred, held not abused.

It appeared from defendant's affidavit in support of the motion for a change of venue that not only the convenience of witnesses warranted the change of venue, but that certain books in the possession of the deputy state superintendent of banks in the county to which venue was transferred would be introduced in evidence. Plaintiff's stipulation to all the evidence indicated by defendant's affidavit contained several conditions which substantially weakened the effect of the stipulation.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Clair S. Tappaan, Judge.

Action by Emma Mina Beyer against Cris Carrasco, as administrator of the estate of Fred Burkhardt, deceased, and another. From an order granting motion for change of venue, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Hugo Platz and J. M. Chatterson, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Joe Crider, Jr., and Clarence B. Runkle, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

YORK, J.

Plaintiff and appellant has appealed from an order of the superior court of Los Angeles county granting a motion for a change of venue to the county of Inyo, on the ground of the convenience of witnesses. The objection of the plaintiff is set forth in the objection filed by appellant in the lower court to the motion for change of venue, which objection also contained a notice of counter motion to retain the cause in Los Angeles county, on the ground of convenience of witnesses, and on the further ground of disqualification of the judge of Inyo county by reason of his interest in said action, and that the ends of justice will not be promoted by such a change.

This counter motion was presented upon the affidavit of one of the attorneys for plaintiff and upon stipulation of the plaintiff as to what the testimony of defendants' witnesses would be.

The affidavit of the attorney for defendant and respondent, filed in support of defendant's motion for a change of venue, recites the fact that the plaintiff's cause of action is based upon the alleged liability of the defendant Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland as surety upon the official bond of the public administrator of the county of Inyo; that all of the transactions involved in the cause occurred in the county of Inyo; that certain persons are necessary and material witnesses, and that said defendant intends to call each one of same at the trial of said cause, and that they are each and all residents of Inyo county; that the plaintiff is not a resident of the state of California, as shown by her complaint, and that a change of the place of the trial cannot work a hardship or inconvenience upon the plaintiff; that the defendant Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland is sued herein as surety, and that the person primarily liable to plaintiff, if any, is the defendant Carrasco, a resident of the county of Inyo, and that, notwithstanding the dismissal of the defendant Carrasco filed herein by the plaintiff, Carrasco is the person primarily interested in the defense of this action, and will be liable to reimburse the defendant Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland for any judgment rendered against and paid by the defendant corporation; that certain books and records of the Inyo County Bank at Bishop, in the county of Inyo, are in the custody of a special deputy state superintendent of banks in charge of liquidation of the Inyo County Bank; that it is necessary for the defendants in presenting their defense to use the books and records of the county treasurer of the county of Inyo and the books and records of the Inyo County Bank.

The principal point made by appellant on this appeal is that she has stipulated to all of the evidence indicated by respondent's affidavit. The record does not disclose that such a stipulation has been filed. The stipulation that has been filed is a qualified stipulation, which contains several conditions which substantially weaken the effect of the stipulation.

[1, 2] Unless there is a clear abuse of discretion by the trial court, the order should not be reversed. A careful examination of the record fails to disclose any ground for appellant to claim that there was any such abuse of discretion by the trial court.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

Damages in death cases is pecuniary loss which circumstances establish with reasonable certainty will be suffered by beneficiary of statute because of death of victim.

2. Appeal and error ☞932(1).

On appeal from judgment awarding one dollar damages for death of son, it is assumed that jury determined father would not suffer pecuniary damages.

3. Death ☞77.

Evidence sustained finding that father, separated from wife, did not suffer pecuniary damage from death of son supported by mother.

Evidence disclosed that wife left husband's home in 1925, leaving three children with husband, that husband commenced action for divorce which was never carried out, that wife returned in 1926 for about three weeks, and then left, taking three children with her, that husband saw family only once until 1927 when one son was killed, and that mother supported children with aid of what little money children themselves earned.

Father had burden of proving by preponderance of evidence that he was reasonably certain to suffer pecuniary injury by death of child.

5. Death ☞24.

Father could not recover for death of child injured by negligence of mother having custody of child with father's consent.

W. H. Stammer, of Fresno, for respondents.

DOOLING, Justice pro tem.

In this action by a father for the death of his ten year old son the jury brought in a verdict for the plaintiff for $1. Plaintiff made a motion for new trial, which was denied, and now prosecutes this appeal from the judgment.

On November 11, 1927, mother and son were both killed when an automobile driven by the mother was struck by a railroad train operated by respondents.

In order to pass intelligently upon appellant's claim that the damages allowed are clearly inadequate under the evidence, it is necessary to sketch briefly the fact picture that was before the trial court and jury. Largely from appellant's own testimony it appears that some time in 1925 his wife, who was the mother of his three children, departed from appellant's home in San Jose, leaving the three children with him. Appellant commenced an action for divorce in which he asked for the custody of the children. This action was never carried beyond the point of filing the complaint. Some time in May or June, 1926, appellant's wife returned to his home for about three weeks, and at the end of that time again departed and took the three children with her. This, he testified, was without his consent. From that time until November, 1927, when the boy was killed, appellant saw his family only once. This was some time in 1927 in Sacramento. At this time appellant gave the mother and son each some money, amount not stated. The mother promised to come home some time before Christmas, and appellant went back to San Jose and rented a house in which to receive them. During the year and a half that they were away from him the mother supported the children with the aid of what little money the children themselves earned.

[1-4] The measure of damages in death cases is the pecuniary loss which the circumstances of the particular case establish with reasonable certainty will be suffered by the beneficiary of the statute because of the death of the victim. Bond v. United Railroads, 159 Cal. 270, 277, 113 P. 366, 48 L. R. A. (N. S.) 687, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 50. We must assume on appeal that the jury in arriving at its verdict determined that the evidence did not establish with reasonable certainty that any pecuniary damage would be suffered by appellant from the death of his son, and that on the motion for new trial the trial court concluded that the evidence was sufficient to support this determination of the jury. We cannot hold under the evidence above summarized that this was error. It was incumbent upon appellant to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that pecuniary injury was reasonably certain to be suffered by him from the death of his child. The jury may well have concluded from the facts before them that father and son were so little interested in one another that there was no reasonable certainty that the continued life of the son would be of any pecuniary value to the father. Dean v. Oregon R. & N. Co., 38 Wash. 565, 80 P. 842.

[5] Appellant complains of certain instructions that, if the jury found that the mother was negligent, and that the mother's negligence proximately contributed to the death of the son, appellant could not recover. Appellant claims that the rule of Keena v. United Railroads, 57 Cal. App. 124, 207 P. 35, does not apply because the mother took the son without the father's consent. The father's testimony that he saw the family in 1927 in Sacramento, at which time the mother agreed to come home before Christmas, disposes of this contention. Whatever may have been the situation theretofore, it appears that from that time forth the mother's custody of the children was with the consent of appellant. The conduct of the son and the question of whether or not he was sui juris do not properly enter into this case. If the mother was negligent and thereby injured the child, the father's recovery is barred because she represented the community. The legal situation is no different than it would have been had the mother or the father negligently run over and killed the son.

[6, 7] It was proper to instruct the jury that they should take into consideration the fact that plaintiff was legally bound to provide for, maintain, clothe, and educate his child through minority. Metcalf v. Romano, 83 Cal. App. 508, 515, 257 P. 114. The jury, in our opinion, could not have been misled in view of the instructions as a whole by the addition of the words to this instruction "and that during such minority the child would have been a source of expense to the plaintiff." These words followed and were limited by the preceding portion of the instruction so that the jury must have understood them to mean that to the extent that plaintiff was legally bound to support and provide for his child during minority the child would be a source of expense. The instruction was inartificially drawn, and it would have been better had the language complained of been omitted, but we do not believe that the jury could have misinterpreted it.

Judgment affirmed.

LACOE v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF DIVISION OF INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENTS AND SAFETY et al.

S. F. 13841.

Supreme Court of California.

Nov. 28, 1930.

Master and servant ☞363.

Farm employee's injuries, received while trimming tree, held sustained while employed as gardener and not as household domestic worker, and hence compensable (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 4749, § 69(a); Deering's Gen. Laws Consol. Supp. 1925-1927, Act 4749a, § 1).

The evidence disclosed that the farm employee and his wife were employed on the farm, that the wife was to attend to housework, and the employee was to perform other farm services, such as putting in crop, garden work, carpenter work, trimming trees, and taking care of the horses, and that, shortly after employee was hired, while attempting to cut off a limb of a tree, he fell from tree and was injured.

LANGDON, J.

This is a petition by an employer to review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission awarding compensation to an employee.

R. D. Lacoe, the employer and petitioner herein, was the owner of a 30-acre tract of land in San Diego county. Part of the property was occupied by a residence, an employee's house and a garden. The rest was devoted to agricultural purposes. John Swanson and his wife were hired as general caretakers. Mrs. Swanson was to do the housework and John Swanson the outside work. In the latter's testimony we find the following statement: "My duties were to do farm work, put in the crop when it was the season, and do garden work, and carpenter work which was specified, and that was what I had been doing mostly, carpenter work and trimming trees and taking care of horses." Lacoe testified that he hired Swanson and his wife because he wanted somebody to take care of the place, so that when he came there "it would be running," and "of course that necessitated making a garden and cleaning up the place, and also there was work that would be necessary on it, like all country homes." He wanted Swanson to build fences, trim trees and brush, and, in short, "to do anything that I do."

Shortly after he was hired, while attempting to cut off a limb of a tree, Swanson fell from the tree and was injured. The commission found that the applicant, "while employed * * * as a gardener * * * sustained injury arising out of and in the course of said employment, * * *" and made an award of compensation.

Certain employments are expressly excluded from the benefits of the Workmen's Compensation Act, although a procedure is provided by which the employer and employee thus excluded may jointly elect to come within the act. Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act, § 70; Deering's Gen. Laws, Act 4749, p. 1755. Prior to 1927, among the excluded employments were "farm, dairy, agricultural, viticultural or horticultural labor." Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act § 8(a). In 1927, these types of employment were to a large extent brought within the act by the following amendment: "Any employer and his employees engaged in farm, dairy, agricultural, viticultural or horticultural employments or in stock or poultry raising, not subject to the compensation provisions of the 'Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act of 1917,' as amended, shall, from and after the date this act takes effect, be conclusively presumed to have accepted the compensation provisions of said act and amendments thereto and to have included in their contract of hire or apprenticeship, express or implied, a mutual agreement to accept said provisions, unless either such employer or employee shall, prior to the occurrence of any injury have given notice of rejection of said provisions of said act in the manner herein provided."

Deering's Gen. Laws, Consol. Supp., Act 4749a, p. 1480.

No notice of rejection was given by the employer or the employee in the instant case. The amendment, however, does not cover the excluded employment of "household domestic service," nor was any election to come within the act made in the instant case. The issue is therefore clearly presented. If Swanson was engaged in agricultural or horticultural labor at the time of his injury, he is entitled to compensation; but, if he was engaged in "household domestic service," he is not so entitled.

The argument of petitioner rests mainly upon the proposition that "domestic" duties include any that have to do with the dwelling or adjoining buildings accessory thereto. It is contended that, if they contribute to the maintenance of the home, it is immaterial whether they are performed inside or outside the walls of the dwelling. The case of Catto v. Plant, 106 Conn. 236, 137 A. 764, is much relied upon in this connection. The court there held that an assistant gardener, employed to care for the house grounds on a country estate, came within the definition of a "domestic servant." It would be profitless for us to consider the precise effect of the word "household" in the California statute, as a limitation on the meaning of "domestic service." The important problem which this case presents cannot be solved by any definition of the terms in the abstract, but requires a determination of the intent of the Legislature in making them a part of the particular act.

Both by constitutional provision (Cal. Const. art. 20, § 21) and by legislative enactment (Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act, § 69(a), Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 4749) it is the duty of the courts to interpret this act with a view toward making compensation as general as may be practicable and reasonable. Examining the sections on excluded employments, we find that from the general compensation provisions certain exceptions are made. The basic exclusion is of labor which is "casual and not in the course of business." The next is of "household domestic service." The intention here is plainly to exclude employments of a personal as distinguished from an industrial character, for domestic service as such is not excluded; such employment in hotels, apartments, and boarding houses is within the act. The exception formerly made of agricultural and similar employment is, since 1927, practically eliminated. This is a persuasive indication of the legislative object of wider operation of the Compensation Law. The amendment of 1927 would also seem to suggest that the scope of the exception of "household domestic service" should be carefully restricted. Formerly it was unnecessary to draw any close line between such employments as, for example, gardening and housework, since both were excluded. Now, the inclusion of horticultural and agricultural labor necessitates the drawing of such a line, and, since the amendment was designed to increase the group of compensated employments, the interpretation should be one which will carry out that intention. Of paramount importance, however, is the express declaration of the statute: "Whenever this act, or any part or section thereof, is interpreted by a court, it shall be liberally construed by such court with the purpose of extending the benefits of the act for the protection of persons injured in the course of their employment." Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act, § 69(a).

The foregoing discussion leads us to conclude that, in the solution of problems such as that before us here, our inquiry must be this: Is the employment unmistakably excluded by the terms of the act? If it is not, we are bound to uphold the finding and award of the commission. Under this view, we find no difficulty in deciding the instant case. Swanson's work was, as respondent commission has suggested, in a middle zone; he was doing odd jobs, which had too little connection with the household to be properly classified as domestic, and yet were not of such industrial character as to come within the ordinary meaning of farm, agricultural, or horticultural labor. Such employment cannot be placed squarely in either classification of the statute. The Legislature, no doubt in recognition of the impossibility of laying down any positive rule for such marginal employments, has apparently left it for the commission to determine, in each instance, whether the injured person was at the time of the injury engaged in an included or excluded employment. The case of George v. Industrial Accident Commission, 178 Cal. 733, 174 P. 653, is very persuasive in this connection. At the time of this decision, horticultural labor was an excluded employment. George was employed as a janitor and gardener. While cutting a limb of a tree, he was injured. The commission found that at the time of the injury he was engaged in horticultural labor, and dismissed his application. The court said (page 735 of 178 Cal., 174 P. 653, 654): "Whether or not George, at the time of his injury, was engaged in horticultural labor was a question of fact to be determined by the commission. Its finding thereon, if supported by any rational view of the evidence, is beyond review here. On the testimony in the record, it cannot be said that the conclusion of fact drawn by the commission was an unreasonable or improper one. George's employment was dual in character. In so far as he acted as a gardener, his work was horticultural and beyond the purview of the Compensation Act. In so far as his duties were those of a janitor, his employment was not exempt from the terms of the act."

The conclusion seems irresistible that, where the employee has various duties and performs labor of widely different types, the employment is not to be forced, by a strained definition of terms or an artificial rule of construction, into the excluded or the included classes. The proper characterization of the employment in such cases presents a question of fact for the commission to determine. The evidence in the instant case amply supports the finding that, at the time of the accident, the employee was engaged in horticultural labor, and, on the basis of this finding, the award should be, and is hereby, affirmed.

It does appear from this record, however, that proceedings were instituted in the juvenile court in Santa Clara county on December 8, 1916, asking the court to assume jurisdiction over the minor, who was then a little over one year of age and destitute; that for the past fourteen years she has been in the custody of persons other than her parents under orders of that court made from time to time during that period; and that said proceedings are still pending and undetermined.

At the time of the hearing in this court we directed petitioner's attention to her failure to traverse the return and to the incompleteness of the record. The court then notified petitioner's counsel that the burden of proof was on her and time was allowed to enable her to complete the proof and to file her opening brief. The cause was heard on August 12th of this year, and since that time the petitioner has done nothing in the way of presenting either proof or brief. We are not required to assume counsel's burden of presenting a matter before the court for decision, hence the cause should be dismissed for lack of prosecution.

Offer to prove custom among construction operators to rely on brakes on hoist held insufficient; evidence of custom which merely constitutes opinion of negligence is inadmissible.

Offer of proof in question omitted evidence regarding capacity of hoist, weight of load thereon, condition of brakes, and whether brakes were properly set, all of which affect question whether it is safe in any given case to rely on brakes.

5. Negligence ⇨124(1).

Industrial Accident Commission's general construction safety order served on general contractor, sued by subcontractor's employee injured by hoist, held properly admitted.

6. Damages ⇨132(3).

$6,000 to construction workman, whose principal injury was fracture of dorsal vertebra, probably causing continued pain and inability to do heavy lifting, held not excessive.

At time of trial, eighteen months after accident, plaintiff was able to pursue his usual occupation only about one-third of time.

FINCH, P. J.

This is an appeal by the defendants from a judgment for damages in favor of the plaintiff for personal injuries sustained by him in the fall of a hoist or elevator which was being used in the construction of a building.

[1] At the time of the accident the plaintiff was engaged in unloading from the hoist platform, which was then stationary at the ninth floor of the building, steel pans, or forms, into which to pour concrete. While the plaintiff was so engaged, the elevator platform fell with him to the ground, thereby causing the injuries in question. The defendant J. V. McNeil Company was the general contractor for the construction of the building. The defendant Sutherland was employed by the general contractor as hoisting engineer. The plaintiff was an employee of a subcontractor and, at the time of the accident, was working as such. The subcontractor had entered into a contract with the general contractor to install and remove the steel forms, or pans. The general contractor had constructed and was using four hoists. At the time of the accident the defendant Sutherland was the only hoistman, and he was alternately operating all four hoists, including the one which fell with the plaintiff. At that time that hoist was being operated under an agreement by the terms of which the subcontractor was to pay the general contractor for hoisting the forms at the rate of $2.25 an hour, including the services of Sutherland, the maximum load not to exceed 500 pounds. Immediately before the accident the hoist had been stopped at the ninth floor with a load of eight forms, weighing about fifty-eight pounds each. Sutherland, who had charge of all the hoists at that time, set the brake on the loaded hoist and went to another hoist, about fifteen or twenty feet therefrom. The plaintiff and a fellow workman then commenced to unload the hoist, it being necessary for them to step upon the hoist platform. Two forms were removed successfully, but when the plaintiff stepped on the platform to remove a third form the platform fell with him to the ground. The brake was still set when the platform reached the ground. The foregoing facts are stated in the light most favorable to the respondent; conflicting evidence being immaterial on appeal.

[2] Sutherland was clearly an employee of the defendant company and under its control. Umsted v. Scofield Eng. Const. Co., 203 Cal. 224, 263 P. 799; Moss v. Chronicle Publishing Co., 201 Cal. 610, 258 P. 88, 55 A. L. R. 1258; Billig v. Southern Pacific Co., 189 Cal. 477, 209 P. 241; Stewart v. California Improvement Co., 131 Cal. 125, 63 P. 177, 724, 52 L. R. A. 205; Valdick v. Le Clair (Cal. App.) 289 P. 673.

[3] The hoist being under the exclusive control of the defendants, and the accident being such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen, the maxim res ipsa loquitur applies and, in the absence of explanation by the defendants, an inference of negligence on their part arises. Ragin v. Zimmerman, 206 Cal. 723, 276 P. 107; Michener v. Hutton, 203 Cal. 604, 265 P. 238, 59 A. L. R. 480; Judson v. Giant Powder Co., 107 Cal. 549, 40 P. 1020, 29 L. R. A. 718, 48 Am. St. Rep. 146; Brown v. Davis, 84 Cal. App. 180, 257 P. 877.

[4] The defendant offered to prove that "it is customary and usual practice among all construction operators who make elevators and skips and hoisting machines to rely generally upon the brakes when the machine has elevated the cage and stopped for unloading, and that it is never the custom of the engineer to watch the machine while not in motion and the brakes are set, or to remain with it during that time." The plaintiff's objection to such proof was sustained. Whether it is safe in any given case so to rely on the brakes necessarily depends upon the capacity of the hoist, the weight of the load thereon, the condition of the brakes, and whether they are properly set, all of which factors are left out of consideration in the offer of proof quoted. "Where evidence of a custom merely amounts to an opinion of the ultimate fact of negligence, such evidence is not admissible." 25 Cal. Jur. 428; Redfield v. Oakland C. S. Ry. Co., 112 Cal. 220, 224, 43 P. 1117. See, also, Perera v. Panama-Pacific Int. Exp. Co., 179 Cal. 63, 67, 175 P. 454; Carroll v. Central Counties Gas Co., 96 Cal. App. 161, 165, 273 P. 875, 274 P. 594; People v. Crossan, 87 Cal. App. 5, 16, 261 P. 531; Phoenix Assur. Co. v. Texas Holding Co., 81 Cal. App. 61, 75, 252 P. 1082.

[5] The trial court did not commit error in admitting in evidence a general construction safety order of the Industrial Accident Commission which had been served on the defendant Company. McKeon v. Lissner, 193 Cal. 297, 304, 223 P. 965; Barbieri v. Law (Cal. Sup.) 287 P. 464.

[6] The judgment is for $6,000. Appellants contend that the amount is so excessive that the verdict appears "to have been given under the influence of passion or prejudice." The principal injury suffered by the plaintiff was a fracture of the eighth dorsal vertebra. At the time of the trial, eighteen months after the accident, he was able to pursue his usual occupation only about one-third of the time. A physician called by the plaintiff testified that pain from the injury would probably continue "indefinitely." A physician called by the defendants testified: "Any fractured vertebra leaves a certain amount of soreness and certain amount of limitation of movement at the seat of the fracture which disables him so far as heavy lifting is concerned, so far as heavy back work is concerned." Appellant's contention is not supported by the record.

The judgment is affirmed.

All concur.

RICHERT v. CITY OF SAN DIEGO.

Civ. 441.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

Nov. 14, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 12, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 12, 1931.

1. Trial $\hookrightarrow$ 388(4).

Where facts set forth in agreed statement were probative in character, findings were necessary.

2. Trial $\hookrightarrow$ 395(5).

In action to quiet title, finding of ultimate fact of ownership in plaintiff held sufficient; no finding of necessary elements necessary to make possession adverse being necessary.

3. Adverse possession $\hookrightarrow$ 114(1).

Agreed statement in quiet title action held to support findings that plaintiff was owner, in possession, and entitled to possession, of property.

The agreed statement recited in part that for period of twelve years portion of premises involved had been used continuously by plaintiff for pasturage purposes, and that another portion had been closed by fences for twelve years and had been occupied by plaintiff continuously and cultivated by him and his tenants, and, when not used in actual cultivation, land was used for pasturage purposes, that possession of property had been under claim of right and had been exclusive of all other persons, and that plaintiff's claim of title was known throughout period to occupants of adjoining and nearby lands.

4. Adverse possession ☞8(1).

Land held by state or subdivisions which has been reserved or dedicated to specific public use can not be taken by adverse possession.

5. Adverse possession ☞7(2), 9.

Land held by state or subdivision which is neither reserved nor dedicated to public use and may be alienated may be taken by adverse possession.

6. Adverse possession ☞9.

Pueblo lands of city of San Diego not reserved for specific public use and subject to alienation held subject of adverse possession (Freeholders' Charter of San Diego adopted in 1889 [St. 1889, p. 656, art. 2, c. 2, § 1, subd. 50, as amended by St. 1909, p. 1147]).

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Lloyd E. Griffin, Judge.

Action by J. J. Richert against the City of San Diego. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

M. W. Conkling, City Atty., and H. C. Hopkins, Deputy City Atty., both of San Diego, for appellant.

Herbert C. Kelly, of San Diego, for respondent.

CARY, P. J.

Plaintiff brought this action against the city of San Diego to quiet title to certain land within the city limits of the city of San Diego. The complaint contains the usual averments. The answer denies plaintiff's ownership and right to possession, and admits that the defendant claims a right to the property in question.

The cause was tried upon an agreed statement of facts. The court found that plaintiff was the owner, in possession, and entitled to the possession, of the property in question; that defendant claimed title to said property, but that the same was without right. Judgment was given in favor of plaintiff.

The defendant, City of San Diego, urges as grounds for reversal (1) that the statement of facts contains only probative, as distinguished from ultimate, facts, and therefore findings are necessary; that the findings as made are insufficient because the elements of adverse possession are not severally found; that, even if the court's findings are sufficient, the agreed statement is insufficient to support them because the agreed statement contains no sufficient facts regarding the hostility of the possession or the notice to defendant of such possession; (2) that defendant city of San Diego holds these pueblo lots in trust for the use of the public, and does not hold them in a proprietary capacity, and hence the land may not be taken from the city by adverse possession; and (3) that, since the Legislature directed that these pueblo lands be reserved from sale until 1930, that fact in itself shows a clear intention of the state to except this land from adverse possession.

Omitting the formal parts, the agreed statement is as follows:

"Reference is hereby made to Plat of the City of San Diego filed herewith marked Exhibit 'A' upon which diagram the property adjacent to that involved in this action is marked with the letter 'R' in red ink in such cases as the Pueblo lot so marked is owned by the plaintiff and is marked with the word 'city' in print in such cases as the Pueblo lot so marked is owned by the defendant. On said diagram the property involved in this action is cross-hatched in blue ink and the red lines shown on said diagram represent the approximate location of fences as the same now exist and have existed for twelve (12) years last past. Of said fences so shown on said diagram those along the Right-of-Way of the Santa Fe Railway were constructed many years ago by said Railroad Company. The fence surrounding the enclosure including the Northerly portion of Pueblo Lot 1292 and adjacent tracts was built by plaintiff. The most Southerly, East and West fence line shown on said diagram was built by the owners of the land lying South thereof. The two cross-fences indicated by wavy lines running from said most Southerly fence line Northerly to the Santa Fe Railroad were built by plaintiff about 1914. By agreement between plaintiff and Max Watson, then City Forester in charge of the City Pueblo Lands, plaintiff built the fence indicated by red line following the Highway from the Northerly line of Pueblo Lot 1299 Northerly and thence Easterly along the Linda Vista Highway to the City Limits and defendant City built the two cross-fences indicated on said diagram running Southerly from said Highway, marked on said diagram as Linda Vista Road, to the Santa Fe Railroad Right-of-Way; at the same time defendant City constructed the fence along the Northerly boundary of the tract in dispute in this action from the Westerly line of Pueblo Lot 1278 to the Easterly boundary of Pueblo Lot 1292. About seven years ago plaintiff constructed two cross-fences dividing into three parcels the land involved in this action lying North of the Railroad Right-of-Way, the approximate location of which cross-fences is shown on this diagram by red lines. Since the construction of said fences about twelve years ago the portion of the land involved in this action lying North of the Railroad Right-of-Way has been continuously enclosed by the fences previously mentioned and has been occupied by the plaintiff continuously throughout said period having been cultivated by him and his tenants with crops of beans and hay raised thereon during eight or nine consecutive years of said period, since which time and during the portions of said years in which cultivation occurred while the land was not used in actual cultivation the land has been used continuously for pasturage purposes by plaintiff. Throughout said period of the twelve years last past the portion of said premises in controversy lying South of the Railroad Right-of-Way has been used continuously by plaintiff for pasturage purposes. Throughout said period plaintiff has owned and operated a dairy and cattle ranch, the headquarters of which are indicated on Exhibit 'A' by the words 'ranch houses' and the land enclosed as shown on said Exhibit 'A' has, throughout said period been used by him continuously for pasturage for cattle varying in number from approximately one hundred fifty to approximately three hundred head.

"It is further stipulated that no taxes of any nature whatsoever have been assessed upon or against the property involved in this action at any time during said period of the last twelve years; that plaintiff has made application to pay both city and county taxes upon said property in dispute but that payment of said taxes has been refused upon the ground that said land did not appear upon the assessment rolls.

"Throughout said period of approximately twelve years last past, the possession of the property in dispute by plaintiff has been under claim of right and has been exclusive of all other persons and hostile to the claims of defendant City and all other persons; that no person other than plaintiff has occupied any of said property in dispute herein at any time during said period of twelve years and that the use and occupancy of said property by plaintiff and plaintiff's claim of title thereto was known throughout said period to the occupants of adjoining and nearby lands.

"It is hereby further stipulated that the copy of the Pascoe Map of the Pueblo Lands of the City of San Diego on file in the office of the Recorder of San Diego County as Miscellaneous Map No. 36 is deemed to have been duly admitted in evidence in this action.

"It is further stipulated that all of the property in dispute in this action lies within the Pueblo lands of the City of San Diego as shown on said Pascoe Map and that all of the property involved herein lies North of the San Diego River and that the record title to said Pueblo Lands was acquired by grant to the Pueblo of San Diego and confirmed by United States patent."

When construed with the plat Exhibit A it reveals the following: The land in controversy is approximately rectangular in shape, its length from east to west being some four times its depth from north to south. Running from east to west through this land are the tracks of the Santa Fé Railway, which divide the land into a north and south half of nearly equal size. As the facts regarding these two halves are different, they may best be described separately.

The parcel lying north of the tracks had, for twelve years, immediately preceding the commencement of this action, been completely inclosed by a fence. It is bounded on the north by land belonging to the defendant city, on the south by the Santa Fé Railway right of way, and on the east and west by land belonging to plaintiff. This northerly tract has for said twelve years been occupied by plaintiff continuously, having been cultivated with crops of beans or hay for eight or nine consecutive years, and, when not so cultivated, used by plaintiff continuously for pasturage.

The tract lying south of the Santa Fé right of way, while fenced on its northern boundary by the right of way fence of the railway, has no fence erected on its eastern, southern, or western boundaries. However, it forms part of a larger area, the rest of which is owned by plaintiff, and around the outer limits of which there has been a fence for said 12-year period. Regarding this tract of land, the statement of facts recites: "Throughout said period of the twelve years last past the portion of said premises in controversy lying south of the railroad right of way has been used continuously by plaintiff for pasturage purposes."

[1] Regarding the question of findings, plaintiff concedes that the facts set forth in the statement are probative rather than ultimate. Findings are therefore necessary. Crisman v. Lanterman, 149 Cal. 647, 654, 655, 87 P. 89, 117 Am. St. Rep. 167; Zimmerman v. Continental Life Insurance Co., 99 Cal. App. 723, 727, 279 P. 464.

[2] The court's findings follow the language of the complaint, and find the ultimate fact of ownership in the plaintiff. This is sufficient, no finding of the several elements necessary to make the possession adverse being necessary. Montecito Valley Water Co. v. Santa Barbara, 144 Cal. 578, 594, 77 P. 1113; Cooley v. Miller & Lux, 156 Cal. 510, 523, 105 P. 981; Aronson & Co. v. Pearson, 199 Cal. 295, 304, 305, 249 P. 191; Colver v. W. B. Scarborough Co., 73 Cal. App. 421, 433, 434, 238 P. 1096.

[3] Does the agreed statement support the court's findings? Defendant urges particularly that it is insufficient, first, because it contains no showing of the hostile character of plaintiff's occupancy; second, because it contains no showing of notice to defendant; and, third, because it contains no showing that the land had been cultivated or improved or protected by a substantial inclosure. In support of its contention defendant cites: Saecker v. Cohn, 180 Cal. 151, 179 P. 890; Pacific Gas & Electric Co. v. Crockett L. & C. Co., 70 Cal. App. 283, 233 P. 370; Cory v. Hotchkiss, 31

Cal. App. 443, 160 P. 841; De Frieze v. Quint, 94 Cal. 653, 30 P. 1, 28 Am. St. Rep. 151; Brandon v. Umpqua Lumber Co., 26 Cal. App. 96, 146 P. 46; Secret Valley Land Co. v. Perry, 187 Cal. 420, 202 P. 449; San Francisco Credit Clearing House v. Wells, 196 Cal. 701, 239 P. 319, and Kern County Land Co. v. Nighbert, 75 Cal. App. 103, 241 P. 915. We have carefully examined the authorities cited by defendant, and have concluded that there is no merit to this contention.

Regarding the contention that the lands are of such character that they may not be taken from the defendant city by adverse possession, it may be noted at the outset that certain principles have been well established by our courts.

[4] Where land held by the state or any of its subdivisions has been actually reserved for or dedicated to some specific public use, there can be no adverse holding thereof which can give title to the adverse claimant. Board of Education v. Martin, 92 Cal. 209, 213, 217, 28 P. 799; County of Placer v. Lake Tahoe Railway Co., 58 Cal. App. 764, 783, 209 P. 900; City & County of San Francisco v. Bradbury, 92 Cal. 414, 418, 28 P. 803; Holladay v. San Francisco, 124 Cal. 352, 57 P. 146; San Diego v. Cuyamaca Water Co. (Cal. Sup.) 278 P. 840; San Diego v. Cuyamaca Water Co. (Cal. Sup.) 287 P. 475; Hoadley v. San Francisco, 50 Cal. 265; Mills v. City of Los Angeles, 90 Cal. 522, 532, 27 P. 354; County of Yolo v. Barney, 79 Cal. 375, 378, 379, 21 P. 833, 12 Am. St. Rep. 152. And this is the law regardless of whether or not the land be of pueblo origin. County of Placer v. Lake Tahoe Ry. Co., supra; County of Yolo v. Barney, supra.

[5] The law is likewise clear that, if land held by the state or any of its subdivisions is neither reserved for nor dedicated to some public use and may be alienated by its owner, title may be wrested from it by adverse possession. Board of Education v. Martin, 92 Cal. 209, 213, 28 P. 799; Ames v. City of San Diego, 101 Cal. 390, 393, 394, 35 P. 1005; Humboldt County v. Van Duzer, 48 Cal. App. 640, 643, 644, 192 P. 192; People v. Banning Co., 167 Cal. 643, 649, 140 P. 587; Orack v. Powelson, 3 Cal. App. 282, 285, 85 P. 129; San Francisco v. Straut, 84 Cal. 124, 24 P. 814.

[6] The agreed statement of fact does not show that the lands in question are either reserved for, or dedicated to, some specific public use. It does show, however, that the property lies within the pueblo lands of San Diego at a point north of the San Diego river, and that the record title thereto was acquired by grant to the pueblo of San Diego and confirmed by United States patent. The question is then presented: May the pueblo lands of the city of San Diego which are neither reserved for nor dedicated to some specific public use be taken from that city by adverse possession?

Appellant contends that all land owned by the former pueblo, now city, of San Diego, except such land as is held by it in trust for the mere purpose of conveying the legal title thereto to its true owner, is held by it in trust for the benefit of the inhabitants of the city, and that such fact, in and of itself, puts the land on a parity with land expressly reserved for or dedicated to a particular public use, and therefore exempts it from claim under adverse possession. In a brief, which gives evidence of extended research, practically every one of the many cases to be found in the reports of our own state and those of the United States Supreme Court bearing on the origin and history of the Mexican pueblo and the many interesting questions which have arisen peculiar to the nature of the pueblo lands has been cited. Any extensive quotation from these authorities or a repetition of this history as there disclosed would extend this decision unduly, and we shall therefore confine ourselves to a brief statement of such facts or legal principles as have been established, together with a citation of the cases in support thereof.

The question of the origin of the pueblo lands and their precise status has been the subject in this state of numerous decisions, many of which are of great length and have traced the history of the pueblo back to Spain, the country of their origin. In Vernon Irrigation Co. v. Los Angeles, 106 Cal. 237, 245-247, 39 P. 762, we find the essential differences between the ownership of lands within the limits of the pueblo or town under the Spanish and Mexican law and land ownership within the typical town or city of our country set forth in a singularly clear manner. The four square leagues of land usually granted to pueblos were by the latter's authorities divided into classes, most of which were for the common use of the inhabitants. But there were some classes of these lands which might be reduced to private ownership, such as the solares, upon which were built dwellings and stores, and the suertes, used for cultivation or planting. Hart v. Burnett, 15 Cal. 530, 553, 555. The land within the pueblo limits, except such solares and suertes as had been reduced to private ownership, was held by the pueblo in trust for the benefit of the inhabitants. Townsend v. Greeley, 5 Wall. 326, 18 L. Ed. 547, 549; Hart v. Burnett, supra, at pages 557, 568, 569, 573 of 15 Cal.; San Francisco v. Canavan, 42 Cal. 541, 555, 557. The pueblo, however, did not have the absolute control of these lands, even for the purposes of the trust under which they were held, for, while under the Mexican system the pueblo might dispose of the land in pursuance of the trust under which it was held, yet the Mexican government had the power to direct how the trust, should be executed and to enlarge or limit the power of the pueblo with respect to its disposition of these lands. The Mexican government further had the power to dispose of these lands itself without the consent of the pueblo authorities. San Francisco v. Canavan, supra, page 555 of 42 Cal. When the United States took over what is now California, no change in the status of privately owned land occurred. Teschemacher v. Thompson, 18 Cal. 11, 22, 24, 79 Am. Dec. 151; Ward v. Mulford, 32 Cal. 365, 372. In fact, under the terms of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, it became the duty of the United States to protect all rights of property emanating from the Mexican government previous to that treaty. Knight v. United Land Association, 142 U. S. 161, 12 S. Ct. 258, 35 L. Ed. 974, 982. In due course, the power formerly lodged in the Mexican government regarding the management, control, or disposition of these pueblo lands became vested in the state of California, to be exercised by its Legislature, and has there since remained, except in such instances as that body has in turn delegated it to the municipal authorities. San Francisco v. Canavan, supra, page 557 of 42 Cal.; City of Monterey v. Jacks, 139 Cal. 542, 73 P. 436.

With this general background we now address ourselves to the precise situation of the Pueblo lands of the city of San Diego. The Freeholders' Charter of San Diego adopted in 1889 (St. 1889, p. 643) provides (art. 2, c. 2, § 1, subd. 50) that the common council shall have power "to provide for the sale and conveyance, or lease, of all lands now or hereafter owned by said City not dedicated or reserved for public use." In 1909, by an amendment to this subdivision 50 (St. 1909, p. 1147), all pueblo lands owned by the city in the district where the lands here in controversy are situated (north of the San Diego river) were reserved from sale by the city until 1930, "provided, however, that at any time should it be desired to sell any part or portion of such public lands prior to the year 1930, the sale thereof may be authorized by an ordinance duly passed by the common council and ratified by the electors of the city of San Diego at any special or general municipal election." As to all other land owned by the city not dedicated or reserved for public use, the common council retained the same power of sale, conveyance, or lease as was given by the 1889 charter. St. 1909, p. 1147. Both the 1889 Freeholders' Charter and the 1909 amendment thereto had, of course, received the vote of the electors of San Diego before being submitted to, and approved by, the legislature. It will thus be seen that for a period of twenty years—1889 to 1909—the city of San Diego through its common council was empowered to sell the pueblo lands which are the subject of controversy here. It will further be seen that for twenty years thereafter—1909 to 1929—the power of sale of the lands here involved was still retained by the city, but with the added provision that any ordinance authorizing a sale must first be ratified by the electors of the city. The adverse possession in the case at bar occurred during the last twelve years of this second twenty-year period.

Briefly to sum up the situation as developed thus far, we find that the lands in question, while of pueblo origin, have never been either dedicated to, or reserved for, a specific public use. Furthermore, in the days when San Diego was a Mexican pueblo, the government of Mexico had plenary power to control the manner of sale of these pueblo lands by the municipal authorities, and the Mexican government could also, without consulting the municipal authorities, dispose of the pueblo lands of San Diego as its judgment might dictate. Also the state of California—the sovereign power which had succeeded to the plenary powers over pueblo lands formerly possessed by the government of Mexico—had, through its Legislature in conjunction with the vote of the electors of San Diego, given to the city of San Diego the power to alienate or sell these pueblo lands, and the city of San Diego had possessed that power absolutely for the twenty years from 1889 to 1909 and qualifiedly for the succeeding twenty years from 1909 to 1929.

In three cases our Supreme Court has heretofore passed directly on various questions incident to the pueblo lands of San Diego.

The earliest of these is Ames v. San Diego, 101 Cal. 390, 35 P. 1005, decided in 1894. There plaintiffs, solely by virtue of adverse possession, claimed title to certain pueblo land on which they had erected a house and in which they and their grantors had lived continuously since 1846. The findings of the trial court did not attempt to define the nature of the title which defendant city of San Diego had in this land beyond a mere statement that in 1874 the title of the city of San Diego as successor to the Mexican pueblo of San Diego had been confirmed by the United States "as the pueblo lands of said defendant and in trust for municipal purposes." In its decision our Supreme Court, recognizing that such property was held in trust by San Diego for its inhabitants to the extent that it could not be sold under execution issued upon a money judgment against the city then quoted from Hart v. Burnett, supra, to the effect that the solares, i. e., building lots, and the suertes, tracts for cultivation or planting, could be disposed of by the pueblo to the settlers for their individual and exclusive benefit. It then held that pueblo lands held by the city, not dedicated to some specific public use, and which were capable of alienation by the city, were subject to acquisition by adverse possession. As showing the significance which our Supreme Court attached to the fact that the city possessed the power of alienation, we quote the following from page 394 of 101 Cal., 35 P. 1005, 1006:

"As to land which is the subject of alienation, we are clearly of the opinion that the title of the city thereto may be lost by the adverse possession of another for the requisite period of time; and in regard to pueblo lands of this latter character, such as house lots, we see no reason why the statute of limitations should not apply in favor of an adverse possessor, precisely the same as if such land had been acquired by the city by purchase, and for purposes of sale, or for any other use not strictly municipal."

The second of these is San Diego v. Linda Vista Irrigation District, 108 Cal. 189, 41 P. 291, 35 L. R. A. 33, decided in 1895. In that case certain pueblo lands of the city had been included within the limits of the defendant irrigation district. The district made an assessment on all lands in the district, including the pueblo lands in question. Upon failure of the city to pay the assessment on these pueblo lands, they were sold to the district, whereupon the city brought action to quiet its title in the land. The Supreme Court, referring to the provisions of the 1889 charter which empowered the city to sell or lease such of its land as had not been dedicated or reserved to public use, and stating that the lands then being considered were among those which could be sold by the city, held them subject to the irrigation district tax, and refused to quiet the city's title.

The third and most recent case is San Diego v. Cuyamaca Water Co. (Cal. Sup.) 287 P. 475, decided in 1930. There the rights of the former pueblo, now city, of San Diego in the water of the San Diego river were under consideration, and it was held that the rights of the city in this water could not be lost by adverse possession, but in commenting on Ames v. San Diego, supra, the court at page 493 of 287 P., points out clearly the distinction between pueblo lands held by the city of San Diego in trust for a specific public use and pueblo lands which might be alienated by the city showing that the former could not, while the latter could, be taken from the city by adverse possession.

Defendant city of San Diego contends that the decision in Ames v. San Diego, supra, did not deal with pueblo lands in the sense that that term is used in the case at bar, but merely dealt with a solare or house lot which had theretofore been set aside by the pueblo for the private ownership of the then plaintiff; the legal title thus being held by the city of San Diego in trust for the then plaintiff. Defendant argues that, if the language used in the Ames Case should be held to apply to pueblo lands such as we are now considering, the Ames Decision is incorrect, since it violates the fundamentals of the Spanish and Mexican law with reference to pueblo lands. We have carefully considered defendant's attempt to differentiate the decision in the Ames Case, but are constrained to hold it to be without merit.

Counsel for defendant makes the additional point that the 1909 amendment to the Freeholders' Charter prohibiting the sale of the pueblo lands until 1930 would be nullified were squatters allowed to acquire the land simply by going on it and staying there. A somewhat similar contention was made in People v. Banning Co., 167 Cal. 643, 647, 648, 140 P. 587, and it was there held that the land was subject to adverse possession nevertheless.

We hold therefore that, even though the lands in question be pueblo lands of the city of San Diego, nevertheless the fact that they have not been reserved for or dedicated to a specific public use and are subject to alienation by the city renders them, under the decisions heretofore cited, subject to the law of adverse possession.

The judgment is affirmed.

TOPHAM et al. v. HUNTINGTON et al.
Civ. 161.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

Nov. 17, 1930.

1. Appeal and error ⇐965.

Venue ⇐52(1).

Retaining cause for convenience of witnesses is within discretion of trial court, whose finding cannot be disturbed unless there is abuse of discretion.

2. Venue ⇐52(1).

In determining whether cause should be retained in county where instituted on ground of convenience of witnesses, number of witnesses residing nearby is not alone decisive.

3. Appeal and error ⇐900.

All presumptions favor ruling of trial court.

4. Venue ⇐52(1).

Retaining cause in county where instituted for convenience of witnesses held not abuse of discretion.

Plaintiffs intended to call four witnesses other than the parties, and defendant intended to call five. The action involved a contract relative to the purchase of certain real property in which defendant claimed plaintiffs were in default in payment, and that plaintiffs had fraudulently induced defendant to enter agreement for termination of contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; G. R. Freeman, Judge.

Action by T. E. Topham and another against D. C. Huntington and another. From an order denying a motion for change of venue, defendant Mathilde S. Huntington appeals. Affirmed.

Hugo Platz, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Walter C. Davison, of Riverside, for respondents.

WARNER, Justice pro tem.

The appeal herein is from an order denying a motion for change of venue. Plaintiffs T. E. Topham and Jessie A. Topham, husband and wife, brought their action in the superior court of the state of California in and for the county of Riverside. The defendants D. C. Huntington and Mathilde S. Huntington, husband and wife, were residents of the county of Los Angeles, Cal., at the time plaintiffs instituted said action. D. C. Huntington, one of the defendants, was not served with summons in said cause, and the proceedings herein were and are on behalf of the defendant Mathilde S. Huntington alone. Said appearing defendant filed her notice of motion, affidavit of residence, affidavit of merits and demand for a change of place of trial, alleging as a ground for her demand for change of place of trial her residence in said county of Los Angeles; she also filed her answer and cross-complaint in said action at the same time, to wit, November 22, 1929. The sufficiency of the proceedings are not challenged. Said motion was noticed for hearing December 9, 1929, and came on regularly to be heard at said time. At the time of or immediately before said hearing the plaintiffs gave notice of motion to retain said cause in said superior court, alleging as a ground therefor the convenience of witnesses, and filed therewith an affidavit naming the witnesses plaintiffs expected to call, stating what plaintiffs expected to prove by each of said witnesses. When the said motion of said defendant was called for hearing the said motion of the plaintiffs came on for hearing before said court also. The court continued the hearing of each of said motions to December 16, 1929, in order to give the said defendant time within which to file affidavits opposing the motion to retain said cause in said court. On December 16, 1929, the said defendant filed a notice of motion for change of place of trial to the said county of Los Angeles, the grounds of said motion being the convenience of witnesses. She also filed an instrument designated "Offer of and Stipulation" and an affidavit setting forth the names of witnesses whom said defendant expected to call in said cause and the matters she expected to prove by their testimony. Plaintiffs filed their answer to the cross-complaint. Each of said motions came on regularly to be heard on the said 16th day of December, 1929, and were argued by counsel for the respective parties. The court denied the motion for change of place of trial, at which time defendant gave notice of appeal from the order denying the motion. The plaintiffs, respondents herein, ask for an affirmance of the order appealed from because of the failure of appellant to comply with the rules of this court in the preparation of her brief, and while the defendant has failed to print any of the evidence in her brief or in an appendix thereto, the record being short, we have decided to pass upon the merits of the appeal. It is admitted that this action is one that under proper proceedings taken and had must be tried in the county of the residence of the defendants unless the cause was properly retained on the ground of convenience of witnesses.

The cause of action involved the sale of citrus property a few miles from the city of Riverside, but within the county of San Bernardino. The affidavit filed by plaintiff shows that plaintiff intended to call for his witnesses two persons who reside in the city of San Bernardino, a distance of approximately 12 miles from the city of Riverside and approximately 60 miles from the city of Los Angeles; also three persons who live in the city of Riverside and one E. M. Lash, a resident of Rialto, Cal.; that the said city of Rialto is approximately 12 miles from the city of Riverside in the county of San Bernardino, and approximately 55 miles from the city of Los Angeles. The instrument designated as "Offer of and Stipulation" is as follows:

"Offer of and Stipulation. It is hereby offered as a stipulation and hereby stipulated that the testimony of certain witnesses of the plaintiffs as set out in the affidavit of T. E. Topham on file herein, may be used at the trial of this action, in the same manner as if the said witnesses were actually present in court, subject, however, to any objection that defendant may make to such testimony if the same had been given by the witnesses if present, save as to the form of the testimony. The testimony thus stipulated to is the testimony of Robert Topham, as set out on page 2 of said affidavit of T. E. Topham; the testimony of H. L. Thompson, as set out on page 3, of said affidavit; the testimony of W. G. Ehlert, as set out in page 3 of said affidavit; the further testimony of Robert Topham as contained on page 4 of plaintiff's affidavit; the testimony of E. M. Lash, as set out on page 4 of said affidavit. Hugo Platz, attorney for M. S. Huntington."

[1, 2] By referring to the affidavit of T. E. Topham as disclosed by the transcript, we find no such numbered pages in the transcript as are referred to in the "Offer of and Stipulation" above quoted, in any wise referring to the said affidavit. Hence it is impossible for this court to determine whether or not all or what portion of the testimony of Robert Topham, H. L. Thompson, W. G. Ehler, or E. M. Lash is intended to be stipulated to. The affidavit filed by the appellant herein in support of her motion for a change of place of trial on the ground of convenience of witnesses, and as opposed to the motion for the retention of said cause in the said court by the respondents herein, contains the names and residences of the witnesses defendant expects to call and a statement as to what said defendant expects to prove by their testimony, but as to the witness D. C. Huntington, defendant herein, who has not yet been served, it does not appear where the said D. C. Huntington resides. However, it does appear that he does not reside in Riverside county, and that the defendants are living separate and apart. The motion for retention of said cause in the court where the same was instituted on the ground of convenience of witnesses and the said motion of the defendants for change of place of trial to Los Angeles county are addressed to the discretion of the court, and the finding of the court thereon cannot be disturbed on appeal unless there is an abuse of discretion. Tait v. Midway Field Oil Co., 28 Cal. App. 107, 151 P. 378; Hanchett v. Finch, 47 Cal. 192; Blevins v. Blevins, 178 Cal. 318, 173 P. 402.

The number of witnesses who reside in a county or in close proximity thereto is not alone decisive of the issue. In the case of Bird v. Utica Mining Co., 2 Cal. App. 672 at page 673, 86 P. 509, the court says: "The refusing or granting of a motion for a change of venue upon the ground that the convenience of witnesses and the ends of justice would be promoted thereby lies in the sound legal discretion of the trial court. * * * The mere preponderance in the number of witnesses does not necessarily control the matter; and unless it appears that the trial court has abused its discretion the appellate court will not interfere with the action of the lower court. * * * It is true that the witnesses for appellants, 17 in number, resided in Calaveras county; but it is also true that the plaintiff and his witnesses, six in number, resided in San Francisco."

Again in Scott v. Stuart, 190 Cal. 526 at page 529, 213 P. 947, 948, the court says: "There is no merit in the suggestion that the larger number of witnesses reside in or near the county of Monterey. A mere preponderance in number of the witnesses which either party expects to produce will not necessarily determine the order to be made."

[3, 4] In the instant case it appears that the plaintiff intended to call four witnesses other than the parties, and the defendant intended to call five witnesses other than the parties herein.

From the record it appears that the plaintiff and defendant had a contract relative to the purchase and sale of certain real property situated within a few miles of the said city of Riverside but within the county of San Bernardino; that the defendant claims plaintiffs were in default in certain payments under said contract; that said plaintiffs by certain false and fraudulent representations induced said defendants to enter into an agreement for the termination of said contract of purchase and sale and for the disposition of the crop of oranges then matured on said premises. All presumptions are in favor of the ruling of the trial court. Grant v. Bannister, 145 Cal. 219, 78 P. 653.

Appellant has failed to point out any abuse of discretion, and upon such ground the order appealed from should be affirmed. Grant v. Bannister, supra. We will, however, assume for the argument only that the "Offer of and Stipulation" did in fact admit all of the testimony of all of the witnesses named therein. There are two witnesses whose testimony was not attempted to be admitted by said "Offer of and Stipulation" and the defendant intended to call five witnesses. However, the number of witnesses is not decisive of the question. Bird v. Utica Gold Mining Co., supra; Scott v. Stuart, supra. Under the issues herein the fraud claimed consisted in false representations both when said property was first purchased by the plaintiffs from the defendants and when the said premises were returned to said defendants by said plaintiffs.

In Hanchett v. Finch, 47 Cal. 192 at page 193, the court said: "The Court below must necessarily to some extent exercise its discretion in such cases, and has a better opportunity than we to determine whether the application is made in good faith, and whether the ends of justice will be best subserved by granting or refusing the motion. The mere preponderance in the number of witnesses on the one side or the other is not necessarily decisive of the application; and unless there is reason to believe that the Court below has abused its discretion or injustice has been done, we are not inclined to interfere."

In Blossom v. Waller, 30 Cal. App. 439, at page 441, 158 P. 509, 510, the court said: "Regard may be given to the character of the proposed testimony; and the court may therefore determine for itself from the showing made whether or not there be any necessity for the testimony of any or all of the desired witnesses. [Citing cases.]"

Applying these rules to the instant case, the character of the testimony, the number of witnesses, and all the facts and circumstances, even though the "Offer of and Stipulation" be considered to admit all the testimony of certain witnesses that it purports to affect, yet we find no abuse of discretion.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

Action by William F. Adams, as administrator of the estate of Leo R. Schwanekamp, deceased, against the Southern Pacific Company, James W. Cole, Charles Long, and the County of San Bernardino. Judgment for the defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

Judgment for James W. Cole and Charles Long affirmed, and judgment for the County of San Bernardino reversed.

William F. Adams, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Swing & Wilson, of San Bernardino, for respondents.

MARKS, J.

This is an action brought by the administrator of the estate of Leo R. Schwanekamp, deceased, for damages resulting from the death of deceased as the result of an accident which occurred while he was driving his automobile on a public highway of the county of San Bernardino connecting the cities of Redlands and San Bernardino. The case came before the court below upon the demurrers of respondents to appellant's second amended complaint, which demurrers were sustained as to respondents Cole and Long without leave to amend, and the county of San Bernardino with leave to amend. A judgment was entered in favor of Long and Cole following the sustaining of their demurrer to the second amended complaint, and in favor of the county of San Bernardino upon the failure of appellant to file an amended complaint within the time fixed by the trial court. Appellant filed separate notices of appeal from each of these judgments, but the case comes before us on a single record.

It is alleged in the second amended complaint that James W. Cole and Charles Long were highway commissioners of the county of San Bernardino having jurisdiction over the particular road in question. The Southern Pacific Company maintained a crossing over this highway. The county of San Bernardino had for a long time maintained a pavement in the center of the highway. Some time prior to the accident the paved portion of the highway had been widened for a distance of a few blocks by the construction of additional pavement fifteen feet in width on the north side of the former pavement. This new pavement extended up to the right of way of the Southern Pacific Company until it reached a point about fifteen feet from the most easterly rail of the four tracks of the Southern Pacific Company, leaving this space unpaved and unimproved and upon which the rails of the Southern Pacific Company were permitted to stand at least eight inches above the ground. On the night of August 24, 1927, the deceased was traveling westerly

ADAMS v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. et al. Civ. 119.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

Nov. 20, 1930.

1. Appeal and error ⇨232(1½).

Contention causes of action were improperly joined and not separately stated, not made by demurrer, cannot be urged in reviewing court for first time.

2. Appeal and error ⇨883.

Party consenting thereto cannot object to judgment, order, or ruling.

3. Appeal and error ⇨883.

Reviewing court will not disturb order or judgment on appeal taken by party consenting thereto.

4. Appeal and error ⇨882(5).

Plaintiff, requesting that defendants' demurrer be sustained without leave to amend, consented to judgment for defendants, which could not be questioned on appeal.

5. Parties ⇨27.

Action against railroad, highway commissioners, and county, for death of motorist in automobile overturning when striking railroad tracks in unpaved portion of intersection, did not show misjoinder of parties defendant (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 379a, 379b, 379c).

6. Automobiles ⇨301(3).

County held liable for death of motorist in automobile overturning when striking railroad tracks in unpaved portion of intersection, under allegations that county knew of dangerous condition of highway and had available funds to repair same.

Appeals from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Benjamin F. Warmer, Judge.

upon the new pavement and proceeded across the unpaved portion of the intersection, striking the rails of the Southern Pacific Company with such force that his automobile was overturned and he suffered injuries which resulted in his death. It is further alleged that before the time of the accident respondents had notice of the defective and dangerous condition of the highway and that the county of San Bernardino had available funds with which to pay the cost of remedying the same.

Apparently three separate grounds of negligence are alleged: First, the failure to maintain a safe highway crossing over the railroad tracks; second, the failure to pave a portion of the Southern Pacific Company's right of way between the end of the new pavement and the railroad tracks; third, the failure to post any notices, signs, lights, or barriers at the end of the pavement warning travelers of the dangerous condition of the unpaved portion of the crossing over the right of way.

[1] Respondents demurred to the second amended complaint upon the grounds: First, that it failed to state a cause of action against them or any of them; second, a misjoinder of parties defendant; and, third, that it was uncertain, ambiguous, and unintelligible. In their briefs respondents urge a further ground of objection in that they maintained that two causes of action are improperly united and are not separately stated therein. While there might be considerable merit in this last contention, it was not made by demurrer in the court below and cannot be urged here for the first time.

The record shows that on October 27, 1928, the demurrer of the defendants Cole and Long was sustained, giving appellant ten days in which to amend. It further appears that on the 2d day of November, 1928, at the request of the attorney for appellant this order was amended by the court to read as follows: "Demurrer of Defendants Cole and Long to second amended complaint sustained without leave to amend." Judgment in favor of these respondents followed the entry of this minute order.

[2-4] It is well-settled law in California that a party cannot object to a judgment, order, or ruling consented to by him. Ackerman v. Schultz, 178 Cal. 190, 172 P. 609; Baker v. Eilers Music Co., 175 Cal. 652, 166 P. 1006. This court will not disturb an order or judgment on an appeal taken by a party who consented thereto. Hibernia Savings & Loan Society v. Waymire, 152 Cal. 286, 92 P. 645. Appellant having requested that the demurrer of Cole and Long be sustained without leave to amend, he must be held to have consented to the judgment entered in their favor, which followed as a matter of course. The judgment in favor of these defendants must be sustained.

Respondents urge with much seriousness that there was a misjoinder of parties defendant. Since the adoption of sections 379a, 379b, and 379c of the Code of Civil Procedure in 1927 (St. 1927, pp. 477, 478, 631), we cannot agree with this contention. These sections provide as follows:

379a. "All persons may be joined as defendants against whom the right to any relief is alleged to exist, whether jointly, severally or in the alternative; and judgment may be given against such one or more of the defendants as may be found to be liable, according to their respective liabilities."

379b. "It shall not be necessary that each defendant shall be interested as to all relief prayed for, or as to every cause of action included in any proceeding against him; but the court may make such order as may appear just to prevent any defendant from being embarrassed or put to expense by being required to attend any proceedings in which he may have no interest."

379c. "Where the plaintiff is in doubt as to the person from whom he is entitled to redress, he may join two or more defendants, with the intent that the question as to which, if any, of the defendants is liable, and to what extent, may be determined between the parties."

[5] Under the provisions of these sections as construed in the cases of Nelson v. Marsh, 100 Cal. App. 578, 280 P. 695; Teeter v. City of Los Angeles (Cal. Sup.) 290 P. 11; and McPhetridge v. Smith, 101 Cal. App. 122, 281 P. 419, we cannot hold that there was a misjoinder of parties defendant.

[6] Respondents seriously contend that appellant's second amended complaint fails to state any cause of action against the county of San Bernardino. Since this case was decided in the lower court, the case of Brooks v. City of Monterey (Cal. App.) 290 P. 540, has been decided by the First District Court of Appeal. In the Brooks case the complaint alleged negligence on the part of the city of Monterey in failing to post warning signs or barriers at the terminus of a paved street which ended on a bluff overlooking the ocean. Plaintiff's decedent drove over the bluff and was killed, and a judgment against the city was founded upon its negligence in failing to maintain lights, barriers or signals to warn travelers of the dangerous condition at the end of the street. The judgment against the city was sustained. Upon the authority of this case we must hold that the second amended complaint of appellant stated a cause of action against the county of San Bernardino and that the judgment rendered in favor of the county must be reversed.

The judgment rendered in favor of respondents James W. Cole and Charles Long is affirmed. The judgment rendered in favor of the County of San Bernardino is reversed.

Ex parte GROSSMAN.
Cr. 1991.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California.
Nov. 18, 1930.

1. Contempt ☞6.

Attorney held in contempt for language and conduct in repeatedly insisting on making further argument or statement respecting affidavit on which court had already ruled (Code Civ. Proc. § 1209).

It appeared that attorney, replying to question of court regarding nature of proposed statement, said that he could not indicate its nature without making such statement, and that he had a number of things in mind; that he did not feel court could be enlightened any further; that he intended to proceed with case as he thought it should be handled; and that, although it was time to examine jury for cause, he was not precluded from doing other things.

2. Contempt ☞52.

Court, having acted within reasonable time, held to have retained jurisdiction to enter contempt judgment against attorney, continuously present (Code Civ. Proc. § 1211).

It appeared that conduct of attorney in trial court was at once recognized as offensive when made, on June 17; that he was continuously present until trial concluded, when he was adjudged guilty of contempt of court, and directed to appear on day following, at which time he appeared, submitted to jurisdiction, and requested that sentence be continued until June 25. Code Civ. Proc. § 1211, provides that contempt committed in court's presence may be punished summarily, but does not specify limitation of time within which final order must be made.

3. Contempt ☞63(4).

Contempt judgment against attorney held not void as failing to recite on face alleged contemptuous language or conduct, or obstruction of justice.

It appeared that commitment for contempt recited title and proceedings in case on trial, and contained stenographic report of all remarks of court and attorney, including full statement by court of grounds on which attorney was adjudged in contempt, and that order describing facts "as aforesaid" was made and entered on minutes of court, which were also set forth. Immediately following verbatim recital of attorney's statements and conduct, it was stated that such conduct interrupted proceedings, brought court into disrepute, and impaired its authority, and that attorney was guilty of contempt.

Application by Jason B. Grossman for a writ of habeas corpus against the Sheriff of Los Angeles County to secure release of petitioner from custody under a commitment for contempt.

Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded.

Pacht, Pelton & Warne, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Charles P. Johnson, City Prosecutor, and Joe W. Matherly, Deputy City Prosecutor, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, Acting P. J.

At the time set for the trial of a criminal case pending in the municipal court of the city of Los Angeles, the petitioner, an attorney at law, was inducted into the proceedings as associate counsel. An affidavit of bias and prejudice had theretofore been filed, and counsel for the defendant then requested that the case be transferred to another department of said court. After argument, the affidavit was ordered stricken from the files, and the bailiff was directed to call the jurors from adjoining rooms. Following the ruling of the court denying a transfer, and while jurors were entering the courtroom, petitioner insisted upon being heard further upon the matter. He was repeatedly reminded of such ruling, and ordered to desist from argument, which mandates were ignored. Following the trial and discharge of the jury, petitioner was informed that the court adjudged him in contempt on account of his statements and conduct at the inception of the trial, and he was directed to appear on the following day for sentence. A continuance having been granted at his request, he appeared at a later date, at the time fixed by his counsel by permission of the court, when he was fined $100, and ordered committed to jail in default of payment thereof. By a petition to this court, following denial of relief in the superior court, the petitioner recites that he is imprisoned under the provisions of said order, and prays that he be restored to his liberty.

[1] There is no controversy as to the occurrences leading to the final order of the municipal court. It is urged that the language and conduct of the petitioner "is not in any sense contemptuous and the petitioner was within his rights as an attorney at law in the trial of a case to conduct himself in the manner and to utter the language as indicated by the record." We do not deem a quotation of the entire colloquy requisite to a proper consideration of the matter. Since the jurisdiction of the municipal court is questioned upon the ground that its order is without legal foundation, the following is accordingly recited from the record before us as substantially constituting the basis therefor, in the view of the committing magistrate. While the bailiff was proceeding to comply with the order recalling the jury, the asserted contemptuous interruptions ensued:

"Mr. Grossman: Perhaps it might be better to wait until later, as I have a few remarks to make concerning this affidavit which is here on file. However, if you prefer to have the jury present, that is up to you. * * * Do you still insist I cannot make a statement?"

"The Court: What is the nature of your statement?"

"Mr. Grossman: Well, the nature of the statement could only be made when I make the statement. I have a number of things in mind.

"The Court: I have ruled on the affidavit and I do not believe that any further statement would enlighten the court any further. The affidavit is before the court; I have considered it very carefully, and I do not believe that I care to hear any further argument on the affidavit itself.

"Mr. Grossman: The statements which I intend to make are not made, as far as I am concerned, with the purpose of enlightening the court. I do not feel the court could be enlightened in that regard. * * * I say, your Honor, I do not think the court could be enlightened, not because I would not try to enlighten the court, but I mean the statement I am about to make pertains to this affidavit. * * *

"The Court: If you want to feel that way, the court does not care to hear from you any further. Please let us go along in an orderly manner. * * * I am always very glad to extend courtesies to lawyers. I am glad to hear anyone, but this is a matter that the court has passed on. So far as what the court has done is concerned, I don't care to reverse my ruling, I do not believe that anything you could say would enlighten the court any further on the affidavit. The affidavit is now before me. I have studied the affidavit; I am satisfied that the conclusions I have come to with regard to it are reasonable, right, just and lawful. Then, why continue the matter? * * *

"Mr. Grossman: Your Honor, I have a question to ask. I am just wondering concerning this procedure, if the counsel for the defendant and the defendant himself would refuse at this time to abide by the ruling of the court, what would the court do in such a case? * * *

"The Court: I do not feel called upon to answer such a question under all the circumstances of the case. Will you please allow the clerk to call a jury? * * *

"Mr. Grossman: If your Honor please, at this time I request the court to have the jury and the other jurors which may serve in this case excluded from the courtroom, as I have a number of statements I would like to make in this matter, which I feel should be made in their absence. * * *

"The Court: The motion will be denied. There is no reason for excluding the jury. You are to examine the jury for cause and not make a statement at this time.

"Mr. Grossman: If the court please, I intend to proceed with this case in the way I intend it should be handled; and at this time I intend to make a statement. If your Honor wants the jurors to hear it, very well; I suggest that the jurors be removed. If your Honor rules that it should not be done, then I will make it with the jurors here. * * * I concede it is time for me to examine the jury for cause, and that is my privilege. The fact that it is time for me to examine the jury does not preclude me from doing other things—I may have the privilege of doing a number of things in this courtroom, as your Honor has the privilege of doing a number of things; and I am only asking to make a statement to your Honor; if I felt I was asking for something which was out of order, if I felt I was asking to make a statement to this jury, or in the presence of this jury, which I thought would prevent my client—

"The Court: Do you care to examine the jurors?"

"Mr. Grossman: Not at this time; I care to make a statement to the court."

The foregoing was followed by further persistent and determined effort by counsel to handle the case as he intended it should be handled, in disregard of repeated rulings and in defiance of the court's endeavors, both by courteous advice, and finally by stern and emphatic but dignified reprimand, to obtain a jury in an orderly manner. Counsel was at least five times thereafter admonished to abstain from argument upon the decided question, and reminded that, if error be committed, "there is a court higher than this court that can correct any errors that I may make and give your client any redress for any wrong that he may have suffered."

er or not an offense was committed by such unauthorized and infractious exercise of a self-imposed "privilege of doing a number of things in this courtroom," insisting that he could make a statement of a "number of things" that he had in mind, not "with the purpose of enlightening the court" when he did "not feel the court could be enlightened in that regard," either before the court or jury, which was "up to you." In support of this petition are cited In re Shortridge, 5 Cal. App. 371, 90 P. 478; Platnauer v. Superior Court, 32 Cal. App. 463, 163 P. 237; Curran v. Superior Court, 72 Cal. App. 258, 236 P. 975, 977, and Hallinan v. Superior Court, 74 Cal. App. 420, 240 P. 788, 790. No apology was offered, and the petitioner seeks to rest upon a justification. The cited cases are not urged with great enthusiasm as authoritative in this case, and it is conceded that none within this jurisdiction are in point. In Re Shortridge, supra, the familiar rule that presumptions are in favor of one charged with contempt of court is followed, and the petitioner was discharged, for the reason that the asserted contemptuous statements and circumstances were not set forth. In Platnauer v. Superior Court, supra, it appearing that the petitioner had ceased addressing the court as ordered, and nothing having occurred except at a gratuitously and unnecessarily suggested controversy by the judge, it was held improper to incarcerate and deprive the client of his counsel during the trial. In Curran v. Superior Court, supra, it was held in certiorari that it was necessary and proper for counsel to assign remarks of the court as error, and that "no reason appears from the record for the order of the court requiring the petitioner to be seated." The general statement of facts upon which the petitioner had been held in contempt was found to have been untrue. In Hallinan v. Superior Court, supra, the petitioner, an attorney representing a defendant then on trial, had objected to a question, and, when ordered to desist from extended argument, he persistently refused to comply with the order. This case seems more clearly in point, though the contemptuous conduct consisted solely in insisting upon argument of a question immediately in issue, rather than upon a question which had been decided, as in the instant proceeding, and it was wholly devoid of other aggravating factors. However, the order of the trial court was sustained, and a hearing by the Supreme Court was denied. Following a thorough review of the authorities above mentioned, it was there observed that an attorney has certain rights and privileges, the exercise of which may not be denied him, but that the right to argue even a pending matter is not unlimited. And it was concluded: "When the court reaches the point that it feels that it is fully advised as to the question under discussion and ready to rule upon the same, and therefore requires no further enlightenment from counsel, it is surely clothed with adequate power and authority to order the argument at an end, and, when necessary, in order to enforce its order, to punish the attorney guilty of its infraction. Under such circumstances, the action of counsel in persisting in arguing a matter to the court, after the court has repeatedly ordered him to desist, amounts to disorderly behavior towards the judge of the court, which directly tends to interrupt the due course of the trial, and is also disobedience of the lawful order of the court. Such acts are defined as contempt by the provisions of section 1209 of the Code of Civil Procedure."

This conclusion upon the record before us is strongly supported by authorities from other jurisdictions which are more nearly analogous. 2 Bishop, Crim. Law (8th Ed.) §§ 242, 243; State v. Crum, 7 N. D. 299, 74 N. W. 992; In re Cooper, 32 Vt. 258; Dodge v. State, 140 Ind. 284, 39 N. E. 745, 746. In the case last cited it was appropriately said: "It is always to be regretted that a case should arise that renders it necessary for a court to inflict punishment for contempt against a member of its bar. Attorneys at the bar are properly termed the 'court's constituency,' to aid it in the due administration of justice. Each one is required to take an oath that he will honestly and faithfully discharge his duties as such attorney, and one of the cardinal duties enjoined upon him by law is to maintain the respect that is due to the courts of justice and judicial officers. * * * In the determination of the question as to whether a contempt has been committed, it does not depend upon the intention of the offending party, but upon the act he has done. A disclaimer of intentional disrespect or design to embarrass the administration of justice is no excuse for the person charged with the offense, when the contrary appears, from a fair interpretation of the language used. * * * It is the imperative duty of an attorney to respectfully yield to the ruling and decisions of the court, whether right or wrong, reserving the rights of his client by proper and necessary exceptions thereto. A remedy for the correction of the court's errors, if any, is fully provided by law."

[2] The petitioner next asserts that, if his conduct was contemptuous, delay of the proceeding and failure to issue a citation forthwith deprived the trial court of jurisdiction to act. It is argued that the intent of the Code provision is that the court shall deal summarily with disorderly conduct and the utterance of insolent and contemptuous language, that offending counsel may be warned of his misconduct and afforded an opportunity to desist or to apologize, and that a failure in this respect might indicate that the court did not view such conduct as worthy of further consideration. It appears that the persistent argument and innuendos in the trial court were at once recognized as offensive when made, on June 17, 1930. Petitioner was continuously present until the trial concluded, when he was adjudged guilty of a contempt of court and directed to appear on the day following, at which time petitioner again appeared, submitted to the jurisdiction, and requested "that the sentence in said matter be continued until June 25th, 1930." Curran v. Superior Court, supra, is cited and relied upon by both parties, the only distinction being that Curran was at once directed to remain after adjournment, whereupon the matter was continued to the conclusion of the trial, and counsel was summoned by order to show cause after withdrawal and continued absence from the case on trial. The rule was there announced that "the action of the court thereafter was timely. The order to show cause was based on facts within the immediate knowledge of the court, and needed no affidavit to support it, and the court, as to the form and manner of its procedure, retained jurisdiction to act." Section 1211 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that a contempt committed in the presence of the court "may be punished summarily," but it specifies no limitation of time within which a final order shall be made. That the court deemed the occurrences of moment requiring summary action is manifest, and the petitioner does not attempt to indicate what, if any, injury to his rights resulted from a failure to afford him further opportunity to desist or to offer an apology for language and conduct which he insisted, and still insists, was wholly justified. Under the circumstances, we think the court retained jurisdiction so long as it acted within a reasonable time. Middlebrook v. State, 43 Conn. 257, 21 Am. Rep. 650; People v. Board of State Canvassers and Rice, 74 Hun, 179, 26 N. Y. S. 345.

[3] The judgment is criticized as "void and without jurisdiction because it fails upon its face to recite * * * the alleged contemptuous language or conduct * * * or that they constituted an obstruction of the orderly administration of justice." The commitment for contempt recites the title and proceedings in the case on trial, contains a stenographic report of all remarks of court and counsel, including a full statement by the court to petitioner of the grounds upon which he was pronounced in contempt; that the court "caused an order to be made describing the facts * * * as aforesaid and caused the same to be entered upon the minutes of said court," which minutes are also set forth. Immediately following a verbatim recital of the statements and conduct which we have detailed in part herein, it is further stated that "said conduct and disobedience on the part of the said Jason B. Grossman tended to directly interrupt proceedings and impair the respect due the authority of said court and tended directly to bring said court and the judge thereof into disrepute and that said Jason B. Grossman is guilty of contempt of court." Since the language and acts, as we have observed, were contemptuous, and the commitment presents them in full, declaring them to be an offense, and committing the petitioner therefor, we think it is not insufficient in this respect.

The writ is discharged and the petitioner remanded.

CARLISLE et ux. v. LADY et al.
Civ. 3808.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

Nov. 15, 1930.

1. Contracts ☞297.

Condition of contract, fulfillment of which is impossible, is void only to extent that it cannot be performed (Civ. Code, § 1441).

2. Mines and minerals ☞78(1).

Lessees in oil and gas lease delivered after specified time to commence drilling were obligated to commence drilling within reasonable time (Civ. Code, § 1657).

Although provision in lease in respect to time to commence drilling was inoperative by reason of fact that delivery was not made until after expiration of such period, the grantee was not entitled thereunder to omit to drill and develop and hold grant for speculative purposes purely.

3. Mines and minerals ☞58.

Clause of oil and gas lease authorizing lessee to quitclaim before discovery of oil converted instrument into mere option.

4. Mines and minerals ☞78(3).

Provision of oil and gas lease requiring notice before declaring forfeiture related to covenants of lease, and not to condition relating to time to commence drilling.

The provision requiring notice for forfeiture was to effect that interest of lessee should be subject to forfeiture only in case he should be in default in performance of any covenants or agreements to be done or performed thereunder, and such default should be of a kind curable with reasonable diligence within 30 days and continue uncured for period exceeding 30 days after having had written notice of default and character thereof.

5. Pleading ⚡263.

Refusal to permit amended answer made up largely of evidentiary matter with all material issues raised thereby properly triable under original answer was not error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Action by F. M. Carlisle and wife against W. E. Lady and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

W. E. Lady, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

J. A. Chase, of Visalia, and W. M. Hiatt, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J.

The plaintiffs filed their complaint herein, in the usual form, to quiet their title to a section of land. The answer alleges that on May 3, 1922, the plaintiffs executed and delivered to F. G. Bogle "an oil and gas lease" of all but twenty acres of the land and that the defendants have acquired and are the owners of all the rights granted to Bogle by the terms of the lease in and to the south half of the section. Judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiffs quieting their title to all the lands in controversy, and the defendants have appealed from the judgment.

The plaintiffs are husband and wife and the property in suit is a part of their community property. In the year 1921 the husband executed an oil and gas lease covering the whole of the land to Wm. H. Shry and L. E. Prestage. Thereafter, by mesne conveyances, E. M. Steele acquired whatever rights the lessees had under the lease. May 2, 1922, Mrs. Carlisle instituted an action to cancel the lease on the ground that she had not joined in the execution thereof. At the time of the delivery of the Bogle lease, Steele executed and delivered to the plaintiffs a quitclaim deed to the land, Mrs. Carlisle dismissed the aforesaid action and Bogle assigned to Steele all of his rights under the lease in and to the south half of the section of land. Although the court made no finding on the question, there is a possible inference from the evidence that the plaintiffs and Steele understood that the quitclaim deed was executed in part consideration for the Bogle lease and the assignment to Steele, and for the purposes of this opinion it will be assumed that such is the fact. Having reached that conclusion, the Shry lease may be dismissed from further consideration, because it can have no other bearing on the issues in the case.

The court found, on sufficient evidence, "that on the 7th day of October, 1923, the plaintiffs * * * signed and duly acknowledged a lease and agreement with F. G. Bogle; that said lease and agreement was signed and acknowledged by F. G. Bogle on the 2nd day of November, 1923; that said lease and agreement was delivered and recorded on the 24th day of July, 1924." A copy of the lease is then set out in full and a finding that the aforesaid assignment from Bogle to Steele was made. The court then, on evidence without substantial conflict, found as follows:

"That the defendants are assignees and successors in interest of E. M. Steele; that neither defendants nor F. G. Bogle nor E. M. Steele nor any successor in interest of E. M. Steele, nor any sublessee of F. G. Bogle, nor any successor in interest of F. G. Bogle, nor any successor in interest of any sublessee of F. G. Bogle, or E. M. Steele nor any sublessee or assignee of either of them ever performed any of the conditions or obligations, nor any of the agreements, terms, conditions or obligations of said original lease required of the lessee in said original lease;

"That no rental provided by the terms of said original lease was ever paid to plaintiffs; that no well was ever drilled or ever commenced to be drilled on the land described in said original lease, or within the territorial limits provided in said lease, by F. G. Bogle, or by anyone holding any interest in said lease, or by any successor in interest of F. G. Bogle, or anyone claiming under F. G. Bogle;

"That neither F. G. Bogle nor anyone claiming under him ever entered upon the land described in said lease, or any land prescribed by the terms of said lease for the purpose of performing or complying with any of the terms of said lease; and the terms and conditions of said lease to be complied with by the lessees therein have not been complied with, performed or kept by anyone."

The lease contains the following:

"For and in consideration of $10 by the lessee in hand paid to the lessor, receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, and in further consideration of the performance by the lessee, of the covenants and agreements hereinafter contained, the lessor has leased, let and demised, and by these presents does lease, let and demise unto the lessee, the lands hereinafter described, with the sole and exclusive rights to the lessee, to drill for, produce, extract and take oil, gas, asphaltum and other hydro-carbon substances and water from, and store the same upon said land, during the term hereinafter specified, * * *

"(a) The lessee shall hold said lands with the appurtenances for the period of 20 years from the date hereof, and so long thereafter, as oil, gas, asphaltum or other hydro-carbon substances are produced thereon and therefrom in paying quantities by the lessee, unless otherwise surrendered or forfeited by the lessee; and the lessee hereby leases, from the lessor the hereinbefore described lands for the purposes and term aforesaid and upon the consideration hereinafter set forth.

"(b) It is understood and agreed that this lease is executed by the lessor upon and subject to the condition that the lessee shall within 6 months from May 3, 1922, commence the drilling of a test well on said demised premises, or at some point within 2 miles from the exterior boundaries of the premises herein described with complete rig, and thereafter prosecute the drilling thereof with reasonable diligence and in good faith until oil, gas or other hydro-carbon substances are found in paying quantities by the lessee or until said well has been drilled to a depth of thirty-five hundred feet; provided, however, that said lessee may extend said period 3 months by paying to said lessor herein a cash rental of 50 cents per acre per month, monthly in advance. And provided further, that in the event the lessee does not commence the drilling of said test well within said additional 3 months, this lease shall ipso facto terminate.

"This lease shall be upon the further terms and conditions following, to-wit:

"1. In the event the lessee does not commence the drilling of a well for oil on the premises herein described, with complete standard or rotary rig, within 90 days from the completion of said test well, then and in that event the lessee shall pay to the lessor herein named a monthly cash rental for the premises herein described at the rate of two dollars per acre per month, monthly in advance but in no event, however, shall drilling be delayed on the premises herein leased for a period of more than 1 year from completion of the test well mentioned in Paragraph 'B' above.

"2. Lessee may at any time before the discovery of oil on the demised premises, quitclaim the said property to the lessor, his successors or assigns and thereupon all rights and obligations of the parties hereto, one to the other, cease and determine. * * *

"25. The interest of the party of the second part under this indenture shall be subject to forfeiture only upon the conditions and in the manner herein set forth, to-wit: In case the lessee shall be in default in the performance of any covenant or agreement by him to be done or performed hereunder, and such default shall be of a kind curable with reasonable diligence within 30 days, and shall continue uncured for a period of exceeding 30 days, after he had had written notice of said default and the character thereof, or if the lessee shall not have begun in good faith to remedy any such default, within said period of 30 days after such notice, then and in such case, this lease shall become void at the option of the lessor and the lessee shall thereupon vacate said premises. * * *

[1, 2] The complaint in the action was filed January 28, 1927. The trial was commenced April 13, 1927, and completed in the following month, nearly three years after the lease was delivered. During all that time neither the lessee nor any of his assignees made any effort to perform the terms of the lease and none of them did anything to indicate an intention even to comply with its terms. Referring to the condition in paragraph (b) of the lease, requiring the lessee to commence the drilling of a test well within six months after May 3, 1922, appellants contend that since it was manifestly impossible to commence such drilling after the delivery of the lease on July 24, 1924, and within six months after May 3, 1922, the provisions of that paragraph "were not obligatory on any one." Based on this argument, appellants state in their opening brief: "When the court found that the lease * * * was not delivered until July 24, 1924, by the same finding the court found there were no obligations to be performed by the lessee, and the lease would thereupon run for twenty years without the doing of any matter or thing." It is clear that the facts stated do not lead to any such inequitable result. Section 1441 of the Civil Code provides: "A condition in a contract, the fulfillment of which is impossible, * * * is void." This is only a legislative declaration of a rule of the common law. Vanderslice v. Hanks, 3 Cal. 28, 42. The rule can mean only that such a condition is void to the extent that fulfillment is impossible. In case of a grant on condition that the grantee pay a note or bond on the day it falls due it would be absurd to hold that the grantee can hold the property conveyed and escape the obligation to pay on the ground that the due date had already passed at the time the grant was executed. Hughes v. Edwards, 9 Wheat. 489, 6 L. Ed. 142. In a case analogous to this, where the grantor had prevented performance of a condition subsequent at the time specified in the condition, the court held, quoting from the syllabus: "Where the owner of land conveyed it to a society on condition subsequent that a building be erected thereon before a certain date, the fact that the grantor prevented the completion of the building by unwarranted claims of title would not authorize a judgment vesting the fee in the grantee unconditionally, but the condition should be performed within a reasonable time thereafter." Baker v. Woman's Christian Temperance Union, 57 App. Div. 290, 67 N. Y. S. 949. The equitable rule applicable to this case is that the lessees were obligated to commence drilling within a reasonable time after the execution and delivery of the lease. Civ. Code, § 1657. This they utterly failed to do. Under the terms of such a lease, "the grantee cannot omit to drill and develop and hold the grant for speculative purposes purely." Hall v. Augur, 82 Cal. App. 594, 600, 256 P. 232, 235.

[3] There is another feature of the lease which is not discussed in the briefs. Clause No. 2 releases the lessee from doing anything whatever and converts what would otherwise constitute a lease into a mere option, with no time expressed within which the option may be exercised, except that the lessee was to become bound by the terms of the lease upon the discovery of oil on the demised premises. It would be unreasonable to hold the lessors bound by the lease after the lessee and his assigns have failed for so long a time even to commence drilling or to do anything which would bind them to perform the terms of the lease. At the time of the execution of the lease other persons were drilling for oil on an adjoining section of land. A representative of the lessee prepared the lease. It was evidently designed to give the lessee all the benefits which would flow from the discovery of oil on such adjoining land without incurring any obligation in the event of failure to discover oil thereon.

[4] The provision of paragraph 25 of the lease requiring notice before declaring a forfeiture clearly relates to the covenants of the lease and not to the condition set forth in paragraph (b). Taylor v. Hamilton, 194 Cal. 768, 774, 230 P. 656.

[5] Appellants contend that the court erred in denying them permission to file an amended answer. The proposed amended answer is extremely long, made up largely of evidentiary matter. All material issues raised thereby were properly triable under the original answer, unless it be the alleged estoppel attempted to be set up in the proposed amended answer, and the defendants were permitted to attempt the proof of such estoppel; such proof, however, being insufficient to establish any element of an estoppel against the plaintiffs. The nearest approach to such proof is the testimony of a witness that, prior to the delivery of the lease, the assignment to Steele and the quitclaim deed, he saw a letter, signed he thought by both of the plaintiffs, although he was uncertain as to the signatures, in which it was stated that "the plaintiffs were satisfied with the progress of the work on the lease," and the witness testified, the several instruments were thereupon placed on record by him, who was the escrow holder thereof. It does not appear to whom the letter was directed or the purpose thereof. Neither does it appear in what manner there could have been a compliance with the terms of a lease which at that time had not become effective by delivery.

The defendants offered in evidence a long affidavit signed by Steele, which follows closely the substance and the language of the proposed amended answer. Appellants claim that it was received in evidence, while respondents contend to the contrary. While the record is not clear, it may be conceded, for the purposes of this opinion, that, by stipulation of the parties, such parts of the affidavit as are not hearsay were received in evidence. Excluding the hearsay parts of the affidavit, there is nothing therein which, with the other evidence relied on by the appellants, would justify findings and judgment in favor of the appellants.

The judgment is affirmed.

All concur.

OSCAR KRENZ COPPER & BRASS WORKS
Inc. v. ENGLAND et al.

CHARLES M. BAILEY CO. v. SAME.

Civ. 7219.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California.

Nov. 22, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 22, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 19, 1931.

1. Partnership ⇨218(3).

Where evidence is open to more than one inference, existence of copartnership is question for jury, or for court sitting as jury.

2. Partnership ⇨17.

Parties may incur liability of partners, notwithstanding their intention.

3. Partnership ⇨20.

Law will not countenance contrivances for obtaining advantages of partnership, without its liabilities.

4. Partnership ⇨5.

Sharing of profits, although element of partnership, does not necessarily constitute partnership relation (Civ. Code, § 2395).

5. Partnership ⇨22.

Although partnership relation may be established even if words partner or partnership are not used, their presence or absence may be significant, where existence of partnership is doubtful.

6. Partnership ⇨49.

That one party had no voice in control of business is relevant in determining whether copartnership exists (Civ. Code, § 2395).

7. Partnership ⇨55.

Evidence held to support conclusion that no partnership existed, precluding creditors' recovery, where alleged partner granted right to manufacture under patent, and received royalty (Civ. Code, § 2395).

Evidence showed that defendant, alleged to be M.'s partner, granted to M. exclusive right to manufacture and sell paint-spraying machines, and agreed to advance certain sum for advertising, to be repaid from first profits; that all manufacturing, buying and selling was done by M.; that defendant took no part in arranging for location of business or leasing of premises; that M. purchased office equipment and engaged and directed employees; that defendant was not authorized to draw checks on bank account of concern, and had no access to books; and that he exercised no supervision over business, and gave M. no instructions respecting its management.

8. Appeal and error ⇨996.

Where evidence is not conflicting, but inferences fairly deducible therefrom are such that different conclusions may rationally be drawn, judge's decision cannot be disturbed.

9. Appeal and error ⇨1008(1).

Judge's interpretation of ambiguous writing, if tenable, and apparently, under circumstances, consistent with parties' intent and meaning, cannot be disturbed.

10. Appeal and error ⇨1011(1).

Weight of conflicting testimony, in trial without jury, is for court (Code Civ. Proc. § 1847).

11. Appeal and error ⇨1011(1).

Where testimony in trial without jury is conflicting, court's determination is conclusive (Code Civ. Proc. § 1847).

Appeals from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Michael J. Roche, Judge.

Actions by the Oscar Krenz Copper & Brass Works, Inc., and by the Charles M. Bailey Company, against W. A. England and another, doing business under the firm name and style of the Dunn Painting Machine Company.

From respective judgments for defendant named, plaintiffs appeal.

Affirmed.

Byron Coleman, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Sloss & Ackerman, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

The above actions were brought to recover for goods alleged to have been sold and delivered to defendants W. A. England and H. E. Moss. The trial court found in favor of England, who will be hereinafter referred to as the defendant, and the plaintiffs have appealed from the respective judgments entered in his favor.

About the year 1916 the defendant with one Dunn became interested in developing a paint-spraying machine, upon which Dunn subsequently procured letters patent. The business of manufacturing and selling the machine was, pursuant to an agreement with the patentee, conducted under the name of Dunn's Paint Machine Co. In 1917 defendant filed in the office of the clerk of the city and county of San Francisco a certificate, in which he declared himself to be the only person interested in the business. The business was continued until 1922, when Dunn died, whereupon defendant ceased to manufacture. It appears, however, that he continued to sell such machines as had been previously manufactured until, according to his testimony, the demand ceased. In June, 1925, defendant entered into an agreement with Dunn's widow, who had become the owner of the patent, whereby he was granted the right upon the payment of certain royalties to manufacture and sell the machines. Thereafter, in October, 1925, an agreement was made between defendant, therein called the licensor, and H. E. Moss, called the licensee, whereby defendant granted to Moss the exclusive right to manufacture and sell the machines, the latter agreeing to perform the contract between defendant and Mrs. Dunn. It was further agreed that defendant should advance to Moss the sum of $750, which was to be expended for advertising, the same to be repaid from the first profits realized. Moss was also granted the right to use the name "Dunn Painting Machine Company," it being agreed that he would file a certificate, as required by statute, showing that he was doing business under that name. The latter further agreed to direct the sales and devote his entire time to the development of the business, and pay to the defendant monthly as a royalty 50 per cent. of the profits thereof. The agreement provided that whenever the net profits of the business should amount to $30,000 then the business should be incorporated, the assets transferred to the corporation and the capital stock of the corporation divided, defendant to receive 51 per cent. and Moss 49 per cent. thereof. It was also stipulated that the arrangement should continue for one year, and if at the end of that period the business showed a profit of not less than $600 per month the contract, at the option of Moss, should continue for another year, and thereafter as long as the same minimum profit should be maintained.

It appears that Moss, who had been employed as secretary for a trade association, of which the Eng-Skell Company was a member, was without capital. Defendant, who was president of the company last named, testified that when the contract was made he did not contemplate the advancement of any money to Moss, as the latter assured him that arrangements had been made for funds to carry on the business. Shortly after Moss commenced operations, however, he applied to defendant for advances to cover his living expenses, stating that he had been unable to procure the capital expected. These defendant agreed to make, and monthly payments were made to Moss for this purpose by the Eng-Skell Company at defendant's request. No capital appears to have been procured by Moss, and at his request defendant continued to make advances for the purpose of carrying on the business. There was advanced between October 14, 1925, and May 14, 1927, sums aggregating $7,820. This included the advances for living expenses and the amount which, under the contract, was to be advanced for advertising purposes. These amounts were unsecured and no part thereof was repaid.

In addition to the above there were advanced by defendant between June 7 and September 2, 1927, sums aggregating $8,914.62. These advances were made upon the security of assigned accounts due the concern, and of these accounts Moss collected and defendant was repaid therefrom the sum of $8,795.49. Defendant also indorsed two notes executed by Moss, one for $2,000, which Moss paid, and another for $1,250, which remains unpaid.

In June, 1926, Moss, without advising the defendant until after the arrangement had been made, granted to one Charles W. Harris the exclusive right to sell the machines on commission under the name of Dunn Painting Machine Company, Sales Division. Defendant, however, did not disapprove, and the testimony shows that Harris expended approximately $5,000 in furthering the sale of the machines. This arrangement, however, was terminated by Moss in January, 1927, and Harris continued as an employee until May, 1927. The defendant then paid Harris a balance of $400 owing him for commissions and charged the amount to Moss. In October, 1927, Moss became a bankrupt, and his assets were insufficient to pay the claims against the business.

The testimony also shows that all the manufacturing, buying and selling was done by Moss; that defendant took no part in arranging for the location of the business or the leasing of the premises where the same was conducted; that Moss purchased the office equipment and engaged and directed the employees; that defendant was not authorized to draw checks upon the bank account of the concern and had no access to the books; further, that he exercised no supervision over the business or gave Moss instructions respecting its management, nor did the agreement give him the right to do any of these things. It was testified by defendant that he did not intend to form a partnership, and by Moss that he was conducting the business under the described contract.

Except as shown by the documentary evidence mentioned, the above facts were developed by the testimony of Moss and the defendant.

[1] It is urged by appellants that there being no conflict in the evidence the question of the existence of a copartnership is one of law and not of fact, citing Westland v. Post Land Co., 115 Wash. 329, 197 P. 44, 45. While this is the rule when the facts are undisputed, or the question depends upon the interpretation of an unambiguous written instrument, where the evidence is open to more than one inference, the question is one for the jury, or the court sitting as a jury. Stenian v. Tashjian, 178 Cal. 623, 174 P. 883; McNab v. Mills, 199 Cal. 231, 248 P. 657; Eggleston v. Wilson, 211 Ala. 140, 100 So. 89; De Long v. Whitlock (Iowa) 210 N. W. 791; Mathis v. Taylorsville Bank, 136 Ky. 634, 124 S. W. 876; Mersick v. Bilafsky, 205 Mass. 488, 91 N. E. 889; Benoliel v. Homac, 87 N. J. Law, 375, 94 A. 605; Call v. Linn, 112 Or. 1, 228 P. 127; McCoy v. First Nat. Bank of Cleveland, 123 Okl. 170, 252 P. 404; Arava v. Bebe, 48 R. I. 478, 189 A. 302; 47 Cor. Jur., Partnership, § 542, p. 1004.

[2] As contended by appellant, the intention of the parties in transactions of this character is not controlling; and they may, notwithstanding, incur the liability of partners.

[3, 4] It has been held that the mere form of the agreement between them is immaterial if the transaction be in fact a joint adventure for mutual profit; and that the law will not countenance contrivances for giving parties the whole advantage of a partnership without subjecting them to its liabilities. San Joaquin Light & Power Corp. v. Costaloupes, 96 Cal. App. 322, 274 P. 84. On the other hand, it has been held that, although the sharing of profits is one of the elements of the partnership relation, a mere participation in profits does not necessarily constitute a partnership relation. Coward v. Clanton, 122 Cal. 451, 55 P. 147. As stated in Martin v. Sharp & Fellows Co., 34 Cal. App. 584, 168 P. 373, after quoting the Code definition of a partnership (Civ. Code, § 2395): "Under this definition, a mere participation in profit and loss does not necessarily constitute a partnership, for, as said in Dwinel v. Stone, 30 Me. 384, 'there must be such a community of interest as empowers each party to make contracts, incur liabilities, manage the whole business, * * * a right which, upon the dissolution of the partnership, * * * passes to the survivor, and not to the representatives of the deceased.' * * * The association must be for the purpose of jointly carrying on the business." To the same effect are the cases of Prince v. Lamb, 128 Cal. 120, 60 P. 689, and Auditorium Co. v. Barsotti, 40 Cal. App. 592, 181 P. 413.

Moreover, it has been held that it is the sharing of profits as such which constitutes prima facie evidence of a partnership, and that the relation is not established by a mere promise to pay a share of the profits as compensation for services (Coward v. Clanton, supra), or for the use of property (Nofsinger v. Goldman, 122 Cal. 609, 55 P. 425; Vanderhurst v. De Witt, 95 Cal. 57, 30 P. 94, 20 L. R. A. 595), or, as in the case of Wheeler v. Farmer, 38 Cal. 203, where one party in consideration of a right granted by the other, who was the inventor of a machine, agreed to make and vend the machine at his own expense, procure letters patent thereon to the inventor, and pay the latter a percentage of the profits of sale.

[5, 6] A partnership relation was not mentioned in the agreement; and while the existence of the relation may be established though the words partner or partnership are not used, the presence or absence of such words may be significant, where the circumstances leave the question in doubt. Smith v. Schultz, 89 Cal. 526, 26 P. 1087. And it has also been held that the fact that one party was given no voice in the control of the business is relevant. Another fact, which doubtless had weight with the trial court, was that defendant was under no obligation to advance anything to Moss other than the $750 which was to be used for advertising purposes and repaid.

[7-9] The evidence taken as a whole is sufficient to support the conclusion of the trial court that no partnership existed. Though there is no conflict in the evidence, the inferences fairly deducible therefrom were such that different conclusions might rationally be drawn; and where this is the case the conclusion reached by the trial court cannot be disturbed on appeal. MacDermot v. Hayes, 175 Cal. 95, 170 P. 616. The same rule applies where a writing is ambiguous and the interpretation given thereto by the trial court is tenable, and one which under all the circumstances appears consistent with the true intent and meaning of the parties. Manley v. Pacific Mill & Lumber Co., 79 Cal. App. 641, 250 P. 710.

[10, 11] One of the plaintiffs, namely, Oscar Krenz Copper & Brass Works, Inc., sought to show that it extended credit on the representation that defendant was a partner. Its president testified that for several years before the contract between Moss and the defendant was made this company had sold merchandise ordered by defendant, whom they knew, for the account of Dunn Painting Machine Company; that they were told by Moss that defendant was the sole owner of the business; that no notice to the contrary was received, and that credit would not have been extended to Moss except through the belief that defendant was interested in the concern. Moss denied making these statements, and testified that before any merchandise was purchased by him he informed the president of the plaintiff above named of the character of his relations with defendant and showed him the contract between them. The weight to be given to this testimony was a question for the trial court (Code Civ. Proc. § 1847), and where the testimony is conflicting its determination is conclusive on appeal (Crawford v. Stove Pipe Works, 83 Cal. 629, 24 P. 836).

The judgments appealed from are affirmed.

GILBERT v. KRAUSS.

Civ. 166.

FINCH, P. J.

[1] This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment for damages in favor of the plaintiff for personal injuries. Appellant contends that the evidence is insufficient to support the judgment and that the trial court committed reversible error in ruling on the admissibility of evidence. The appellant, however, has failed to point out the alleged erroneous rulings, and therefore this court will not search through the long typewritten transcript in an effort to discover them. Dahlberg v. Dahlberg, 202 Cal. 295, 260 P. 290; Scott v. Hollywood Park Co., 176 Cal. 680, 169 P. 379.

[2] Disregarding the rule that an appellate court is not concerned with the weight of the evidence, the appellant states the evidence in the light most favorable to its contentions. From the statement of facts contained in the appellant's opening brief, it appears that after it had drilled for oil to a depth of about 4,700 feet it attempted to remove the casing from the well. "On the day before the accident, this work was attempted and the casing parted, leaving 18 inches projecting above the floor of the cellar. The cellar is described as an excavation about 4½x6 feet, and with a depth of 7 feet from the top of the floor to the bottom of the cellar. After the casing parted, it became necessary in the performance of the work of straightening it out, to weld another piece of casing to the point where it had been broken off, and plaintiff was employed for this purpose. * * * He climbed down into the cellar and commenced the welding together of the casing. * * * After working approximately five minutes * * * an explosion occurred, as a result of which he suffered severe burns," the injuries for which damages were awarded.

In appellant's brief it is said: "It affirmatively appears from the evidence that a well filled with water or at least filled with water within fifty feet of the surface, was the only precaution available to prevent a gas explosion." There is evidence that the water level in the well at the time of the accident was several hundred feet below the surface of the ground. The plaintiff testified that the superintendent of the defendant assured him that there was no gas in the well and that the well was full of water. From other evidence it reasonably appears that the gas which exploded came from inside the casing. There is ample evidence to support the judgment and it is unnecessary to pursue the subject further.

The judgment is affirmed.

CARY, P. J.

Plaintiff, a real estate broker, brought this action to recover from defendant, also a real estate broker, $607, being one-half of a commission received by defendant from the sale of certain real estate belonging to a third party. The complaint alleged that plaintiff and defendant had entered into an agreement whereby, if plaintiff, either directly or by bringing defendant into communication with a prospective buyer, should procure a purchaser for certain real estate for which defendant was the exclusive sales agent, defendant would pay to plaintiff one-half of any commission defendant might receive through such sale; that plaintiff had procured such a purchaser; that a sale had been made and defendant had received a commission, but had refused to divide it with plaintiff. Defendant's answer denied the existence of such an agreement. The court found that the allegations of the complaint were true and gave judgment for plaintiff.

[1] The defendant urges as grounds for reversal (1) that the finding that there was such a contract is without support in the evidence, and (2) that, even though there were a contract, plaintiff did not perform the services required of him.

[2] Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to plaintiff, as is our duty where, after a decision in his favor, the sufficiency of the evidence is attacked, the facts follow. Plaintiff's office was in the city of San Bernardino, and defendant's was some three miles north of the business district of that city. Defendant came into plaintiff's office and stated that he had the exclusive sales agency for the property in question and would like to have plaintiff help him sell it, stating the amount of the acreage and the price and telling plaintiff that he was willing to split commissions with plaintiff on a 50-50 basis on any deal made with plaintiff's assistance. At this interview a subagent in the employ of plaintiff copied off from defendant's blueprint the outlines of the property in question. The subagent told defendant that plaintiff had a client who he thought would be interested in the land. Defendant told plaintiff he need not bring the client out to the property, but could send him to defendant, who would show him the property, and, if a sale was made, plaintiff would get one-half of the commission. Plaintiff's subagent testified that he took the prospective buyer to the land, explained to him that it would be to the buyer's advantage to purchase it, and that for a month and a half he discussed the matter daily with the prospective purchaser both while on the land and off of it. He further testified that he gave the prospective purchaser the sketch of the property taken from defendant's blueprint and told the purchaser that it was satisfactory for the purchaser to deal direct with the defendant. The prospective purchaser, who eventually did purchase the property, testified that he became interested in the deal through plaintiff's subagent, that the subagent took him to the property many times and pointed out its advantages and gave him the details regarding price, acreage, etc. He corroborated generally the statement of plaintiff's subagent and testified that, although the deal was closed with defendant direct, yet it was the efforts of plaintiff's subagent which caused him to purchase the property. On the witness stand defendant, while denying the agreement, did admit that he had told plaintiff he would be glad to have plaintiff co-operate with him, and on cross-examination stated by that that he had meant that, if plaintiff actually made a sale for him, there would be something in it for plaintiff, although he had not told plaintiff so.

[3] In defendant's brief a very earnest argument is made as to why the court should have disbelieved the evidence offered on behalf of the plaintiff and why the inferences from the admitted facts would tend to substantiate defendant's version of the transaction. However, the fact remains that the plaintiff, his employee, and the person who actually bought the property all gave testimony in support of plaintiff's claim and directly contradicted the evidence of the defendant, while the testimony of the defendant in its most material parts was not corroborated from any source. The entire matter is therefore one of conflict of the evidence, and, there being sufficient evidence in the record to support the findings of the trial court, that court's conclusion as to where the truth lay is conclusive.

The judgment is affirmed.

BARNARD, J.

These two actions were consolidated for trial, and, from a judgment entered as applying to each case, this appeal is taken.

The plaintiffs in each case are the owners of a lot 25 feet wide and 50 feet deep, on the outskirts of the Huntington Beach oil field. The two lots adjoin, and, taken together, formed a unit of land large enough to hold a derrick for drilling, but not of sufficient size to hold such a derrick and also the boiler and other equipment necessary to operate the same. The defendants in these two cases were the owners of a lease upon another lot situated 117 feet from the lots owned by these plaintiffs, upon which they drilled what is referred to in the lease contracts here in question as the first well. The defendants undertook to lease the two lots separately owned by the plaintiffs, and to drill for oil thereon by using power brought from their power plant installed in connection with the first well. The first lease with plaintiffs Wooton was signed on July 24, 1926, and a second or substitute lease with the same plaintiffs was signed on September 28, 1926. The lease with plaintiff Seeger was signed on August 6, 1926. Each of these leases referred to the above-mentioned first well, and then to a second well to be drilled upon the lots owned by these plaintiffs. Neither of the leases contains any provision as to when the first well is to be commenced or completed, but each lease provides that the second well is to be commenced after the discovery of oil in paying quantities in the first well, and thereupon the lessees are "to commence drilling operations within ninety days thereafter and continuously operate one string of tools until said second well has been drilled with due diligence to a depth of 4,000 feet unless oil in paying quantities is discovered at a lesser depth." Each of the leases also contains the following provision: "The lessee may at any time before discovery of oil on the demised premises quitclaim the real property or any part thereof to the Lessor, his successors or assigns, and thereupon all rights and obligations of the parties hereto one to the other, shall thereupon cease and determine as to the premises quitclaimed."

Each of the leases provides for a royalty to the lessors of a certain percentage of the oil that might be produced from the second well, together with a bonus of a percentage royalty interest in the first well. As such bonus, out of the proceeds from the first well the plaintiffs received over $4,100. The defendants subleased the property to one Cather, and thereafter Cather, together with defendants and their respective wives, made another sublease to one Fred W. Roberts. Roberts entered upon the property, and sunk a well thereon to a depth of 400 feet, when the work was abandoned. The court found that the work was abandoned for the reason "that prior to the time that the respective leases required the defendants to drill and complete the well on the leased property, the field had been intensively drilled by other operators and the oil supply therein practically exhausted." These actions were filed, seeking to recover damages for alleged breach of agreement in failing to drill on time, and also for alleged misrepresentations. After a trial before the court without a jury, judgment was entered in favor of the defendants, and this appeal followed.

Each complaint sets forth five causes of action. A motion for a nonsuit was granted as to the fourth cause of action. No appeal followed that order, leaving four causes of action to be considered here.

[1] The first cause of action is for damages for failure to use due diligence in carrying on drilling operations to a depth of 4,000 feet. Appellants point out that, when the Wooton lease was signed on July 24, 1926, it referred to the property on which the first well was located, saying: "Operations for drilling an oil well have already been commenced thereon." It is pointed out that there was evidence that it took 64 days to complete the first well, that it was spudded in on September 12 and brought in November 15. It is then argued that, had the first well been started on July 24, 1926, as represented by the clause in the lease last above quoted, this well would have come in by September 26, 1926. This is the first breach of contract relied upon. Not only does it appear that it required both of these lots to make room for the installation of a derrick and that the Seeger lease was not signed until August 6, but we are unable to put any such interpretation upon the contract. To say that operations for drilling an oil well have already been commenced is far from an assertion that drilling has already been commenced. Many things are necessary to be done in getting ready to drill an oil well. The contract is silent as to when the first well was to be begun. If, as argued by appellants, it is a necessary implication that the first well was to be drilled and completed as soon as possible, nothing appears herein to indicate that the beginning of actual drilling on September 12 was an unreasonable delay.

[2] With the assumption that the first well should have been completed on September 26, 1926, it is next argued that the second well should have been begun immediately thereafter, and that the same would have been completed in 64 days, or by December 27, 1926, at the latest. The argument is made that the real intention of the parties was to provide that the second well should be drilled as soon as the first one came in; that the 90-day period for commencing the second well was intended to apply only in the event the production in the first well should be so small that such time would be required to determine whether or not it was a paying well; and that it is necessarily implied by law that, when the first well came in with a good production, the lessees did not have the 90 days provided for in the contract within which to commence drilling the second well. To state this contention is almost to answer it. Not only does the contract govern, but it is self-evident that it requires some time to assemble sufficient equipment to drill an oil well. Even if we could discard the contract and apply the reasonable time rule, we are unable to say that 90 days was an unreasonable time, in the absence of any evidence upon that point.

[3] That the work on the well was later abandoned because production in surrounding wells decreased to an extent that made drilling seem unprofitable is undisputed. Appellants' cause of action is based upon the theory that the delay of respondents in drilling deprived them of an income that would otherwise have been available before this portion of the field became depleted. By the reasoning referred to, it is insisted that the second well should have been brought in by December 7, 1926. Appellants quote a witness as giving the opinion that a well on their lots would have been profitable until February, 1927, and that in May, 1927, an average production of 100 barrels a day from such a well could have been expected. Reference is also made to a number of surrounding wells, which are said to have been brought in successfully in January, 1927. Based upon production in some other wells, appellants estimate that they would have received from the second well over $11,000 between December 7, 1926, and October 31, 1928. It was stipulated that the second well was begun within 90 days after the completion of the first well, which is all that was required by the contract. Our attention has been called to no evidence whatever of any lack of diligence upon the part of respondents, or their sublessees, in drilling the second well, until the time drilling operations were abandoned. The court found this was in June, 1927. This finding is not questioned, and, in the absence of any showing, we must assume it to be supported by the evidence. No possible claim of damage could then arise until after that date.

[4-8] The evidence further shows that a quitclaim deed conveying the land back to appellants was executed on November 20, 1927, and recorded February 24, 1928. Under the clause of the contract permitting the lessee to quitclaim the real property, the lessee was under no obligation to continue the drilling. Dabney v. Key, 57 Cal. App. 762, 207 P. 921; Sheehan v. Vedder (Cal. App.) 292 P. 175. Any possible claim for damages after the work was abandoned could only be based upon the delay of the respondents in quitclaiming the property. Appellants call our attention to section 1055 of the Civil Code, which provides: "A grant duly executed is presumed to have been delivered at its date." It would therefore appear that the work was abandoned in June and the quitclaim deed was not delivered until November. However, no such theory is set up in the complaints, these being based upon the other theory that the well should have been completed around December 1, 1926. Even if the theory of delay in quitclaiming the property was properly before us, no evidence appears to show that any such quitclaims were ever demanded by the appellants or refused by the respondents. It would appear that appellants should have at least re-entered the property and minimized the damage. Upon the abandoning of the work, the appellants had a right of re-entry to the property. Acme Oil & Mining Co. v. Williams, 140 Cal. 681, 74 P. 296; Brookshire v. Casmalia Co., 156 Cal. 211, 103 P. 927; Taylor v. Hamilton, 194 Cal. 768, 230 P. 656. In addition, the court found that no damage had been suffered by appellants. If such evidence of damage as is pointed out could be considered, the record is devoid of any evidence from which it could be told what part thereof arose after June, 1927, up to which time defendants were within their rights under the contract so far as shown by the record. The only evidence as to damage set forth relates to the amount of production in other wells, which, in itself, is somewhat remote and speculative. Escondido Oil Co. v. Glaser, 144 Cal. 494, 77 P. 1040; McComber v. Kellerman, 162 Cal. 749, 124 P. 431; Allen v. Narver, 178 Cal. 202, 172 P. 980. The showing made as to the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain this finding is not sufficient to set the same aside.

[9, 10] In the second cause of action it is alleged that the sublease to one Cather, which is above referred to, was executed on July 22, 1926, prior to the time the leases here in question were signed by the plaintiffs. It is further alleged that this sublease provided that the said Cather would pay to the defendants $2,500 for the location, and also that the said lease contained the following provision: "It being impossible to estimate the damages for failure to drill the two wells, as described herein, it is agreed by and between the parties that if Lessee fails to drill the well on the part or portion of Lots 19 and 21 more fully described herein, then Lessee shall pay $5000 in oil out of the first well drilled on Lots 2 and 4, Block 218, as provided herein, payable out of 25% of Lessee's share of production."

It is alleged that this sublease was concealed from the plaintiffs, and that at all times in question the defendants were trustees for the plaintiffs, and, as such, were bound to reveal to them the terms of the Cather sublease, and the prayer is for $7,500 damages for the withholding of information concerning the same. The complaint neither alleges any facts showing the existence of such a trusteeship nor does the record show any proof of such a relation. There is no proof that such information was suppressed or withheld, other than the fact that the appellants testified that they knew nothing of the sublease. No reason appears either from the complaint or the evidence why the respondents were in duty bound to inform appellants of this lease. Nothing is pointed out to show that the court's finding that the defendants did not willfully or otherwise conceal the existence of this sublease from the plaintiffs is not supported by the evidence. The fifth cause of action covers the same matter, but alleges that the defendants, as trustees for the plaintiffs, received $7,500 from Cather, for which they have failed to account. While the evidence shows that respondents received $5,000 under the terms of the Cather sublease, there are neither sufficient facts alleged in the complaint to show such a trusteeship nor evidence to support such allegations, had they been made.

[11] The third cause of action is based upon the theory that the respondents induced the appellants to enter into these leases by stating that the terms thereof were as favorable as could be obtained from any responsible parties, which statement is shown to have been false and fraudulent by the fact that they then had a sublease with Cather, upon more favorable terms. It is also charged that the only object of defendants was to collect the penalty from Cather, and that they had no intention of drilling upon plaintiffs' property. Aside from other considerations, no evidence is called to our attention to support such allegations. Even if the respondents had already entered into the Cather sublease at the time (the court found to the contrary), it by no means follows that appellants could have secured a similar lease, especially if they were unable to furnish power, to offset the lack of room for a power plant upon the property.

For reasons given, the judgment is affirmed.

Muhleman, Anderson & Palmer, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SCHMIDT, Justice pro tem.

By the second amended complaint filed in the lower court, respondent sought to recover from appellants the reasonable value of services rendered by him in the capacity of a real estate broker, to appellants as real estate brokers in connection with an exchange of certain properties owned by appellants' principal, one A. M. Mull on the one hand, and L. H. Wilson, Inc., on the other. The first cause of action is based on a written agreement to pay a reasonable compensation for the services alleged to have been rendered, and the second and third causes of action are based upon an oral agreement to pay such compensation. Appellants denied the performance of any services by respondent, the making of any agreement, the receipt of any commission by them and the reasonable value of the services performed by respondent, and by way of separate defenses appellants alleged that there was no consideration for the agreement alleged; that the contract sued upon fell within the provisions of section, 1624, Civil Code, and was therefore void and that respondent acted as the agent of L. H. Wilson from whom he accepted a commission without disclosing that fact to appellants and for that reason was not entitled to any further compensation.

The court found that there was an agreement between appellants and their principal, Mull, whereby Mull listed his property for sale or exchange with appellants, giving them the exclusive right to sell or trade it, and that same was subsequently traded to one Wilson, and that respondent in its capacity as a duly licensed real estate broker rendered services to the appellants in assisting appellants in disposing of the property belonging to Mull, and that said services were rendered at the special instance and request of said appellants; that in consideration for said services so rendered by respondent, appellants promised to pay plaintiff a reasonable compensation; that such compensation was to be paid out of such commission as appellants received from the said Mull in effecting a sale or exchange of the Mull property; that respondent and appellants by their joint efforts succeeded in making and causing to be consummated an exchange of the property belonging to Mull and that belonging to Wilson; that as their commission for negotiating and assisting in the bringing about of said exchange appellants received from Mull certain real property of the reasonable value of $13,250; that the reasonable value of the services so rendered by respondent to appellants in assisting in disposing of the property of the appellants' principal, Mull, is the sum of $1,000; that the agreement to pay respondent a reasonable compensation is not barred by section 1624, Civil Code; and rendered judgment in favor of respondent against appellants for the said sum of $1,000. From that judgment appellants have appealed.

The evidence in the case further showed that respondent had received through his salesman, Mr. Chestnut, from one Rogers, who was the agent of Wilson, a commission in the sum of $500 for his services rendered in effecting the exchange between Mull and Wilson, which fact was not revealed to appellants until some time after the escrow instructions in connection with the exchange had been signed, and prior to its completion.

[1] Appellants attack the findings of the trial court that any services were rendered by respondent to appellants, or that there was any promise to pay respondent a reasonable compensation for his said services. The evidence in the case shows that there was a conflict in the testimony on each of these two points. The trial court having found in favor of respondent on each of these matters, this court will not disturb such findings. Johnston v. Porter, 21 Cal. App. 97, 131 P. 69.

[2] Attack is also made on the following finding: "It is not true that plaintiff was employed by the said L. H. Wilson in effecting a sale or exchange of properties with said A. M. Mull." Appellants base their attack on this finding on the ground that respondent, through his salesman, Mr. Chestnut, received $500 from Rogers, the agent of Wilson. The evidence shows that respondent was not acquainted with Mr. Wilson nor was he employed by Mr. Wilson, but that he did assist in consummating the exchange between Mull and Wilson for which services Rogers paid the $500 commission. Under these facts the attack on the finding is without merit.

[3] The court further found that respondent merely aided in bringing Mull and Wilson together, as a result of which the exchange was effected through negotiations between Mull and the agent of Wilson and that respondent in no way represented conflicting interests. The evidence fully supports this finding. In King v. Reed, 24 Cal. App. 229, 141 P. 41, it was held that a broker who merely brings the buyer and seller together so that they are thereby able to make their own contract is a "middleman"; that he does not occupy a fiduciary relation; that he does not represent conflicting interests and therefore that he is not precluded from receiving compensation from both parties to the sale. And in Carothers v. Caine, 38 Cal. App. 71, 175 P. 478, 479, it was held to the same effect and that it is immaterial in such case that either party is unaware of the employment by the other; that the rule "that an agent, acting for both parties and for each without the knowledge of the other, can collect commission from neither, applies only to agents stricti juris, and not to middlemen."

Attack is made upon the finding of the court that the value of the commission received by appellants was $13,250 is unsupported by the evidence, and appellants also attack the finding of the court that the reasonable value of the services rendered by respondent to appellants in the transaction is the sum of $1,000 as not being supported by the evidence. As to each of these findings there was a conflict of testimony which precludes this court from disturbing either finding.

[4] Further contention is made that the purported agreement not being in writing was unenforceable and in violation of section 1624, Civil Code, commonly called the statute of frauds. This contention is untenable. It has been repeatedly held that an agreement between brokers to split commissions need not be in writing. In Johnston v. Porter, supra, at page 102 of 21 Cal. App., 131 P. 69, 71, we find: "Subdivision 6 of section 1624 of the Civil Code, which declares an agreement authorizing or employing an agent or broker to sell real estate for a compensation or commission to be invalid unless reduced to writing, was designed only for the protection of real estate owners against the unfounded claims of brokers; and it was never intended to be applied to contracts between brokers co-operating in the sale of real property and agreeing to share commissions earned as a result of such sale." Citing Gorham v. Heiman, 90 Cal. 346, 27 P. 289; Casey v. Richards, 10 Cal. App. 57, 101 P. 36, and Baker v. Thompson, 14 Cal. App. 175, 111 P. 373.

[5] Complaint is made that over the objection of appellants, testimony was received that it was the custom between brokers to split commissions, when custom had not been pleaded. However, no finding was made on the custom. On the contrary, the finding was on a specific promise to pay. The error, if any, was entirely harmless.

Judgment affirmed.

EVEN v. PICKWICK STAGES SYSTEM.
Civ. 4086.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

Nov. 18, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 18, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 12, 1931.

1. Carriers ⇨320(30).

Whether excessive speed or broken steering gear was proximate cause of bus running off road and over grade held for jury.

Assuming that there was a latent defect in part of steering gear and that highest degree of care had been exercised by carrier to discover it in accordance with testimony to that effect, nevertheless evidence in respect to excessive speed, as testified to by several witnesses, presented jury question in respect to proximate cause of accident.

2. Appeal and error ⇨1064(4).

Instruction respecting presumption of negligence on part of carrier, even though incorrect as not using "inference," was not prejudicial.

Since, if the word "inference" had been used instead of the word "presumption," the court would then have directed jury that, if they found the facts as first stated in the instruction, there would arise an inference of negligence which would throw on carrier the burden of showing that accident occurred without negligence on its part, and that is all that they were told to require as a result of the presumption stated, the word "presumption" was used to convey the same meaning, and was limited to the same effect, as the word "inference," which might properly have been used.

3. Damages ⇨132(1).

$2,500 for injuries consisting of cuts in head, broken ribs, and cut on ear leaving scar, held not excessive.

4. Appeal and error ⇨1004(1).

Finding of jury on question of damages will not be disturbed unless so grossly disproportionate to compensation reasonably warranted, as to shock sense of justice.

Theodore Hale and Barry J. Colding, both of San Francisco, B. P. Gibbs, of Los Angeles, and Mannon & Brazier, of Ukiah, for appellant.

Thomas C. Anglim and L. E. Johnston, both of Napa, Charles Reagh and Martin Pence, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

Mr. Justice Pro Tem. SHIELDS delivered the opinion of the court.

The defendant corporation operated an autostage system during the month of August, 1928, between Clear Lake, in Lake county, and Ukiah, in Mendocino county. On August 24, 1928, one of the stages so operated by defendant ran off the road, over a steep grade, about eight miles easterly from Ukiah. The plaintiff was a passenger in the stage, and was injured as a result of this accident. He prosecuted this action to recover damages for his injuries, and was awarded a judgment from which this appeal was taken.

It is first contended for the appellant that there was no evidence offered which justified the judgment, and that the judgment is without support in the evidence. We think, however, that the record shows the contrary. It appears that the road over which the autostage operated was wide and well surfaced, and that it passed through a mountainous country for almost its entire length. At and approaching where the accident occurred, the road wound, in a series of sharp curves, along a cliff about forty-five feet above a creek or stream which is a tributary of the Russian river. The stage proceeded for some time at the rate of about thirty-five miles per hour. When it reached the "highway," it increased its speed to forty miles per hour. About a mile and a half before reaching the point of the accident, the driver took out and looked at his watch, and then increased his speed. He did not slow up in going around curves. He had been driving about forty miles per hour, and he increased this speed up to between forty and forty-five miles per hour. Just beyond what is known as the Cleveland bridge, there was an "S" curve, one turn of which was sharp to the left. The driver entered this curve going at the rate of about forty miles per hour, increasing this speed to the point of the accident. One witness testified that just after passing the bridge the stage began going "towards the edge of the bank." The plaintiff testified: "Just after crossing the bridge I noticed he (the driver) was going pretty fast and got off into the soft dirt, and tried to get back into the highway again—just going so fast he couldn't make it, and went over the grade." The speed of the car was such that it went seventy or eighty feet before it struck the bank.

When the car became unmanageable, the driver left the wheel, and sought to leave the stage. He did not use the brakes. The foregoing evidence was presented by the plaintiff. In its defense, the defendant presented the driver of the stage as a witness, who testified that the stage had been in control until just before the accident, when the steering gear broke, that the car would not respond to the wheel, and that "the wheel spun in his hand," and that "the car turned at a sharp angle, and went over the cliff." In support of this theory, defendant produced the "drag link," a part of the steering apparatus of the stage which was picked up near the scene of the accident by some disinterested party. It is unnecessary here to detail the character or function of this "drag link"; it being sufficient to say that it constituted an essential feature of the steering gear. Defendant then produced a witness who testified that the day before, in Ukiah, he had inspected the autostage involved in this case, and the steering gear as well, and had found the latter to be in apparent good condition. This evidence was produced for the purpose of showing that the accident had occurred through a defect in the steering gear, that that defect was latent, and that due care had been exercised in an effort to discover such defects. But, in contradiction of the first witness that the stage "turned a sharp angle, and went over the cliff," plaintiff produced two apparently disinterested persons, who testified that they examined the tracks of the car on the curve, and that they led in a straight line, ninety or one hundred feet, to the point where the stage "went over the cliff." And, with reference to the examination or inspection which the witness made, who inspected the stage at Ukiah, the day before the happening of the accident, the cross-examination of this witness developed such details of the examination as made it a question for the jury, whether or not the examination he made was of such a character as to constitute the high degree of care required of a carrier of passengers for hire.

[1] But, assuming that there was a latent defect in the part of the steering gear involved and that the highest degree of care had been exercised by defendant to discover it and that it had been unable to do so, plaintiff contends that it was still a question for the jury as to whether or not this defect and the subsequent breaking was the proximate cause of the accident. In this we think plaintiff is correct. He had introduced evidence from which the jury could properly have found, and evidently did find, that at the time of the accident the stage was being driven at an excessive rate of speed, and it was for the jury, as between these two causes, the broken steering gear and the excessive speed, to find which was the proximate one.

The cases of Johnsen v. Oakland, etc., Electric Ry., 127 Cal. 608, 60 P. 170, and Siemens v. Oakland, etc., Ry., 134 Cal. 496, 66 P. 672, very interestingly state the theories upon which, in such a state of the evidence, the jury may find a verdict for the plaintiff. These theories, in so far as they arise in this case, are very admirably set forth in the brief of respondent herein to the effect that the jury might have found from the evidence that the proximate cause of the accident was the excessive speed at which the stage was operated, if they should deem the stage to have been so operated; that the breaking of the steering apparatus would not have occurred if the car had not been so operated; that the car would not have gone over the bank, notwithstanding the broken gear, if it had been traveling at a safe speed; that the car could have been stopped before going over the bank if the driver, traveling at a safe rate of speed, had applied his brakes; or that the car could have been stopped in any event, if the brakes had been applied. The issues were very properly submitted to the jury, and their verdict for the plaintiff is so substantially supported by the evidence that we will not attempt to disturb it.

Appellant contends that the use of the word "presumption" in this instruction was erroneous; that it is not a presumption, but an inference which arises in such circumstances. But, an identical instruction with the one given herein, and as above quoted, was given and expressly approved in Jones v. United Railroads, 54 Cal. App. 744, 202 P. 919. The law was stated to be exactly as stated in this instruction in McCurrie v. S. P. Co., 122 Cal. 558, 55 P. 324, and an instruction quoting this statement was expressly approved in Cody v. Market Street Ry., 148 Cal. 90, 82 P. 666. The law was again so stated in Bonneau v. North Shore R. R. Co., 152 Cal. 406, 93 P. 106, 107, 125 Am. St. Rep. 68, where Mr. Justice Lorigan says that "this has been the rule in this state for upwards of 40 years." It is, however, true that in a later case, where an instruction was requested of the court in which the word "presumption" was used as in the case before us, and where the trial judge changed the word to "inference," the Supreme Court said that this was properly done. Dowd v. Atlas T. & A. Service Co., 187 Cal. 523, 202 P. 870. In announcing this opinion, the court cites Bonneau v. North Shore R. R.

Co., above, with approval, and, without reference to the decisions above cited, it named, in support of its opinion, Valente v. Sierra Ry. Co., 151 Cal. 534, 91 P. 481, where an instruction similar to the one in the case under discussion had been given, using the word "presumption" was approved in that particular, and O'Connor v. Mennie, 169 Cal. 217, 146 P. 674, where the word "presumption" is repeatedly used in the sense criticised in the present case. It is interesting to note that, in the very instruction in which in the Dowd Case it was held that it was not error to change the word "presumption" to "inference" the word "presumption" is later used in exactly the same sense in which it was used where the court changed it to the word "inference." In such a state of the law, it certainly cannot be regarded as reversible error for the court to have used the word "presumption" in the instruction given in this case. There is a distinct difference in the meaning of the words "presumption" and "inference." Thomas v. Visalia Electric R. Co., 169 Cal. 658, 147 P. 972. It may be conceded that the use of the word "presumption" in the instruction under consideration was incorrect, but, if so, the defendant was not injured by it. If the word "inference" had been used, the court would then have directed the jury that, if they found the facts as first stated in the instruction, there would then arise an inference of negligence which would throw on defendant the burden of showing that the accident occurred without negligence on its part. As this is all that they were told to require as a result of the presumption stated, no harm was done defendant by its use. In other words, the word "presumption" was used to convey the same meaning, and was limited to the same effect as the word "inference," which might properly have been used.

[3, 4] The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $2,800, of which sum $2,500 was for general damages. Defendant contends that this sum was excessive. There was evidence from which it appears that the plaintiff received a cut in the head which it took six stitches to close; he received a broken rib, and one of his ears was cut, from which a scar remains. He was confined to his home with a physician in attendance for a month or more, and, when he returned to the place of his employment, he was not able to do his work as formerly. At the time of the trial, near nine months after the accident, the place where his head had been cut was still tender, his chest "bothered him," and he had not recovered the full use of one of his arms. Following the accident, he suffered severe pain, which continued for some time. The amount of damage, which one sustains from pain and suffering and injury such as have been stated is necessarily difficult of assessment. Verdicts in such cases should not be lightly set aside, and courts of appeal are only justified in interposing their judgment against that of a jury, in extreme cases. The rule in such cases is well stated as follows: "Unless we are able to say that the award of the jury and sustained by the trial court was so grossly disproportionate to any compensation reasonably warranted by the facts as presented to us on appeal as to shock the sense of justice, and raise at once a strong presumption that it was the result of passion, prejudice or corruption, rather than honest or sober judgment, this court may not exercise the power of revision." Kelley v. Hodge Trans. System, 197 Cal. 598, 242 P. 76; Sellers v. Wood Hydraulic, etc., Co., 205 Cal. 519, 271 P. 1055; Smith v. Royer, 181 Cal. 165, 183 P. 660; Gregoriev v. N. W. Pac. Ry., 95 Cal. App. 428, 273 P. 76; Hasty v. Trevillian, 102 Cal. App. 405, 283 P. 148; Reneau v. Hirsch, 88 Cal. App. 1, 262 P. 1100.

Under this rule, and governed by its wise policy, the award here will not be disturbed.

The judgment is affirmed.

Mr. Justice Pro Tem. SHIELDS delivered the opinion of the court.

The plaintiff herein was a fellow passenger with Robert O. Even, in an autostage, which in August, 1928, left the road and plunged over a cliff some forty feet into a creek bed. Each was injured, and each brought an action to recover the damage they had respectively sustained. Each recovered a judgment, from which in each instance an appeal was taken. In the case of Even v. Pickwick Stages System (Cal. App.) 293 P. 700, a decision has this day been filed.

In the case now before us, the trial was by a jury which rendered a verdict for the plaintiff for $12,500 general damages. The evidence upon the question of negligence was substantially identical with the evidence in the Even Case. In this appeal from the judgment in the case now before us, the defendant makes little contention as to any failure of proof of negligence on its behalf. However, that question has been answered adversely to defendant in the case of Even v. Pickwick Stages System, above referred to. This leaves defendant's contention that the verdict is excessive, so excessive as to bear evidence that it was rendered under the influence of passion and prejudice as the sole question to be disposed of.

On behalf of plaintiff, evidence was given that at the time of the trial she was of the age of about 33 years, and up to the time of the accident was of sound health. As a result of the accident, in addition to apparently minor injuries, she received a cut over the left eye, which severed all of the tissues down to the bone. This cut severed "the supra-orbital branch of the trigeminal nerve" and healed by the formation of scar tissue. Many painful symptoms followed, and her physician testified that in his opinion she was suffering from "a trigeminal neuralgia." In treating this, he had injected the nerve with alcohol, which brought relief for only a short time. He stated that the next step in treatment involved a capital operation. Plaintiff herself testified to many consequences of her injuries, which are summarized by appellant in its brief as follows: "That for the first time in her life she suffered after the accident from falling eyesight, insomnia, loss of weight, chronic headache, dizziness, nervousness, irritability, lack of energy, bad dreams, in place of 'occasional pleasant dreams' before the accident, generally poor health, lump on forehead occasionally, not able to wear a hat much of the time, no joy in living, unreasonable fears, afraid to stay at home even in the daytime, no energy, hysteria, uncontrollable laughter and tears, and soiling of bed linen."

Upon being asked a question involving these symptoms, a medical expert testified that in his opinion plaintiff was "suffering from post-traumatic neurosis, plus concussion effects on and of the central nervous system." Asked as to the probable duration of this condition, the physician answered that it was indefinite, and that the prognosis was unfavorable.

The conclusion might reasonably be formed from this evidence, if believed, that this young woman had been grievously injured and her future life greatly burdened. The one alleged consequence of the accident, if true that plaintiff had lost the power of controlling her bodily excretions, so that she soils her clothing with urine and feces, both day and night, and must constantly wear protective linen, would warrant a substantial verdict. The verdict of $12,500 in this case, based upon this evidence, which was the province of the jury to weigh, and which they had a right to and undoubtedly did believe, does not carry the suggestion of passion, prejudice, or corruption, and the judgment rendered upon it is affirmed.

Mr. Justice Pro Tem. SHIELDS delivered the opinion of the court.

This action grew out of the same accident involved in the case of Robert O. Even v. Pickwick Stages System (Cal. App.) 293 P. 700, an opinion in which has this day been filed. This plaintiff was a fellow passenger with Even, and like him was injured in the accident, and brought this action to recover the damages he thereby sustained. This case was heard by the court without a jury, and by stipulation was tried upon the same evidence upon which the Even Case had been tried. The evidence in this case, however, as to the nature of the plaintiff's injuries was different and appropriate to the facts in his case. The court awarded the plaintiff judgment for certain special damages and for $7,000 general damages. From this judgment this appeal was taken; the same questions being raised which were involved in the case of Even v. Pickwick Stages System. The decision in this latter case disposed of all of these points except the contention that the verdict was excessive. This question will be given brief treatment.

The plaintiff before the accident was a piano salesman, who traveled about in his business, frequently going from door to door. In the accident he suffered a dislocated coccyx and a sprained sacroiliac joint. He was taken immediately to the hospital at Ukiah, "suffering terribly." He remained there six days, and was then taken home. He was able to visit his office about the end of September, but could do no work. He began to do some work about the end of October. He continues to have violent pains in his back, he suffers nervous illness, and has trouble with his rectum.

At the time of the trial, he had not been able to work full time. On many days he has to lie down and cannot work at all. He can walk only a few blocks at a time, and then must sit down on account of pain. At the time of the trial, he was unable to sit evenly on both hips, and had to sit on one or the other. He cannot move pianos as he previously did in the conduct of his business, and is unable to play a piano as his business requires, because he cannot sit on a hard surface. He has lost between twelve and fourteen pounds in weight. His health before the accident was "perfect," and his earnings had been about $5,000 per annum. Since the accident he has been able to make no more than $40 per week "at the most." The above statements are from the testimony of plaintiff himself. His physician testified that the dislocation of his coccyx was permanent, and that he did not think he could be restored to complete health without a capital operation.

With regard to the sacroiliac "slip," the witness stated that its condition indicated a bad prognosis. Continuing, he said the "condition is unfavorable." Such evidence, if believed by the court, afforded abundant support for the award made by the court.

For the reasons given in the opinion in Even v. Pickwick Stages System, supra, the judgment is affirmed.

Mr. Justice Pro Tem. SHIELDS delivered the opinion of the court.

This case was tried jointly with the case of Robert O. Even v. Pickwick Stages System, 293 P. 700, an opinion in which case has this day been filed. The parties were fellow passengers in an autostage, which met with an accident in which each of them was injured. The facts in both cases are identical except as to the nature of the injuries sustained by the parties respectively and the amount of the recovery of each. The decision in the case of Even v. Pickwick Stages System is decisive of all points raised in this, except as to whether or not the verdict was excessive.

In addition to special damages, the verdict gave the plaintiff $5,000 as general damages. In support of this verdict, it appears that plaintiff was engaged in the hairdressing business, in Napa, before the accident. In the fall she was hit by a steel trunk, her thigh was injured. When she was raised by a rope from the river, she could not stand on her leg. She was taken to a hospital and thence to her home, where she stayed in bed two or three weeks. She suffered great pain. She was taken in an ambulance to have X-rays taken. She was unable to work at all from August 24 to October 5. At the time of the trial, she had not recovered so as to work as she did before the trial. At that time she stated that she could do a little work but did not seem to get her strength back, and that she did not feel well. She stated that she was "terribly nervous, vomited nearly every day, had indigestion, and had headaches which came on frequently and stayed with her about three days. Her left leg continued to pain her, and throbbed like a toothache." She had gone from 135 pounds in weight to 120; her leg bothered her in walking, and, if she stood on it all day, it "bothered" her. She needed an electric pad every night to relieve her pain.

Her physician testified that the injury to her left thigh was permanent, and that she had suffered a severe shock from which it would take her a long time to recover. Comment on this evidence would seem unnecessary. For the reasons stated in Even v. Pickwick Stages System, we deem the verdict for $5,000 general damages in this case, so sufficiently supported by the evidence that we should not disturb it.

The judgment is affirmed.

HOLLZER, Justice pro tem.

Defendant appeals from a judgment awarded to plaintiffs in the amount of $550 on account of unpaid rent. The facts, which are not in dispute, disclose that under date of August 30, 1924, the plaintiffs and defendant entered into a written lease under which plaintiffs demised to the defendant certain premises for a term of years, and in consideration of which the latter agreed to pay a total rental of $28,050 at the rate of $550 in advance on the first of each month. The lease acknowledged the payment by defendant of the sum of $1,100, "Five Hundred Fifty ($550.-

00) Dollars of which is to cover the first month's rent and Five Hundred Fifty ($550.-00) Dollars as a deposit as a guarantee that said Lessee will perform all the conditions of this lease, and if so performed, will be applied to the last month's rent and if not so performed, is to be retained by the Lessor as a forfeit."

No rent having been paid either for the month of June or the month of July, 1926, the plaintiffs on July 2, 1926, caused a notice to be served on the defendant requiring the latter within three days to pay the sum of $1,100, being the rental for the months of June and July, 1926, or to deliver up possession of the demised premises. On July 3d, the defendant surrendered possession. Several weeks later, plaintiffs instituted the present action to recover the sum of $550 on account of rent due for the month of June, 1926.

Defendant contends, in effect, that because the lease was terminated by its surrender of the premises, pursuant to plaintiffs' demand for the payment of the rent or delivery of possession, and because the defendant is entitled to a credit in the amount of $550, by reason of having deposited this sum with the plaintiffs at the time of the execution of the lease as a guaranty for the performance of the conditions thereof, the plaintiffs should have applied such deposit in payment of the June rent, and hence are not entitled to recover in this action.

[1] We are unable to agree with this contention. It has long been the settled law of this state that, while re-entry by the landlord and his resumption of the benefits, use, and enjoyment of the premises terminates the lease, so far as the landlord's right to rentals subsequent to such entry is concerned, this does not affect the tenant's liability for rent accrued prior to such re-entry. Anheuser-Busch Brewing Association v. American, etc., Co., 59 Cal. App. 718, 723, 211 P. 817, citing Ruling Case Law, page 197. To the same effect, see Wetzler v. Patterson, 73 Cal. App. 527, 532, 238 P. 1077, and the cases therein cited.

[2] It being conceded that the defendant did not vacate the premises until after the rentals for the months of June and July, 1926, had accrued, it follows that, at the time defendant surrendered possession, the latter was indebted to plaintiffs in the sum of $1,100, subject, however, to a credit by reason of the above-mentioned deposit amounting to $550. Accordingly, this would leave a balance of $550 due from the defendant, and for which plaintiffs would be entitled to judgment against defendant.

For the reasons herein set forth, the judgment is affirmed.

SPENCE, J.

Plaintiff brought this action against defendant to recover for personal injuries received when plaintiff was struck by defendant's automobile truck. Judgment in the sum of $2,250 was entered in favor of plaintiff upon the verdict of the jury. From this judgment defendant appeals.

The accident occurred in a private driveway on the premises of the defendant. Both plaintiff and defendant were dealers in junk, and plaintiff had called at defendant's premises to obtain a chain. In leaving the premises plaintiff stepped into the driveway from defendant's office in the adjacent building. The width of the driveway was twelve feet three inches. Defendant's employee was endeavoring to back the truck from the front of the premises through the driveway and into the yard. The truck was about eight feet wide and with its load of boilers or tanks was estimated to be about ten or eleven feet in width. In operating the car the employee was standing with his left foot on the running board and his right foot on the gas. The truck was moving very slowly until just before the accident. The employee had an assistant straightening the wheels and directing him as he started to back. The truck was moving back and then forward in order to start into the driveway on a straight course. The plaintiff, preceded by a Mr. Cohen, walked along the right side of the driveway toward the front of the premises. The driver was on the left side of the truck and did not see the plaintiff. Plaintiff saw the truck when he was twenty-five feet from it, and the truck was then a few feet over the sidewalk. The sidewalk was fifteen feet three inches in width. Plaintiff was then about ten feet from the corner of the building. He proceeded forward and the truck proceeded to back. Plaintiff testified that the truck did not back straight, and that it increased its speed just before the accident. He stated that there were two piles of junk near the corner of the building, and that he got mixed up and did not know what to do. He flattened himself against the wall at the corner of the building and the truck struck him, causing the injuries.

[1, 2] Appellant contends that the respondent was guilty of negligence as a matter of law. We do not believe that the record supports this contention. The diagrams and photographs used on the trial are not before us and the exact locations and descriptions of the various objects, such as buildings, fences, gates, scales, and piles of junk referred to in the testimony, are not altogether clear. It was respondent's claim that there was sufficient clearance to pass the truck if it had backed on a straight course; and, further, that he had sufficient time to clear the building if the speed of the truck had not been suddenly increased. Contributory negligence is ordinarily a question for the jury. Although the evidence might have warranted an implied finding of contributory negligence, it cannot be said that the evidence showed that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law.

[3, 4] Appellant further contends that the trial court erred in its instructions to the jury. In instruction 29 the court read to the jury the provisions of section 97 of the California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 517), making it unlawful to drive a motor vehicle upon a public highway under certain conditions without a rear view mirror. On the trial great stress was laid upon the failure of defendant to equip his truck with this type of mirror. The instruction given was inapplicable to the facts in the present case and should not have been given. The section covers the operation of vehicles on public highways. The accident here occurred in a private driveway. In effect the instruction added to defendant's duty to exercise ordinary care the absolute duty imposed upon one operating a vehicle upon a public highway. In instruction 42 relating to the doctrine of sudden peril, the court instructed the jury as follows: "You are instructed that if you find from the evidence plaintiff Gootar was at the time and place set forth in the complaint, suddenly put into a position of imminent danger without having sufficient time to consider all the circumstances, he is to be excused for omitting to take some precaution or for making an unusual choice under such disturbing influences, although if his mind had been clear, he might have done otherwise." The foregoing instruction omitted the necessary qualification that the doctrine of sudden peril is available only to a person who is confronted with such peril without negligence on his own part. Where there is evidence tending to show that such person's sudden peril resulted from his own negligence, it is error to give such an instruction without proper qualification. Brooks v. City of Monterey (Cal. App.) 290 P. 540; Vedder v. Bireley, 92 Cal. App. 52, 60, 267 P. 724. The main issue in the case was whether plaintiff's injuries resulted from the negligence of the plaintiff or the negligence of the defendant, and the giving of the foregoing instructions constituted prejudicial error requiring a reversal of the judgment.

[5, 6] Appellant complains of other instructions. In instruction 38 appellant takes exception to the use of the word "skill" where the court used the phrase "ordinary care or skill." This instruction was given in the exact language of section 1714 of the Civil Code. This code section may be inaptly drawn, but there was no error in giving the instruction. Instruction 41 is a general instruction on damages frequently given in cases of this kind. It stated the law correctly, and we find no merit in the contention that the evidence was insufficient to justify the court in giving it. Instruction 35 was also an instruction on damage relating to predisposition to disease or sickness as a result of the injury. This instruction should not have been given in the absence of expert testimony to show that plaintiff's injuries resulted in such predisposition, but in view of the nature of the injuries and the amount of the award, we do not believe that the giving of this instruction would in itself require a reversal.

Appellant further complains of prejudicial misconduct resulting from an answer given by respondent while a witness in which he referred to the doctor attending him as "Mr. Levin's insurance company doctor." We deem it unnecessary to discuss the point, as it is not likely to occur upon a retrial of the cause.

The judgment is reversed.

MARKS, Acting P. J.

Appellant was and is the owner of approximately four hundred and eighty acres of land in San Bernardino county. On September 29, 1925, it entered into an executory contract for the sale of this land to Harold Kiggins, the son of E. E. Kiggins, one of the respondents. Two hundred and seventy dollars was paid in cash on account of the purchase price of the property, the balance of which was to be paid in deferred payments, the first falling due on September 29, 1926. The vendee was evidently let into possession of the property. The contract contained the following provision:

"Fourth. That until after all payments have been made as hereinbefore provided, Vendee will not, nor will he permit others to remove or destroy, in whole or in part, any improvements placed upon the said land, nor cut any wood or trees thereon, nor do any mining thereon, nor commit any strip or waste on the said premises; and that all trees and minerals upon said land shall, until after all payments have been made, be and remain the property of Vendor."

On October 10, 1925, respondents executed the following instrument:

"Office, Main 3073 Residence Cor. 366.

"Henry G. Fenton Grading and General Contractor

"Office and Yards, Dewey and Main Streets
"San Diego, California,

"It is my understanding that you grant to me the right to obtain such material as may be required for the work and for this right I am to pay you or your assigns the sum of one thousand dollars in instalments as follows: One third the amount with this letter, one third on or before December 10, 1925, and the remaining one third on or before January 10, 1926.

"The engineers for the State Highway Commission estimate that this contract will require 41,000 tons of road surfacing material, if, however, more than this amount of road surfacing material is required for this contract or for other work which we may secure, it is my understanding that I may obtain such additional material upon payment to you of two and one-half cents per ton for all tonnage over and above 41,000 tons.

"If the foregoing is in accordance with your understanding of our verbal agreement and is acceptable to you will you so indicate by signing below and return one copy for my record.

"H. G. Fenton

"Accepted E. E. Kiggins."

Harold Kiggins made no further payments on the purchase price of the property and forfeited his right to purchase it. In April, 1927, and after the forfeiture, appellant discovered that Henry G. Fenton had removed about 41,000 tons of gravel from the property. Appellant thereupon filed suit against respondents for $1,000, the value of the gravel removed.

The complainant alleged: Ownership in appellant, but not the possession of 40 acres of the property from which the gravel had been removed; the value of the gravel and damages in the sum of $1,000 resulting from its removal; and that demand on respondents for $1,000 had been made and their refusal to pay the same.

Respondents filed separate answers. Kiggins denied the removal of any gravel and any damage to appellant. Fenton admitted the removal of the gravel, but denied that its value and the damages resulting from its removal were in excess of $50. He further denied that his entry upon the property and the removal of the gravel was without right and without the permission of appellant.

The trial court found that the contract between appellant and Harold Kiggins had been executed and that it had not been recorded; that Harold Kiggins went into possession of the property and was in possession thereof during the time the gravel was removed; that E. E. Kiggins acted as agent for Harold Kiggins and sold to Fenton the gravel in question which was of the value of $1,000; that it was removed with the knowledge and consent of Harold Kiggins; that in purchasing and removing the gravel Fenton acted in good faith and paid the $1,000 to Harold Kiggins. Upon these findings judgment was entered for respondents.

It was the theory of respondents before the trial, and which they urge here, that the action is for damages for trespass; that trespass is a wrong against the possessor of property; that an action therefor cannot be maintained by one out of possession; that at all times material to the action, Harold Kiggins was in possession of the property in question; that E. E. Kiggins acted as agent for Harold Kiggins throughout the transaction; that Fenton was the licensee and permittee of Harold Kiggins in entering upon the property and removing the gravel and did so under color of right; that therefore the legal owner of the property out of possession could not recover damages resulting from a trespass committed by one under authority from another in possession.

Section 307 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that there shall be but one form of civil action in California. In the case of Rogers v. Duhart, 97 Cal. 500, 32 P. 570, it was held as follows:

"The briefs are devoted chiefly to a discussion of the question whether an action trespass quare clausum fregit can be maintained by one who was not in the actual possession of the land at the time the acts complained of were performed. The respondent refers to cases showing that actual possession is not in all cases essential, and the appellant insists that the exceptions are confined to cases in which the plaintiffs were the owners,—where the title draws to it the possession for the purpose of redressing injuries to the estate.

"It would be a useless thing to attempt to reconcile the cases on this subject. Decisions adhering to the common-law rules of pleading are seldom of any value in determining the sufficiency of a pleading under the Code, and sometimes lead to serious departures from its letter and spirit. With us mere forms of action are cast aside. Every action is now in effect a special action on the case (Jones v. Steamer Cortes, 17 Cal. 487, 79 Am. Dec. 142; Goulet v. Asseler, 22 N. Y. 225; Matthews v. McPherson, 65 N. C. 189; Brown v. Bridges, 31 Iowa, 145); and the rigid formalism and subtle distinctions found in the rules governing the common-law forms of action are as inapplicable and inane under the modern plan of procedure as the highly dramatic speech, senseless repetitions, and symbolic gestures of the formulæ prescribed for the five forms of civil actions by the decemvirs of ancient Rome.

"Does the complaint state in ordinary and concise language facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action? That is the question, and not whether it is sufficient to show trespass quare clausum, trespass vi et armis, or any other technical form of action, ex delicto or ex contractu.

"The common-law rule is that, if plaintiff declare in trespass quare clausum where the action should be case, he will be nonsuited at the trial; but under our system, if the facts alleged and proved are such as would have entitled the plaintiff to relief under any of the recognized forms of action at common law, they are sufficient as the basis of relief, whatever it may be."

[1, 2] If we assume that the theory of respondents is correct, except that a plaintiff out of possession cannot recover for damages to the freehold, yet upon such theory the appellant has a good cause of action and the right to recover. Appellant was the owner of an interest in the freehold. Harold Kiggins possessed an equitable interest in the property through his contract of purchase. Respondents entered upon the land under authority from Harold Kiggins and removed part of the freehold. "Waste" has been defined as follows: "As defined by Lord Coke, it 'is a spoil or destruction in houses, gardens, trees or other corporeal hereditaments to the disinherison of him that hath the remainder in fee simple or fee tail.' It has also been defined as an unlawful act or omission of duty on the part of a tenant which results in permanent injury to the inheritance. The word is not an arbitrary term to be applied inflexibly without regard to the quantity or quality of the estate, the nature and species of property, or the relation to it of the person charged to have committed the wrong. In order to constitute technical waste privity of title must exist between parties, and the wrongdoer must be rightfully in possession." 25 Cal. Jur. 975.

[3] It has been held that a vendee in possession of real property under an executory contract of sale cannot remove fixtures from the land thereby committing waste (Conde v. Sweeney, 14 Cal. App. 20, 110 P. 973), nor can he remove fixtures placed thereon by himself without an agreement giving him the right so to do (Conde v. Sweeney, 16 Cal. App. 157, 116 P. 319). If such a vendee cannot remove fixtures, certainly those entering upon the property under him and by his authority cannot remove large quantities of the soil itself.

These four cases were tried together before a jury and by stipulation of the parties are presented together upon appeal. The four plaintiffs were injured on March 10, 1929, while riding as guests in an automobile operated by appellant. Upon appeal from judgments against her only two points are made by appellant. The first, based upon the subsequent adoption of section 141 $\frac{3}{4}$ of the California Vehicle Act, as added by St. 1929, p. 1580, is no longer open since the decision of Krause v. Rarity (Cal. Mandamus ⇨18.

Determination in original mandamus proceeding of rights of owner of land transferred from water company to irrigation district was refused as involving questions involved in appeal in another action.

Powers of railroad commission in authorizing transfer of water company's system under St. 1915, p. 149, § 51(a), under specified conditions as to rates, uses of water outside district, inclusion of outside lands in district, contractual rights growing out of proceedings culminating in order of transfer, and a number of other important questions, which should receive fullest consideration rendered it inexpedient that Supreme Court should arrest appeal already taken by another user of water in action for declaratory relief under Code Civ. Proc. § 1060 et seq., where determination of such appeal would determine petitioner's rights.

Original mandamus proceeding in the Supreme Court by Charles Dankert against Oroville-Wyandotte Irrigation District, a public corporation.

Writ denied, and alternative writ discharged.

George F. Jones, of Oroville, and Sanborn, Roehl, Smith & Brookman, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

R. A. Leonard, of Oroville, and Chickering & Gregory, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

Application for a writ of mandamus. The recitation of facts is taken from the petition:

Respondent Oroville-Wyandotte Irrigation district is now and since July 8, 1919, has been a public corporation and irrigation district organized under the laws of this state for the purpose of providing water for the irrigation of certain lands situate in the county of Butte. Said district is not subject to the regulatory powers of the state railroad commission. Henderson v. Oroville-Wyandotte Irrigation District, 207 Cal. 215, 277 P. 487. There also existed in the immediate vicinity of respondent district two other public utilities, to-wit, Palermo Land & Water Company and South Feather Land & Water Company, organized for the purpose of distributing for sale water to lands within their said districts. Our concern is with the Palermo Company and not with the South Feather Company. Petitioner, Charles Dankert, is the owner of lands within said Palermo Land & Water Company's boundaries. These last-named utilities were under the regulatory power of the state railroad commission, and the owners thereof could not sell said systems or plants without first having secured from the railroad commission an order authorizing them to do so. Section 51(a), Public Utilities Act (St. 1915, p. 149). Both of said public utilities, therefore, applied to the railroad commission in 1922 for authority to sell their respective plants to said Oroville-Wyandotte irrigation district, the latter district joining in said applications as purchaser. The applicants alleged in their petitions that said transfers would benefit the public and would result in an increased and more dependable water supply for the area served and would provide irrigation service to a larger area than was then served at probably a lower cost. The purchase price, to wit, $200,000, to be paid to each of the selling utilities by the respondent, was mutually agreed upon by the respective parties. Hearings were accordingly held as provided by law. The district's boundaries originally contemplated the inclusion of the lands then served by the two utilities, but, as only a few of the owners of such lands expressed a desire to join the proposed district, a revision of the boundaries was made excluding the lands of those water users who did not elect to join the district. At the first hearing held by the commission eighty-two of the water users of the Palermo Company, who had not joined the district, including petitioner, protested against the transfer, alleging that, if the authority to transfer was granted, they would be without the jurisdiction of the railroad commission and consequently without adequate protection as to future rates and service. They requested as a condition of the transfer that respondent district be required to give guaranties as to future rates to be charged for the use of water and the service to be rendered and also insisted that some provision be made permitting the water users to join said irrigation district. Several conferences were held in which representatives of the railroad commission met with the protestants and representatives of the respondent district and finally a proposal which was agreed to by the parties in interest was adopted, and which the railroad commission caused to be made a record in the proceeding, as a resolution by the board of directors of respondent district, and was intended to have the effect of an agreement.

Said resolution declares that the protestants withdrew their protests against said transfer in consideration of the respondent district agreeing to enter into contracts with each of said protestants and water users accepting the offer as therein made within six months from the date of said resolution. The quantity of water to which each of said water users would be entitled per acre was therein fixed, as was the rate at 25 cents per miner's inch continuous flow per day of twenty-four hours, with a minimum charge of $5 per acre per year until January 1, 1928. It was further provided that, if at "any time five years" after the first construction work has been started by said respondent any of the water users of said Palermo Company shall make a legal application to have their lands included in the Oroville-Wyandotte irrigation district, and said application shall be rejected by said district, then, and in that event, the said water user shall pay the same charge for water furnished to his land as is paid for water by the water users or landowners within said district. Said resolution provided that the rates above specified should not be raised after said January 1, 1928, and also contained the further provision that, should the charge paid for water by consumers within said district exceed the sum of 22 cents per miner's inch, then and in such event the then outside users of water should pay the same charge as paid by landowners or consumers of water within said district. It was further provided that all the existing rights of said water users should continue and whatever rights and benefits that were conferred by said resolution or agreement were in addition to those they then possessed. Should any of the then water users at any time have their lands included within respondent district, said resolution or agreement, was to become null and void as to them.

The district assumed the obligation of the Palermo Land & Water Company to furnish water to the purchasers of land from said Palermo Company, as provided in its contracts of sale, but which had not for various reasons received water service. The railroad commission thereupon, on December 8, 1922, made its order that the applications for transfer be granted, subject to the condition that the then users of water of said water companies and those persons or firms desiring to become users within ten years from the date of said order should receive service from said Oroville-Wyandotte irrigation district at the rates and under the conditions recited in application 8000 and application 8018—applications of said Palermo Company and South Feather Company, respectively, to sell said plants to respondent irrigation district—and in the resolutions of the directors of said respondent irrigation district, the material part of which are above set forth.

No other orders, records, or documents bearing upon the commission's action are before us in this proceeding.

As grounds of justifying the issuance of the writ of mandamus, petitioner alleges that on January 20, 1928, the board of directors of respondent district fixed the rate to be charged for water used by petitioner and other users of water outside of said district at $7.50 per acre foot and the equivalent rate for water users within said district at $5 per acre foot for the year 1928; and that J. C. Henderson, one of said outside users of water, filed with the superior court of the county of Butte a complaint for declaratory relief (section 1060 et seq., Code Civ. Proc.), seeking a determination of the rights and obligations of himself and respondent, including the rate to be paid for the use of water. A demurrer was sustained to the complaint without leave to amend. An appeal was taken from the judgment thus entered and the ruling of the trial court was reversed. Henderson v. Oroville-Wyandotte Irrigation District, 207 Cal. 215, 277 P. 487. Said action was thereafter tried in said superior court of the county of Butte and judgment went for plaintiff.

An appeal was taken in that case, and, if affirmed, it will establish the contention of petitioner and all others concerned in the subject of litigation, both as to the power of the railroad commission to regulate respondent district in fixing water charges in the premises and as to the proper interpretation of the word "charge" as used by the commission in dealing with the subject matter. The issues being identical and admittedly arising out of the same state of facts, any judgment rendered in favor of or against plaintiff Henderson, who belongs to the same class as does petitioner, who is acting in a representative capacity, in an action against the same defendant, would certainly become res judicata as to petitioner. Judgment was rendered in the Henderson Case on June 7, 1930.

The immediate grounds upon which petitioner bases his claim for this extraordinary writ is that on January 31, 1930, respondent fixed a rate for petitioner and other users of water outside the district at $10 per acre foot and a rate for users within the district at $5 per acre foot for the year 1930. The total demand amounted to $170.40. On June 14, 1930, petitioner tendered $85.20, one-half of said sum of $170.40, and demanded a receipt in full, which demand was refused. Whether the whole amount of the demand was thereafter paid or whether petitioner was actually denied the use of water by reason of failure to pay the full amount of the charge does not pointedly appear. This question, however, is not important in view of the demand. Petitioner, for himself and on behalf of those whom he represents, alleges the ability and willingness of said parties to pay a water charge of $5 per acre foot, but alleges any sum above that amount to be unlawful "in so far as it exceeds the rate of $5 per acre foot charged for the use of water to lands within the boundaries of respondent district." The petition contains no allegation that the charge is not a fair, reasonable, or just charge as to said outside users based on the cost of supply and maintenance, but it is resisted on the ground that it is in violation of the rights of petitioner and others, as prescribed by the railroad commission as a condition precedent to its order consenting to the transfer. The contention of petitioner is that he is entitled to water at the same rate per unit of water delivered as respondent charges members of the irrigation district.

It appears from the brief opinion of the learned judge who tried the Henderson Case that respondent imposes charges for water service upon members of the district in the form of a water charge and also in the form of a tax; petitioner claims that in such circumstances the charge to him cannot exceed the water charge exclusive of the tax. It is the claim of respondent, however, that the charge paid for water service by members of the district in the form of a tax added to the $5 per acre-foot charge would far exceed the charge of $10 per acre-foot assessed against petitioner and those whom he represents. The powers of the railroad commission in the premises, the question of contractual rights growing out of the proceedings which culminated in the order of transfer and a number of other important questions which should receive the fullest consideration, render it inexpedient that we should arrest the appeal already taken and attempt to decide the relative rights of the parties to this proceeding upon a very incomplete record. The record in the Henderson Case, which went to judgment approximately six months ago, is not yet on file in this court, although it is suggested that it, together with the transcript, has been completed. We have been unable to locate it. Besides, the respondent has not consented that the record in that case should be accepted as the record in the instant case. Moreover, should we sustain the demurrer in the instant case, petitioner would be put to the task of amending his petition, and, if he should finally pass a demurrer, it is highly probable that a reference would be necessary. On the other hand, if the appeal which was taken several months ago is prosecuted with but ordinary diligence, the matter should come to this court within a short time, and, if the case is one where the rights of the parties would greatly suffer by awaiting its turn upon the calendar, this court has the power to advance said cause upon a sufficient showing.

For the reasons herein set forth, the petition for the writ is denied, and the alternative writ is discharged.

PRESTON, J.

This is an appeal by the sixth and last defendant in a prosecution in Sacramento county for murder in the first degree, wherein all of the six were convicted and a judgment imposing the extreme penalty was pronounced.

The appeal of the other five defendants was denied on April 30, 1929, and discussion of that cause is found in People v. Brown, 207 Cal. 172, 277 P. 320. The crime of which these defendants were convicted was murder growing out of an armed prison revolt which occurred at Folsom on Thanksgiving Day (November 24), 1927. The defendants conducted a murderous assault upon the innocent prison authorities at which they had access, killing a brave guard by the name of Singleton, and desperately and cowardly wounding at least two others. As part of the same transaction, they also killed a fellow convict, George Baker, and it is for his murder that this conviction was secured. Details of this revolt need not be again recounted, as the reader may find a more extended review of the facts in the volume containing the above citation. It is sufficient to here state that this defendant, while not the leader, was an active participant in the revolt and wielded a knife during these proceedings, stabbing one guard and making an effort at least to strike at the throat of another. He also cut a telephone cord in pursuance of the object of the revolt, and did many other things which make his participation therein a full and complete one.

The defendant offered no brief in his own behalf, but, disregarding this omission, we have examined the record at length. We are convinced therefrom that under the law no relief whatsoever can be accorded him in this court, and that his judgment of conviction must be upheld.

In doing this, however, we feel that, because of the provisions of article 7, § 1, of the Constitution and section 1418 of the Penal Code, which require the consent and recommendation of a majority of this court before executive clemency can be given in a case where a previous conviction of a felony has been had, we should make a few further observations concerning the condition of the record with respect to this defendant.

It appears that he was in prison charged with forgery. It also appears that he has not the malicious tendencies possessed by the other defendants. He claims to have been overreached by them and practically coerced into what he did. He has already been convicted and sentenced to life imprisonment for participation in the murder of the guard, Ray Singleton, which was a part of this same transaction. He was not a life timer, and this sentence was a real punishment for him. During the present trial, and during the two previous trials had in connection with the matter, he stood aloof from the other five defendants. More than this, he testified at each of said hearings and gave damaging testimony not only against the other defendants, but against himself as well. In the present trial he acted as his own attorney and cross-examined witnesses and delivered an address to the jury of more than two hours in length. He likewise took the witness stand in his own behalf, and as such witness testified in detail as to the occurrence on the day in question and the part each man took in the execution of the scheme to escape. He spared not himself in his disclosures.

We do not hesitate to say that his statement of what occurred contributed materially in our judgment to the conviction of the other defendants, and, while the state did not vouch for this defendant and did not introduce him, nevertheless it availed itself of all the valuable testimony adduced by him, even to the extent of introducing as part of his cross-examination certain exhibits consisting of murderous instruments used in the attempt to break prison.

On the whole, we are convinced that there is perhaps left in this defendant a modicum of honor, and that at the proper time, should application be made for a recommendation to the Governor for a commutation of sentence to life imprisonment, we are prepared to entertain and consider the same.

The judgment is affirmed.

WASTE, C. J.

The complaint in this action for attorney's fees contains two counts. The first sets forth a written contract providing for the payment of a one-third contingent fee, and the second, a common count, asks for the reasonable value of services performed. No evidence was introduced in support of the latter count, and we therefore dismiss it from consideration. In conformity with the allegations of defendant's affirmative defense, the trial court found that the contract set out in count 1 had been procured by fraud, and that it was against public policy and void. Judgment was thereupon entered for the defendant. Plaintiff prosecutes this appeal, contending that the judgment is contrary to law, and that the evidence does not support the finding of fraud.

On February 1, 1926, Oris Eaton, an unmarried adult son of the defendant, met his death while acting within the scope and course of his employment by the San Diego Consolidated Gas & Electric Company. The injuries causing his death resulted, however, from the negligence of the employees of the Benson Lumber Company. As an outgrowth of the untimely death of her son, the defendant became invested with two causes of action—one against the employer gas company under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act and the other against the Lumber Company based on negligence. Section 26 of the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1919, p. 910, § 8) gave to the employer gas company a cause of action against the lumber company for any loss sustained by it, or a first lien on any judgment recovered by the employee against the lumber company. The plaintiff was the attorney for the insurance carrier of the employer gas company on a regular retainer. He also carried on a general practice. As the attorney for this insurance carrier, he investigated the accident and so met the defendant. In the course of his conversations with the defendant, the plaintiff stated that his company admitted its liability under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act, and that it would not contest her claim before the Industrial Accident Commission. Defendant testified that plaintiff suggested that she retain him as her attorney to press her claim against the lumber company because of his familiarity with the circumstances surrounding the accident, and that five days after the accident she signed the contract here sued on, employing plaintiff on a one-third contingent fee basis. There is evidence to the effect that plaintiff advised the defendant not to employ an attorney to represent her at the hearings before the Industrial Accident Commission in her claim against the employer gas company, and not to divulge that he was representing her in her claim against the lumber company. At the several hearings before the Industrial Accident Commission, the plaintiff appeared on behalf of the gas company and its compensation insurance carrier, and, while admitting liability, apparently contested or questioned defendant's claim as to the degree of dependency. As a result of these hearings, the defendant received an award of $309, although plaintiff, prior to his employment by defendant, had approximated the claim against the employer to be worth $1,500. During all of this period plaintiff had been negotiating with the insurance carrier of the lumber company for a settlement of defendant's claim for damages, although prior to his employment by defendant he had intimated to her that he would bring suit against the lumber company, asking damages in the sum of $40,000 or $50,000. Defendant became dissatisfied with the manner in which her claim against the lumber company was being handled, and addressed a letter to the plaintiff discharging him, and offering to pay the reasonable value of his services. Defendant thereafter personally negotiated with the lumber company and its insurance carrier, and settled her claim for damages for $3,100, whereupon plaintiff brought this action to recover one-third thereof, or $1,033.33. During the course of the trial, plaintiff introduced evidence tending to show that by reason of his efforts he was in a position, at the time of his discharge, to have settled defendant's claim against the lumber company for $4,750.

[1, 2] Even if we accept appellant's contention that the finding of fraud in the procurement of the employment is without support in the evidence, the judgment for defendant must stand, for, as found by the court below, the contract sued on is clearly against public policy and void. One of the principal obligations which bind an attorney is that of fidelity, the maintaining inviolate the confidence reposed in him by those who employ him, and at every peril to himself to preserve the secrets of his client. Section 282, Code Civ. Proc.; In re Cowdery, 69 Cal. 32, 10 P. 47, 58 Am. Rep. 545. This obligation is a very high and stringent one. It is also an attorney's duty to protect his client in every possible way, and it is a violation of that duty for him to assume a position adverse or antagonistic to his client without the latter's free and intelligent consent given after full knowledge of all the facts and circumstances. In re Boone (C. C.) 83 F. 944, 954-955. By virtue of this rule, an attorney is precluded from assuming any relation which would prevent him from devoting his entire energies to his client's interests. Nor does it matter that the intention and motives of the attorney are honest. The rule is designed, not alone to prevent the dishonest practitioner from fraudulent conduct, but as well to preclude the honest practitioner from putting himself in a position where he may be required to choose between conflicting duties, or be led to an attempt to reconcile conflicting interests, rather than to enforce to their full extent the rights of the interest which he should alone represent. Strong v. Int. Bldg., etc., Ass'n, 183 Ill. 97, 55 N. E. 675, 676, 47 L. R. A. 792.

[3] While the defendant had knowledge that plaintiff was the legal representative of the insurance carrier of the gas company and received an annual retainer therefor, plaintiff failed to explain to her wherein the two employments were adverse. As attorney for the defendant, plaintiff could, and probably did, secure certain confidential information concerning the degree of her dependency upon her deceased son. On the other hand, his representation of the gas company's compensation insurance carrier required him to contest defendant's claim before the Industrial Accident Commission, at least upon the issue of dependency. His dual employment thus placed him in a position to use this confidential information to the defendant's detriment. As already intimated, it is immaterial whether or not plaintiff, as counsel for the insurance carrier, actually availed himself before the commission of information received from the defendant while acting as her attorney. The impropriety of the dual employment is readily apparent. Conscience and good morals dictate that an attorney should not so conduct himself as to be open to the temptation of violating his obligation of fidelity and confidence.

[4] Moreover, as counsel for the insurance carrier of the gas company, plaintiff was primarily interested in having defendant's claim for damages against the lumber company settled for any amount equal to or in excess of the liability ($309) of the gas company under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act. As attorney for the defendant, however, it was his duty to secure, either by settlement or suit, as large a sum as possible. This conflict of interests may well have worked to the defendant's disadvantage. Plaintiff, though in good faith intending to discharge his obligation as defendant's attorney, would be in such a position as might have unconsciously caused him to accept an offer of compromise or settlement of her claim against the lumber company rather than run the risk of bringing an action and jeopardizing the gas company's right of subrogation. If plaintiff had been representing the defendant alone, he might have concluded to sue the lumber company for a large sum of money, as he had previously intimated to the defendant he would do. His duty as counsel for the insurance carrier of the employer gas company may have suggested to him, however, the possibility of an adverse judgment, if such action were commenced, which adverse judgment would render the employer's right of subrogation valueless, thus leaving the burden of the Industrial Accident Commission's award on the shoulders of its insurance carrier. Such thought or suggestion may well have deterred counsel so situated from instituting such action, and thus preclude him from enforcing "to their full extent the rights of the interest which he should alone represent." Strong v. Int. Bldg., etc., Ass'n, supra. It is also conceivable that plaintiff's opposition of defendant's claim of dependency before the Industrial Accident Commission may have had an adverse effect upon her claim for damages against the Lumber Company. It is our conclusion, therefore, that the contract sued on, even if not tainted with actual fraud, is, as found by the court below, against public policy and void.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter S. Gates, Judge.

Certiorari by Thomas J. Randall against the State Board of Medical Examiners and others. From a judgment annulling a judgment of the Board, defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Otto J. Emme, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Bertin A. Weyl, and Paul C. Hill, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SCHMIDT, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal from a judgment of the superior court of Los Angeles county in a proceeding in certiorari annulling a judgment of the board of medical examiners, by the terms of which last-mentioned judgment the respondent herein was found guilty of a violation of the Medical Practice Act, and was granted probation for a period of five years.

The Medical Practice Act (section 14), in so far as applicable to this case, provides: "Whenever any holder of a certificate herein provided for is guilty of unprofessional conduct, as the same is defined in this act, and the said unprofessional conduct has been brought to the attention of the board granting said certificate, * * * it shall be the duty of the board and the board shall have power to suspend the right of the holder of said certificate to practice for a period not exceeding one year or to place the holder of said certificate upon probation or suspend judgment in such cases or revoke his certificate, or take such other action in relation to the punishment of the holder of said certificate as in its discretion it may deem proper. * * * The words 'unprofessional conduct' as used in this act, are hereby declared to mean: * * * Tenth—Advertising, announcing or stating directly, indirectly, or in substance, by any sign, card, newspaper, advertisement or other written or printed sign or advertisement, that the holder of such certificate or any other person, company, or association by which he is employed or in whose service he is, will cure, or attempt to cure, or will treat, any venereal disease, or will cure or attempt to cure or treat any person or persons for any sexual disease, for lost manhood, sexual weakness, or sexual disorder or any disease of the sexual organs; or being employed by, or being in the service of, any person, firm, association, or corporation so advertising, announcing or stating." Stats. 1913, p. 722, as amended, Stats. 1929, p. 626.

The complaint before the medical board charged respondent with unprofessional conduct in violation of subdivision 10 of section 14 of the act, in that he had placed an advertisement in the Los Angeles Evening Herald, a newspaper of wide circulation in the city of Los Angeles, in words and figures as follows: "T. J. Randall, M. D. 602 S. Flower St., cor. 6th. Acute chronic Blood, Skin and infectious disease, Prostate, bladder, also dropsy, rheumatism, stomach and other chronic ailments. An Expert Rectal Specialist, successfully treating Piles, fistula, fissures, ulcers, proctitis, colitis & other allied diseases without loss of time. Men and Women. Free exam. Reas. Charge. Daily 9 to 4 (except Sun.) Eves., Mon., Wed., and Friday 6 to 8.

Respondent contends that the evidence adduced before the medical board was wholly insufficient to sustain the finding that he had violated any part or provision of the Medical Practice Act of the state of California, or that he was guilty of unprofessional conduct. The real question involved is this: Is the effect of the advertisement that respondent would treat any person for sexual disease, lost manhood, sexual weakness, sexual disorder, or for any disease of the sexual organs in violation of said subdivision 10 of section 14 of the Medical Practice Act? Appellants claim the affirmative, basing same upon the testimony of two experts, Dr. Robert V. Day and Dr. Albert J. Scholl, each of whom, after qualifying as an expert, testified upon direct examination: "Q. Doctor, I will ask you whether the prostate gland is a part of the male sexual organs? A. It is." And upon cross-examination: "Q. Now, doctor, there are other diseases of the prostate gland besides venereal diseases, are there not? A. Yes sir. Q. This is, the prostate may be in a condition of disease due to tuberculosis or cancer, or other conditions that have no connection with venereal disease? A. Correct."

[1-3] It has been repeatedly held that the right of a licensed physician to practice is not a mere shadowy privilege, to be revoked regardless of whether the possessor has violated the laws of the state, but is a valuable right, to be protected at least by such safeguards as the Legislature has thrown around it. Subdivision 10 of section 14 of the Medical Practice Act is in the nature of a penal statute, and therefore is to be construed with a degree of strictness commensurate with the severity of the penalty it imposes; and no one can be held to have violated its provision unless his acts come within both the letter and spirit of the law. The evidence produced before the medical board shows that there are diseases of the prostate which are not in any sense venereal diseases or diseases of the sexual organs. The fact that respondent Randall used the word "prostate" in his advertisement cannot be said to be the equivalent of advertising concerning the matters prohibited by subdivision 10. Many physicians specialize in some particular limited practice, such as for instance, tuberculosis or cancer. Could it be said because a sexual organ may be diseased with cancer that a physician who merely advertises the fact that he specializes in a disease known as cancer has advertised for treatment of the sexual organs? We think not. Likewise the fact that the prostate may have some of the diseases against which the act is directed would not preclude a physician from advertising treatment of that organ.

We are not unmindful that the question involved is one of ethics, upon which professional men naturally have honest differences of opinion. It is not for us to determine the ethical question. It is solely for us to determine whether there has been a violation of the law. We do not feel that the evidence produced in this case warrants adjudging respondent guilty of violating the Medical Practice Act.

Judgment affirmed.

1. Damages ⇨26, 186.

Prospective loss of services and earnings of injured minor may be recovered by parent, but evidence must show prospective loss was reasonably certain (Civ. Code, § 3283).

2. Damages ⇨186.

Evidence showed no reasonable certainty that parent would be deprived of prospective services of minor and did not authorize award therefor to parent.

Evidence did not show that injured minor had ever rendered any service or acquired any earnings prior to trial, and no claim was made by parent suing on own behalf for loss of services up to that time. Evidence showed that, prior to trial, injured minor had been able to do and was doing practically all of things which normal, healthy school boy of age could do, and had made excellent recovery from fracture of right leg.

3. Damages ⇨26.

Future expenses for injury to minor should be recovered in action on minor's behalf rather than in action by parent on own behalf.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by A. L. Rockwood against Irene Lansburgh. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed, on conditions.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; CURTIS, J., dissenting.

Hadsell, Sweet & Ingalls, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Charles W. Haswell, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SPENCE, J.

Plaintiff, the father of a minor son injured in an automobile accident, brought this action to recover such damages as plaintiff claimed to have sustained as the parent of said minor. Upon a trial by jury, plaintiff obtained judgment in the sum of $6,000. Upon a motion for new trial the trial court ordered that a new trial be granted unless plaintiff remitted one-half of this amount. Plaintiff filed his written consent to the reduction of the judgment, which now stands in the sum of $3,000. From this judgment in the reduced amount defendant appeals.

Appellant urges a reversal solely upon two grounds, both of which relate to the damages awarded. It is contended, first, that the damages are excessive, and, second, that the trial court committed error in giving certain instructions relating to damages.

The minor sustained a fracture of the tibia and fibula of the right leg in the accident in March, 1928. His age at the time of the trial in September, 1929, was eleven years. The period of disability, including physiotherapy treatments, was five or six months. The fractured parts made a perfect union and healed in perfect alignment. There was no shortening of the leg or diminution in size. The boy was able to run, swim, play football and generally engaged in athletic activities, but still retained at the time of trial what is known as a habit limp. His physician testified that this was due to "a habit condition rather than being attributable to any structural defect there." He stated that this condition might cause the boy some muscle fatigue because he would favor one extremity to the exclusion of the other. He recommended some definite form of group exercise, such as military training, to overcome this condition. The boy had had a private tutor for about two weeks after leaving the hospital and then went to private school. One of his teachers testified that he was below normal, but was showing improvement. She later testified that in his one year at private school he advanced from the high fourth to the low sixth grade, and that when she said he was below normal she meant "that he was not one hundred per cent."

The maximum amount shown by the evidence to have been actually expended by respondent was $521.75, which included $275 expended for tuition. Appellant does not question the propriety of the award to the extent of the $521.75 expended by respondent prior to the trial, but contends that any award over that amount was excessive under the evidence. Respondent contends that the award of damages over and above the amount expended prior to the trial was justified on the following grounds: First, that the parent may recover for prospective loss of services and earnings, and, second, that the parent may recover for prospective expense.

The points raised involve the general question of the items of damage recoverable by the parent in an action on his own behalf, as distinguished from the items of damage recoverable in an action on behalf of the injured child. This question has been touched upon in this state in Karr v. Parks, 44 Cal. 46, and Durkee v. Central Pacific Railroad Co., 56 Cal. 388, 38 Am. Rep. 59, but neither of these cases determines the precise points with which we are here concerned.

[1, 2] There can be no doubt that prospective loss of services and earnings of the minor constitutes one of the items of damage which may be recovered by a parent on his own behalf (Garrison v. Pearlstein, 68 Cal. App. 334, 229 P. 348), but we are of the opinion that the evidence must show that the nature of the injury was such as to render prospective loss of services and earnings reasonably certain. Civ. Code, § 3283. There was no evidence to show that the minor had ever rendered any service or acquired any earnings prior to the trial, and no claim was made for loss of services up to that time. It appeared that for some time prior to the trial the boy had been able to do and was doing practically all of the things which a normal, healthy school boy of his age could do. He had made an excellent recovery, and it cannot be said that there was any reasonable certainty that the respondent would be deprived of any prospective services or earnings of the minor in the future. Under these circumstances we do not believe that an award for prospective loss of services or earnings was justified. There is nothing in Garrison v. Pearlstein, supra, in conflict with these views. The opinion in that case does not set forth the nature of the injuries, but does recite that the parent had made expenditures in the sum of $3,445.40, indicating that the record probably disclosed injuries of an extremely serious nature which, with reasonable certainty, would result in future loss of services and earnings to the parent. It was there held that the evidence of the minor's age, previous health and condition in life "was sufficient to enable the jury to determine his earning capacity aided by their own knowledge and experience."

That respondent was entitled to recover all reasonable medical and other expenses necessarily paid or incurred prior to the trial as a result of the injuries to the minor is conceded by the appellant, but the right to recover for future expenses is questioned. Respondent contends that such future expense was a proper item of damage recoverable by the parent, and that the evidence showed that it was advisable to give the minor training in a military school to overcome the habit limp. This evidence was admitted over the objection of appellant. We find no authorities directly in point on this subject. The medical treatment, including physiotherapy, had ended many months before the trial, and no necessity for future medical treatment or expense was shown, but the cases involving the right to recover for future medical expense throw some light upon the general subject of the right to recover for future expense. These cases are not in accord, but we believe that the sounder rule is expressed in the opinion in Clarke v. Eighth Avenue Railroad Co., 238 N. Y. 246, 144 N. E. 516, on page 517, 37 A. L. R. 1. After discussing the right of the parent to damages for prospective loss of services, the court said: "He was also entitled to recover, unless otherwise paid, the expenses actually and necessarily paid out or incurred by him for medical treatment and increased care and maintenance prior to the trial. I do not think, however, that he was entitled to recover, during the infant's minority, the estimated cost of prospective medical treatment, or the estimated cost of the increased care and maintenance subsequent to the trial. These were items of damage which personally belonged to the infant, and had to be recovered, if at all, and probably were taken into consideration by the jury, in the action brought for his benefit. The infant, and not the father, was entitled to a recovery for these items. This seems to me much the better rule for the infant in an action of this character. It insures that whatever sum is recovered will be more likely to be used for the infant's benefit than if a recovery be permitted by the parent. Obviously, both cannot recover. If the infant recover, then, usually, security has to be given to insure the proper use and disposition of the sum awarded. On the other hand, if the parent be permitted to recover, then the recovery becomes his property. He can do with it as he sees fit. He can will it away, or, if he dies without a will, it becomes part of his estate. In either case, the infant might receive little or no benefit from it. The natural instinct of a parent to properly support his infant children does not always prevail. It is a matter of common knowledge that some do not, and resort has to be made to the statute to compel them to do so. Some parents actually abandon their infant children and leave them objects of charity, or to be maintained and supported by the kindness of relatives or friends."

[3] We are in accord with the views expressed in the foregoing opinion. When the minor is the injured party he is the one primarily involved. For the protection of the minor for whose benefit such recovery is allowed, future expenses should be recoverable as an item of damage in the action brought on the minor's behalf rather than in an action by the parent on his own behalf.

[4] Under the views above set forth, we are of the opinion that the evidence did not warrant a recovery by respondent for prospective loss of services and earnings, and that the respondent was not entitled to recover on his own behalf for any prospective expenses. It therefore follows that the only items of damage for which respondent was entitled to recover under the evidence were the amounts actually expended prior to the trial, amounting to $521.75. The judgment was excessive in the sum by which it exceeds the last-named amount.

We deem it unnecessary to discuss in detail the instructions which appellant contends were erroneous. The attack was directed to certain portions of the instructions which related to future expenses. These portions of the instructions were erroneous and should not have been given.

We believe that a reversal is required unless plaintiff is willing to consent to a modification of the judgment. It is therefore ordered that, unless within thirty days from the filing of the remittitur herein in the lower court the plaintiff shall release all but $521.75 and costs of the judgment rendered by the trial court, such judgment shall be and it is reversed; but that if within such time plaintiff consents to such reduction in said judgment and releases therefrom all but the sum of $521.75 thereof and costs, such judgment as so reduced shall be and it is affirmed, said judgment for the reduced amount to bear interest at the legal rate from the date of the entry of the original judgment of the superior court, and neither party to recover from the other costs on this appeal.

We concur: NOURSE, P. J.; STURTEVANT, J.

110 Cal. App. 90

COOK v. SANGER et al.
Civ. 4208.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

Nov. 26, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 26, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 22, 1931.

1. Automobiles ⇨244(6).

Evidence warranted finding operator was negligent in cranking automobile without first looking to discover it was in gear with brake released.

As result of cranking automobile in gear and with brake released, the automobile ran down hill backwards and injured pedestrian on sidewalk.

2. Automobiles ⇨244(29).

Evidence warranted finding electrician using own automobile in outside repair jobs was employee, not independent contractor, making employer liable for his negligence.

3. Automobiles ⇨244(26).

Evidence warranted finding electrician using own automobile in doing repair jobs was in course of employment at time of accident injuring pedestrian.

4. Automobiles ⇨160(6).

Operator is chargeable with knowledge that starting automobile in gear by using crank is hazardous operation.

5. Automobiles ⇨146.

Any one not taking reasonable precaution to see no injuries will follow in operating car after it is set in motion or in setting it in motion may be found negligent.

6. Automobiles ⇨160(6).

That operator parked automobile properly does not relieve him from taking reasonable precaution when he returns to see automobile can be safely started.

This is so, because operator's duty to use reasonable care is a continuing one, and fact that he has been careful at one time does not entitle him to be negligent at another time.

7. Automobiles ⇨197(7).

Employer is not relieved of liability for employee's negligence in operating automobile because automobile belongs to employee.

8. Evidence ⇨591.

Plaintiff struck by automobile held not bound by testimony of operator put on stand by plaintiff, as against operator's employer (Code Civ. Proc. § 2049).

Code Civ. Proc. § 2049 provides that party producing witness may not impeach his credit by evidence of bad character, but may contradict witness by other evidence, and may also show he had made at other times statements inconsistent with present testimony.

9. Automobiles ⇨194(2).

If one has control or right to control operator of automobile, and power of employment or discharge, master and servant relation, not independent contractor relation, exists.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Clair S. Tappaan, Judge.

Action by George C. Cook against C. E. Sanger and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Meserve, Mumper, Hughes & Robertson, of Los Angeles (Timon E. Owens, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellants.

Kidd, Schell & Delamer, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

Mr. Justice PLUMMER delivered the opinion of the court.

The plaintiff had judgment against the defendants in the sum of $4,500 for and on account of injuries suffered by being struck and knocked down by an automobile owned by the defendant C. E. Sanger, operated by him at a time while said Sanger was acting as an employee of the defendant Lacy Manufacturing Company. From this judgment, the defendants appeal.

The accident leading to the injury of the plaintiff occurred in the following manner:

The defendant Sanger parked his automobile on East Fourth street, between Los Angeles and Main streets, on the north side of Fourth street, about half way up the block. Fourth street runs east and west. There is a decided slope on East Fourth street at the point where the automobile was parked, this slope being down hill from west to east, Los Angeles street being lower than Main street. The automobile was parked at about noontime. After parking the automobile, Sanger spent a few minutes in an establishment conducted by the International Electric Company. After transacting his business with the Electric Company, Sanger returned to the place where his automobile was parked, and in starting the car used a crank for that purpose. It appears that the self-starter was out of order. The crank for starting the car was in the front compartment near the gear shift lever. Upon cranking the car it started backward, ran down hill to where the plaintiff was standing on the sidewalk near the corner of East Fourth street and Los Angeles street, mounted the curb and struck the plaintiff, injuring him quite severely.

Upon this appeal no question is made as to the amount of the damages awarded and, therefore, no further attention will be given thereto.

Upon this appeal it is contended, first: That the defendant Sanger was not negligent, and that the record contains no facts upon which to predicate the finding of negligence on his part; second, that the injury did not occur to the plaintiff while Sanger was within the scope of his employment as an employee of the defendant Lacy Manufacturing Company, and, third, that Sanger was an independent contractor.

The record shows that for a number of years prior to the injury of the plaintiff, as herein stated, Sanger had been in the employ of the Lacy Manufacturing Company, and for a considerable period of time had been in the service of the defendant Lacy Manufacturing Company as an outside man; that is, Sanger would be sent by the Manufacturing Company to look after outside jobs or work on electric motors outside the immediate establishment maintained by the Lacy Manufacturing Company.

The record also shows that it was the practice of the company to allow its employees the sum of 7 cents per mile for traveling expenses, whether they used their own automobiles or traveled by other conveyances. The mileage allowance was always calculated by the shortest distance that could be traveled, irrespective of whether such route was or was not followed by the employee. The defendant Sanger owned his own automobile, and on the day of the accident was operating his own automobile, and was paid the sum of 7 cents per mile for the shortest route between the respective points which he traveled on that day. The record likewise shows that some time previous to the accident resulting in injury to the plaintiff, the Lacy Manufacturing Company had had business dealings with the International Electric Company; that a certain motor belonging to the Lacy Manufacturing Company had been repaired by the International Electric Company, but did not operate satisfactorily by reason of some defect, presumably in the winding of the motor, and the defendant Sanger had been instructed by someone connected with the Lacy Manufacturing Company, entitled to give him orders, to call at the business place of the International Electric Company and ascertain what was wrong with the motor. Sanger, however, was not instructed to call at the International Electric Company on any particular day, but simply to stop there when convenient on some of his outside trips, or, as stated by him, the first time he was uptown.

The accident occurred on the 3d day of April, 1926. On that day Sanger was directed to go to a place called "Vernon" and there perform certain work in behalf of the Lacy Manufacturing Company. In pursuance of this order, Sanger went to Vernon, starting early in the morning, and remained several hours. On his way back he deviated from the most direct route, two or three blocks, and stopped at the business place of the International Electric Company to make inquiries concerning the motor which we have mentioned. The defendant Sanger testified that he left his car, when parked on Fourth street, with the hand-brake set and the control lever set in neutral; that when he came back to the car he took the implement for cranking the motor from the front compartment of the car immediately beside the hand-brake lever and the gear-shifting lever; that he did not notice that the hand brake had been released, or that the shift gear lever had been moved from neutral into reverse; that after the car had started to back down hill, the defendant Sanger testified that he noticed for the first time that the car had been moved from the position in which he claimed to have left it.

While a number of cases have been cited where the questions involved relate to the interference with cars by third persons, whereby they have been started, and after so being started, caused injury; also cases concerning independent contractors, and also cases where an employee has departed from his employer's business, a statement of testimony taken principally from that given by the defendant Sanger, we think will completely answer all the questions presented upon this appeal, without any extended analysis of the cases cited by the appellant.

[1-3] For some ten years or more prior to the accident the defendant Sanger had been an employee of the defendant Lacy Manufacturing Company, working as an electrician, and occasionally did work outside the plant for the company, this work consisting of repairing electrical machines. He gave all his time to the Lacy Manufacturing Company, and worked for no one else. His time began at 7 o'clock in the morning and closed at 4 p. m. He was paid so much an hour for this period, regardless of where he was. A half hour was deducted for the lunch period. It is admitted that Sanger was an employee of the Lacy Manufacturing Company on the day of the accident, and on that particular day was working for the Lacy Manufacturing Company. The defendant Sanger received full pay for his work on the day of the accident, including the 7 cents a mile allowed for traveling expenses. For some time prior to the accident it was a custom of the Lacy Manufacturing Company that employees should use their own automobiles on company business, for which they were paid 7 cents per mile. There was no difference in the rate of mileage allowed employees whether they used their own machines or other means of transportation.

A certain motor belonging to the appellant, Lacy Manufacturing Company, had not been operating satisfactorily for some time. Work for the Lacy Manufacturing Company had been done by the International Electric Company. Sanger had also worked on this motor. Sanger testified that he had been directed to call at the place of business of the International Electric Company and inquire as to this motor and ascertain the cause of the trouble. Two officers of the Lacy Manufacturing Company testified that they did not have any recollection of giving Sanger such orders. Sanger testified that he was not instructed to go to the office of the International Electric Company and find out about the defect in the motor on the particular day of the accident, but was simply told to go there some time and find out about the motor. The defendant Sanger testified that he stated he would attend to it and would stop at the International Electric Company's place of business the first time he was uptown, and that the person who gave him the directions—either Mr. Ludke or Mr. Stiles—said that would be all right. It appears that the deposition of defendant Sanger was taken before the trial. In that deposition he testified that the day before the accident he had a conversation with Mr. Ludke (an officer of the Lacy Manufacturing Company entitled to give him orders) with reference to his visit to the International Electric Company, and upon the trial testified that this testimony was true. Mr. Ludke testified that he had had no such conversation with the defendant Sanger. Stiles only testified that he remembered no such conversation. Neither Mr. Ludke nor Mr. Stiles denied Sanger's testimony about the defect in the motor which had been repaired by the International Electric Company. Mr. Stiles had directed Sanger to go direct from his home (that is, the home of Mr. Sanger) to the job at Vernon on the morning of the 23d day of April, 1926. On that morning Sanger drove his automobile to the place in question; he went there to repair a motor for the Lacy Manufacturing Company; remained there three or four hours. Sanger left the Vernon job in his automobile with the intention of going from there to the International Electric Company so as to talk to the foreman about the motor heretofore referred to, and with the intention of going directly on to the plant of the Lacy Manufacturing Company. In doing this he was taken a few blocks off from the shortest route between the Vernon job and the plant of the Lacy Manufacturing Company. Sanger testified: "I went to the International Electric Company place of business to have a conversation with the foreman of the International Electric Company. There was something wrong with the motor they had repaired and I went there to find out from the foreman what was wrong. The motor in question belonged to the Lacy Manufacturing Company; there was something wrong with the winding of it, and I went to find out the trouble; I had no other purpose in going there." On the trial of the action Sanger testified as follows: "I could not decide whether I went to the International Electric Company on my own business or on that of the Lacy Manufacturing Company." Sanger, however, testified that in giving his deposition he stated that he was attending to business of the Lacy Manufacturing Company when at the International Electric Company's plant, and that this statement was true at the time he made it. Sanger testified that he parked his automobile on East Fourth street between Los Angeles and Main streets, on the north side of Fourth street; that he arrived there at about noon; he started to park in the red zone, then noticed this and moved up to the yellow zone; that he parked his car with the right wheel against the curb, and left the car in neutral gear with the hand brake set. Sanger then went to the International Electric Company's office, talked with the foreman about the motor, and did nothing else while away from his car; that he remained away ten or fifteen minutes. Upon returning, Sanger approached his car from the left-hand side. The self-starter was not working, so it was necessary to use the crank. He did not look to see if the car had been moved. The crank was lying on the floor of the car a few inches from the gear-shift lever and hand-brake lever. These were in plain view as he took up the crank. He then proceeded to crank the car, which, being in reverse gear, started down hill. Sanger attempted to get on the car and stop it, but did not succeed. The car went down the hill, mounted the curb at the corner of Fourth and Los Angeles streets and struck the plaintiff, injuring him severely. When the car started to back down the hill the defendant Sanger testified that he noticed for the first time that the car had been moved from the position in which he had left it. Sanger testified that while the car was moving he tried to catch it; got one of his feet on the running-board, but did not get into the car or to the steering wheel. Sanger further testified that he did not notice whether the hand brake had been released or whether the gear shift had been moved from neutral into reverse.

No instructions had ever been given by the Lacy Manufacturing Company as to how its employee Sanger should operate his car.

[4, 5] Upon this appeal it is claimed that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict against the appellants. We think it unnecessary to insert here any other portions of the testimony, as the foregoing is sufficient to sustain the respondent's contention that it supports the following propositions from which the jury was entitled to draw the conclusion that the defendant Sanger was negligent; that he was an employee of the defendant Lacy Manufacturing Company, and in the pursuit of its business at the time the injury resulted to the plaintiff. These propositions are listed as "A," "B," "C," and "D," and are as follows: "A. Starting the motor from a position from which he had no control over the movements of the car, without first having assured himself that the car would not be put in motion by such cranking; B. Failure to observe that the car had been moved; C. Failure to observe that the gear-shift was in reverse—it being in plain sight and a few inches from the crank which he picked up; D. Failure to observe that the brake had been released—the brake-lever being in plain sight and within a few inches from where the crank was picked up." The answer of the defendant Sanger to these propositions may be stated as follows: "I did not notice that the car was in gear; I did not notice that the brake had been released; I did not notice that the car had been moved." This, we think, is properly assigned by the respondent not only as a poor excuse, but as no excuse. Sanger, when starting his car by using the crank, was, of course, in a position where he could not have immediate control over the movement of the automobile. The very absence of this power of control would cause any reasonable person to ascertain if his car was in proper condition to be started. Every operator of an automobile knows, and we think must be reasonably held to know, that the starting of a car when in gear, by means of using a crank, is a hazardous operation. If in forward gear, it is likely to run over the person doing the cranking. If in reverse, it would immediately go in the opposite direction and away from the control of the person doing the cranking. The record shows that Sanger did nothing to determine whether the car was in neutral gear or had been changed. Appellant claims that he did not have to do anything to determine whether the car was in neutral gear, whether it had been changed, or whether the brakes were released. This would be tantamount to saying that a person starting a car need not take any precautions whatever to ascertain whether, in so doing, he would either be endangering himself or endangering some other person. Such is not the law. An automobile is a dangerous instrument when not operated with wisdom and due caution, and anyone who fails, whether in the operation of the car after set in motion, or in the setting of a car in motion, without taking reasonable precautions to see that in so doing injury will not follow, is guilty of acts upon which a jury may find the fact of negligence, even if a court might not declare such acts negligence as a matter of law.

[6] In this particular the appellant asks the following question: "Is the driver of an automobile, who has set the emergency brake, left his car in neutral gear, parking it in such a manner that it could be safely started, negligent in going in front of the car to crank it in order to start it, without examining the car to see whether the gear has been shifted from neutral to reverse, and the emergency or parking brake released?" To answer this question in favor of the appellant would be to presuppose that one starting a car is under no obligations to ascertain whether it can be safely started. It also presupposes that one who has left his car in proper condition is thereafter relieved from any reasonable exercise of judgment or precaution to see that it is in the same condition in which he left it. To answer the question in the negative also presupposes that the jury is under obligations to conclude that because a witness testifies that he left the car in neutral, the car was actually left in neutral gear. It also excludes the idea that the operator of the car was only absent therefrom ten or fifteen minutes. It likewise excludes the idea that the occurrence all took place in broad daylight, when no third person would be likely to be tampering with a parked car. It also includes the idea that when an operator of a car picks up the crank which is lying alongside of the brake-lever and the gear-shift lever, he is under no obligation to see that they are in proper position. The answer to the appellant's question is this: The fact that an operator of a car has parked the same properly does not thereafter relieve him from taking reasonable precautions when he returns to the car to see that it can be safely started. This duty is a continuing one. In other words, the fact that one has been careful at one time does not entitle him to be negligent at another time. There is no period of time when an operator of a vehicle like the modern automobile can be excused from negligence; there must be a reasonable exercise of care and caution all the while.

[7] The appellant cites, as we have stated, a long list of authorities having to do with the starting of parked cars by third persons. We do not need to review these authorities, as not one of them is applicable. The car in question was started by Sanger himself, and not by any other person. Nor do we need to consider the authorities cited where an employee had departed from his employer's business and was engaged in the pursuit of his own pleasure or business. The facts here, which we have cited, taken from Sanger's own testimony, show an entirely different state of circumstances. Nor is there anything in the contention that Sanger was using his own automobile. Press v. Industrial Accident Commission, 190 Cal. 114, 210 P. 820, 823; Dillon v. Prudential Insurance Co., 75 Cal. App. 266, 242 P. 736; Eng-Skell v. Industrial Accident Commission, 44 Cal. App. 210, 186 P. 163; Ryan v. Farrell, 208 Cal. 200, 280 P. 945; George v. Chaplin, 99 Cal. App. 709, 279 P. 485; May v. Farrell, 94 Cal. App. 703, 271 P. 759. These cases likewise negative the contention of the appellant that Sanger was an independent contractor.

[8] Upon the request of the defendant, the court instructed the jury as follows: "For the purposes of this case the testimony of the witness Sanger is to be accepted by you as true in so far as the Lacy Manufacturing Company is concerned. In determining the question of its liability, as distinguished from that of Mr. Sanger, you are to take Sanger's testimony, concerning the way the accident happened, as true. The plaintiff put Sanger on the witness stand as his witness, and so far as the Lacy Manufacturing Company is concerned, plaintiff is bound by the testimony given by Sanger while such witness." Pursuant to this instruction it is contended that the testimony of Sanger relieves the defendant, Lacy Manufacturing Company, from responsibility. It is for this reason that we have set forth the testimony of Sanger quite extensively, which we think, if accepted as true, shows conclusively sufficient facts to support the verdict of the jury against the Lacy Manufacturing Company. However, the contention of the appellant that the plaintiff is bound by the testimony of Sanger is not tenable. Section 2049, Code of Civil Procedure, reads: "The party producing a witness is not allowed to impeach his credit by evidence of bad character, but he may contradict him by other evidence, and may also show that he has made at other times statements inconsistent with his present testimony, as provided in section 2052."

Taking Sanger's testimony as absolutely true, it shows sufficient facts from which the jury was warranted in concluding that he was an employee of the Lacy Manufacturing Company on the day of the accident; that at the time of the accident he was engaged in the business of the Lacy Manufacturing Company; that Sanger was guilty of negligence in starting his car without having first ascertained that it could be safely started. It was likewise within the province of the jury to conclude whether Sanger had in fact left his car in neutral and the brake set, or whether he had parked the car, climbed out of it, leaving the gear shift in reverse when he stopped his car from going forward as he brought the right wheel thereof against the curb. It was only an assumption on the part of the witness that somebody had interfered with the gear-shift lever and the brake lever. But even if the assumption be true, the jury had ample reason for concluding that Sanger was negligent in not observing the changed position of the levers referred to.

Relying upon the following cases, to wit: Hedge v. Williams, 131 Cal. 455, 63 P. 721, 64 P. 106, 82 Am. St. Rep. 366; Pyyny v. Loose-Wiles Biscuit Co., 253 Mass. 574, 149 N. E. 541, and Khoury v. Edison Electric Illuminating Co., 265 Mass. 286, 164 N. E. 77, 60 A. L. R. 1159, the appellant Lacy Manufacturing Company insists that the appellant C. E. Sanger was an independent contractor at the time of the injury to the plaintiff, and therefore that the appellant Lacy Manufacturing Company is not liable. We find nothing in the case of Hedge v. Williams, supra, supporting the appellant's contention. The two other cases cited by appellant, if the law of this state, would lead to a reversal. In the case of Pyyny v. Loose-Wiles Biscuit Co., supra, it appears that one Bancroft was a traveling salesman in the general employment of the defendant; that he had no regular hours of work; his time was his own; he was employed to sell biscuits; that was his sole business; he could see the patrons any time during the twenty-four hours. Bancroft was paid a salary and commission and the expense of operating the car. He carried a sample case and advertisements in the back of his Ford coupé, and they were in his car at the time of the accident. It further appeared that about 1 o'clock on the day of the accident Bancroft drove to an Elks' Field Day picnic at Ft. Pond, in Lancaster, and remained there until around 4 o'clock, when he went to a weekly sales meeting in Fitchburg; that after the sales meeting, at a quarter to 5, he started, in a car, with a friend whom he had found at the picnic, to return to Ft. Pond, and that the accident happened on the road between Lineburg and the Pond at Lancaster. It further appears that Bancroft did some selling until he reached the "Field Day." "That he was going back to see some of his trade; he did not have an appointment with anyone in particular; did not expect to see any particular individual, but as a whole, expected to see some of his trade there. He intended to do business with them if he should see them." Upon the above facts it was held that the defendant was not liable for the injury caused by Bancroft. The court further said that it was the duty of Bancroft, and not of the defendant, to register the automobile and obtain a license to operate it; that the defendant had no right, upon the reported facts, to direct the manner in which Bancroft should control the car; it assumed no obligations to keep the car in repair, other than was involved in its agreement to pay the expense of operating it, or so much per mile for the number of miles that Bancroft operated the car for them in connection with his employment.

In the Edison Case, supra, it appears that the injury was caused by an automobile, owned and operated by Eric Parnell, who was in the general employment of the defendant. The accident occurred at the intersection of two streets, after Eric Parnell had left the defendant's place of business, and at the time was proceeding to Watertown, the purpose of his trip being in connection with the defendant's installation of a certain flood light in that place. That he had in the car a flood light belonging to the defendant, which he was carrying to that place; that prior to the accident, Parnell had entered into an agreement with the defendant, that when traveling for the defendant he could, at his election, use his own car for transportation, or the railroads and street railways, and in either case the defendant would pay to him an amount equivalent to the railroad or trolley fare; that the defendant had no other obligation to the said Parnell in respect to said Parnell's automobile or its use, than to pay to the said Parnell an amount equivalent to that which would have been Parnell's expenses had he traveled by common carrier rather than by the use of his own automobile; that the use by Parnell of his automobile on November 17, 1925, the day of the accident, and upon the particular trip which he was taking at the time of the accident, was known to the defendant, and the use of his automobile on this trip was in accordance with the above agreement between him and the defendants. Upon this state of facts the court directed a verdict for the defendant, which was upheld upon appeal.

[9] While these opinions are by a court of unquestioned ability, nevertheless, a few important elements have apparently been overlooked or are not mentioned in the opinions, or else there is a confusion of ideas. But giving the two cases all the weight to which they are entitled, they are directly at variance with what appears to be the settled law of this state. Nor do we think that the distinction between the control of the person operating the automobile and the mechanical control of the automobile is tenable. If one has control or the right to control the person operating the automobile, has the power of employment or discharge, and may direct the person operating the automobile where to go and what services to perform upon his mission, and has a right to discharge the employee for any disobedience or any wrongful act while on such mission, we think the legal power of control and the relation of master and servant is established.

In the case of Press Publishing Company v. Industrial Accident Commission, supra, we find the following applicable to the instant case: "As previously indicated, it is not the actual exercise of control, but the right of control—that is to say, the potential power of control—which is important in a determination of whether or not the status of an employee or independent contractor exists." Citing Claremont Country Club v. Industrial Accident Commission, 174 Cal. 395, 163 P. 209, L. R. A. 1918F, 177. "One of the means of ascertaining whether or not this right to control exists is the determination of whether or not, if instructions were given, they would have to be obeyed. In the instant case, it is undisputed that the Press Publishing Company had the power to hire and the power to discharge.

* * * This power of discharge made obligatory any instructions given, for it gave to the Press Publishing Company the power to require obedience to those instructions and insured their being carried out. As was held in Western Metal Supply Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 407, 417, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 390, 156 P. 491, 495: "The real test by which to determine whether a person is acting as the servant of another is to ascertain whether, at the time when the injury was inflicted, he was subject to such person's orders and control and was liable to be discharged by him for disobedience * * * or misconduct." The fact that Benefiel furnished his own transportation does not, of course, affect his status as an employee." (Citing Eng-Skell Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 44 Cal. App. 210, 186 P. 163.) * * * "It is insisted by both petitioners that because of the fact that Benefiel owned his own motorcycle, paying personally for its upkeep, gasoline, oil, etc., and also because of the fact that he carried packages and filled small orders for persons along his route in order to defray the expenses of his machine, it must be held that he was engaged in an independent calling." This contention of the appellants was held without merit.

In the case of Ryan v. Farrell and Edwards-Merritt Co., a corporation, 208 Cal. 200, 280 P. 945, 946, an automobile salesman was in the general employment of the defendant; was using his own automobile at the time of the injury. The employer, nevertheless, was held liable. We take from that case the following:

"In calling upon prospective purchasers Farrell used an automobile purchased from appellant on conditional sales contract and not fully paid for, and at the time he struck the automobile in which plaintiff was riding he was returning to San Diego, his place of residence, from Pacific Beach, where he had gone with the purpose of interviewing a prospective purchaser. He testified that salesmen connected with appellant generally used between 100 and 120 gallons of gasoline a month, 40 gallons of which were furnished by said appellant. If Farrell was the employee of appellant, rather than an independent contractor, and was acting in the course of his employment when he inflicted injuries upon plaintiff, appellant is not relieved of liability by reason of the circumstance that the automobile was not one supplied by it for the use of its employee, but was the private car of said employee used by him in performing service for his employer with the express or implied consent of said employer." See, also, the case of May v. Farrell, 94 Cal. App. 703, 271 P. 789, where a long list of authorities are cited showing that the mere fact of an employee using his own automobile while in the course of his employment in behalf of the employer, is immaterial. Hearing in that case was denied by the Supreme Court.

In the case of Dillon v. Prudential Insurance Co., 75 Cal. App. 266, 242 P. 736, the employee of the company used his own automobile; his duties were to travel from place to place and collect premiums on policies, etc. The fact that the employee used his own automobile was held not to relieve the defendant from liability. The servant in that case, just as in the case at bar, was in the course of the business of the master. The opinion in this case, by Justice Langdon, cites a number of authorities supporting the conclusion reached in that case.

In George v. Chaplin, 99 Cal. App. 709, 279 P. 485, a similar question was before the court, and it was there held: "In determining whether the relationship is that of independent contractor or master and servant, the real test is whether the employee is subject to the employer's order and control, and is liable to be discharged for disobedience or misconduct; and the fact that a certain amount of freedom of action is inherent in the nature of the work does not change the character of the employment, where the employer has general supervision and control thereof." The opinion in this case points out the distinction between one who is employed to do certain work, and where one is only accountable for the results of the work. In the instant case Sanger was in the general employment of the defendant, Lacy Manufacturing Company, and was in nowise responsible for the result of any work; he was on a mission to gain information for the benefit of his employers. The cases which we have heretofore cited are also referred to and reaffirmed in the opinion in the case of George v. Chaplin.

In the case of Eng-Skell Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 44 Cal. App. 210, 186 P. 163, in an opinion written by Justice Richards, it was held that an agreement of employment under which the servant was to furnish a delivery track during the term covered by the agreement, which truck he was to drive, did not affect his status as an employee. This case recites that the circumstances are no different where an employee furnishes his own automobile, and where employees furnish their own tools in other occupations carried on for the benefit of the employer.

A good case is that of Dishman v. Whitney, 121 Wash. 157, 209 P. 12, 29 A. L. R. 460, where it was held: "A salesman canvassing in a city on a salary and commission, and using his own automobile to reach his prospects, is not an independent contractor, for whose negligent use of the car the employer is not responsible."

A recent case, dealing with the questions which we are now considering, is that of Brown v. Montgomery Ward & Co. (Cal. App.) 286 P. 474. The following excerpt from the opinion shows the facts involved and their applicability here: "The defendants claim that the evidence did not show that at the time of the accident the defendant Vinje, who was driving the automobile, was acting within the scope and course of his employment. Mr. Vinje is an accountant, he owns his automobile, and resides in Berkeley. At the time of the accident he was a traveling auditor for the defendant Montgomery Ward & Co. That company maintains a store in Oakland and a chain of stores located in different parts of the state. The head auditor is attached to the Oakland store. He has an assistant. Besides that assistant, the company has two or more traveling auditors. From time to time the head auditor and the traveling auditor, as the witnesses testified, 'lay out a program of audits for a trip.' That program includes certain designated stores and a certain designated period for the trip. Mr. Vinje was paid a certain sum per week, and he was allowed to travel in his own automobile and the company paid him nine cents per mile." (Here follows a description of the places to be visited and the order in which they were to be visited.) " * * * On Monday, about ten days prior to the accident, Mr. Vinje left his home to audit the stores located at Merced, Tulare, Hanford, and Salinas. He traveled in his automobile and carried with him a typewriter and some books of instruction which were the property of Montgomery Ward & Co. At about 3 o'clock on Friday, July 29, 1928, he had finished auditing the store at Salinas, which was the last store on his program, and had written out his reports. * * * As he traveled north he passed by the Oakland store, but did not stop. It was then 7:45 p. m. and the store had closed at 5 p. m. He continued on his way to his home in Berkeley and returned to the store Monday morning. While traveling between the Oakland store and his home the accident happened." Upon these facts it was held that the defendant was liable. It appears that the appellants did not really urge the question that Vinje was an independent contractor. In view of the authorities which we have cited, such a defense, we think, would have been untenable.

The authorities which we have cited and the cases cited in the opinions to which we have referred demonstrate that the great weight of the cases having to do with the question of employer and employee, under conditions similar to those presented, is that the employer is liable, and that where the employer has control over the employee, the fact that the employee uses his own automobile is wholly immaterial if that automobile is being used when the employee is in the general course of his employment. In other words, the control of the man behind the wheel is control of the wheel, and that to draw a distinction between the control over the animate and control over the inanimate in fixing liability, is not either logical or a correct statement of the law. It could not very well be argued that an employer is not liable where a mechanic negligently drops a hammer and injures a third person, because the hammer happened to belong to the mechanic. With no more consistency can it be argued that an employer is not liable for the negligent operation of an automobile, in the course of his employment, simply because the automobile belongs to the employee. The Lacy Manufacturing Company knew that Sanger, in going to Vernon, where he had been directed to go in the service of the company, would use his own automobile, and the same company also knew that whenever he stopped at the International Electric Company it would be some time when he was "up-town" with his automobile, and would be in the course of his general employment.

The facts which we have set forth, and the authorities which we have cited, we think, establish beyond question the liability not only of the appellant Sanger, but also of the appellant Lacy Manufacturing Company, a corporation.

The judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

TITLE INS. & TRUST CO. v. BEAN et al.

Civ. 7555.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 1, California.

Nov. 20, 1930.

1. Highways ⇨107(1).

Notice of final hearing in matter of road improvement, in which "Inc." was left off contractor's name, held substantial compliance with statute (St. 1907, p. 806, § 18, as amended by St. 1921, p. 311).

The notice was correctly entitled as "Notice of Final Hearing in the Matter of Road District Improvement No. 181," and in the body of the notice a reference was correctly made to number of the resolution of intention to perform proposed work, as well as number of road district improvement, but name of contractor was stated as "F. and E" instead of "F. and E., Inc."

2. Highways ⇨107(1).

Property owner, after statutory time for objecting elapsed, could not take advantage of error occurring in course of road improvement proceedings (St. 1907, p. 806, §§ 11, 18-20, as amended by St. 1921, p. 311).

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William D. Dehy, Judge.

Action by the Title Insurance & Trust Company against J. H. Bean and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Frank Bryant, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Everett W. Mattoon, Co. Counsel, and Gordon Boller, Deputy Co. Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HOUSER, J.

In pursuance of a petition presented to the board of supervisors of Los Angeles county, which petition was signed by the plaintiff and each of fifteen other individual owners of respective pieces of real property, said board of supervisors, acting in accordance with the provisions of the so-called "Road District Improvement Act of 1907," and statutes amendatory thereof (Stats. 1907, p. 806; Stats. 1921, p. 311), awarded a contract for the improvement of a road specified and described in the said petition. As its final act in connection with such improvement, said board of supervisors ordered the issuance of certain bonds in payment to the contractor for the work done by him or it in the completion of the contract, and which said bonds were thereupon issued and delivered to the contractor.

Although, as provided by the terms of the statute, as the proposed improvement progresses, as well as after its completion, an owner of real property affected by said proposed improvement is afforded an opportunity to object thereto and to have a hearing with reference to his objection before the board of supervisors, the record herein shows that at no time preceding the completion of the work of improvement, nor on any occasion until long after the bonds in payment of the work done had been delivered to the contractor, did the plaintiff offer or make any objection of any sort in connection with said improvement to said board of supervisors; nor was it until after a tax or assessment had been levied against the property owned by the plaintiff for the purpose of collecting an installment or fixed portion of the cost of such improvement that the action herein was commenced by the plaintiff to quiet title to its said property as against the lien arising from such tax or assessment. It is from a judgment rendered in such action in favor of the defendants that this appeal is presented to this court.

The objections of appellant are directed to an error which occurred in the "Notice of Final Hearing" before the board of supervisors in the matter of the improvement, which error, in substance, is that the name of the contractor who performed the work was incorrectly stated in said notice of final hearing; also to the effect of the tax or assessment levied for the payment of the work of improvement, in that the total amount of the several levies of taxes or assessments which already had been levied, or which necessarily would be levied, exceeded the benefits accruing to the property of the plaintiff, as well as the value of the property itself, as disclosed by the assessment value placed thereon by the county assessor for the purpose of levying the general tax on said property.

[1] With reference to the objection interposed by appellant to the effect that, because of an error as to the name of the contractor, which occurred in the notice of final hearing, the invalidity of the bonds issued in payment of the work should be decreed and title quieted to the property in question, at the outset the provisions of the statute relating to the proceedings should be noted. The pertinent part of the statute is as follows:

"The presiding officer of the board of supervisors is hereby authorized to fix a time and give a notice for a hearing for the purpose of determining whether the work shall be accepted as being completed according to the contract, and for determining the aggregate amounts for which bonds shall be issued.

"Such hearing shall be known as the final hearing. The notice of such hearing may, in form, and shall, in substance, be (filling the blanks) as follows:

"Notice of final hearing in the matter of road district improvement number _____

"Notice is hereby given that a final hearing of the above named matter will be had at the hour of — m., on the _____ day of _____ 19—, at the chamber of the board of supervisors of the county of _____ State of California, for the purpose of determining whether the work done under the contract made with _____ under resolution of intention number _____ in road improvement district number _____ of the county of _____ shall be accepted as being performed according to the contract. * * * Stats. 1921, pp. 311, 323, § 18.

As hereinbefore indicated, the only complaint regarding the notice which was given is that, instead of correctly stating the name of the contractor as "Francisco and Ellington, Inc.," the notice incorrectly named the contractors as "Francisco and Ellington." It will be observed that the language of the statute is that "the notice of such hearing may, in form, and shall, in substance, be" (so and so). Then follows a form which "may" be followed. All that the statute specifically demands is that the substance of the form "shall" be followed.

With the one exception, the notice given was "verbatim" with the form suggested by the provisions of the statute. It was correctly entitled as "Notice of Final Hearing in the Matter of Road District Improvement No. 181." In the body of the notice a reference was correctly made to the number of the "Resolution of Intention" to perform the proposed work, as well as the number of the "Road District Improvement"; and the name of the contractor was stated as "Francisco and Ellington." It thus appears that the identity of the proceeding regarding which the notice was given was established, first, by a certain numbered "Resolution of Intention"; and, secondly, by the specific number by which the "Road District Improvement" was designated. As is stated in the statute, the notice was given "for the purpose of determining whether the work shall be accepted as being completed according to the contract", etc.; and it is most apparent that, after such a particularization of the road district improvement, the requirement of the statute that the "substance" of a specified form of notice should be given was complied with, and that the omission of the letters "Inc." after the words "Francisco and Ellington" could have misled no person who was interested in the matter.

[2] Furthermore, as affects either of the objections herein specified by the appellant, it is noted that no claim is made that in any particular the board of supervisors acted either fraudulently or in violation of its discretionary powers in the premises. Assuming (without conceding) that, had the plaintiff availed itself of either or any of the several opportunities which were afforded it by the terms of the statute to make timely objection to the board of supervisors relating either to the improvement as it progressed, to the cost thereof, or to the assessment or assessments of which it here complains, and thereupon that either or all its several objections had been overruled or denied, it might have become entitled to some remedy, it is plain, both by the terms of the statute as well as by numerous decisions of the courts of this state, that as to each of such several opportunities, the plaintiff having permitted the statutory time to elapse within which it properly might have sought and possibly might have obtained relief, it is now too late for the plaintiff to claim or to take advantage of any error which may have occurred in the course of proceedings before the board of supervisors. Sections 11, 18, 19, 20, Stats. 1907, p. 806, as amended by Stats. 1921, p. 311; Dillingham v. Welch, 179 Cal. 656, 178 P. 512; Pierce v. County of Solano, 62 Cal. App. 465, 217 P. 545; Swall v. County of Los Angeles, 42 Cal. App. 758, 184 P. 406; Hutchinson Co. v. Coughlin, 42 Cal. App. 664, 184 P. 435; Duncan v. Ramish, 142 Cal. 686, 76 P. 661; Lent v. Tillson, 72 Cal. 404, 14 P. 71; Chase v. Trout, 146 Cal. 350, 80 P. 81.

The judgment is affirmed.

Fall & Fall, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Geo. H. Johnson, Dist. Atty., and James L. King, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of San Bernardino, for respondents.

MARKS, Acting P. J.

Appellant is, and was at all times herein mentioned, the holder of a certificate entitling her to teach in the high schools of the state of California. The Victor Valley Union High School district was a district that employed more than eight teachers under a principal who devoted more than two hours per day to supervision in the school under his control. Walker Jones, L. V. Robinson, R. J. Mills, James M. Holloway, and T. A. Lee were trustees of this district.

Appellant was employed as a teacher in the district from 1922 to the end of the school term in 1927, and became a permanent teacher of such district under the provisions of section 1609 of the Political Code. On May 7, 1927, the board of trustees passed a resolution terminating the employment of each teacher in the high school effective June 30, 1927, the end of the school year.

On August 20, 1927, appellant informed the trustees of the district that she was ready and willing to discharge her duties as a teacher, and asked them to inform her of the date upon which the school would open. Under date of August 23, 1927, appellant, acting through Messrs. Fall & Fall, her attorneys, informed the trustees by letter that she was ready, willing, and able to teach in the high school during the ensuing school year, and requested that she be informed when she could enter upon the performance of her duties. It does not appear from the record that respondents replied to either of these communications. Under date of February 17, 1928, Messrs. Fall & Fall, as attorneys for appellant, wrote a letter to the board of trustees of the district, in which they requested the payment of the salary of appellant from the commencement of the school year in 1927. They received no reply to this letter, and suit was instituted in the court below whereby appellant sought a writ of mandate requiring respondents to reinstate her in her position as a permanent teacher, and directing the drawing of warrants in her favor for the salary which had accrued during the school year 1927-1928. It was stipulated at the trial of this case that no charges were filed against appellant, as required by section 1609 of the Political Code, nor was she given any hearing by the board of trustees of the district prior to her purported dismissal. After proof of the foregoing facts the trial court granted respondents' motion to dismiss appellant's petition. This had the same effect as a judgment of nonsuit.

[1-3] Since this case was heard in the court below, the cases of La Shells v. Hench, 98 Cal. App. 6, 276 P. 377; Dutart v. Woodward, 99 Cal. App. 736, 279 P. 493; and Saxton v. Board of Education, 206 Cal. 758, 276 P. 998, have been decided. These cases, together with the case of Grigsby v. King, 202 Cal. 299, 260 P. 789, furnish us authority under which we must reverse the judgment and order of the trial court.

It is now well-settled law in California that the position of teacher in the public schools of California becomes permanent after teaching for the length of time required by the Teachers' Tenure Act (Pol. Code, § 1609), and that a permanent teacher can only be deprived of her right to teach by and after the filing of written charges against her and a hearing had thereon. There were no charges filed or hearings held in this case. Therefore the motion of respondents to dismiss the petition should not have been granted.

[4] Respondents contend that, under section 1699 of the Political Code, appellant had the right to appeal to the superintendent of public instruction upon her salary being withheld, and that, as she failed to do so, her action could not be maintained. In the case of Saxton v. Board of Education, supra, it was held that the provisions of this section do not apply in the case of the discharge of a permanent teacher where the procedure prescribed by section 1609 of the Political Code is not followed.

In the instant case, appellant sought to accomplish two results by her petition for a writ of mandamus: First, her reinstatement as a permanent teacher; and, second, the drawing of warrants for the payment of her salary. If the provisions of this section could be construed so as to defeat her action for her salary it could not be held to bar her action for reinstatement.

The order and judgment appealed from are reversed.

HOUSER, J.

The defendant was the owner or in the possession of certain storerooms at what were known as Nos. 745 to 749 South Hill street, in the city of Los Angeles. The storeroom at No. 745 was separate and apart from the remainder of the premises, the latter of which were occupied by defendant in the operation of its business as a restaurant. The plaintiff is a corporation acting as a broker in the business of selling and leasing real property. Through an employee of the plaintiff, it solicited from the defendant the business of procuring a tenant for such storeroom at No. 745 South Hill street, and at the same time informed the defendant of the name of a person or a corporation which plaintiff hoped might be induced to become such tenant. Concurrently therewith, the defendant gave to the plaintiff full particulars respecting the terms and conditions under which the storeroom would be leased. Shortly thereafter, acting under the direction of the plaintiff, the proposed tenant visited the premises owned or possessed by the defendant. At that time, the plaintiff was informed by the defendant that theretofore it had given to another person an option to lease the storeroom at No. 745 South Hill street, but that, if such option were not exercised, the defendant would then be in a position to enter into a lease with the proposed tenant which the plaintiff had sent to the defendant. Within a few days following such statement by the defendant, the storeroom at No. 745 South Hill street was leased by the defendant to a third person or corporation, with the proviso that possession of such storeroom was not to be taken by the lessee until after the lapse of approximately three months following the date of such lease. About two weeks after the proposed tenant who had been introduced to the defendant by the plaintiff had inspected the premises owned or possessed by the defendant and had then been informed as hereinbefore stated, and some days following the date of the lease of the storeroom at No. 745 South Hill street to the third person or corporation, the defendant approached the proposed tenant who had been introduced to the defendant by the plaintiff and in person sought to induce such proposed tenant to lease from the defendant a portion of the remainder of the premises which were then being occupied and operated by the defendant as a restaurant. The part of such premises at that time proposed by the defendant to be leased to such prospective tenant was known as No. 749 South Hill street. The negotiations between

Some sort of contractual relation is prerequisite to recovery of broker's commission for procuring tenant.

2. Contracts ⇨4.

Written proposal made and accepted, or oral substitute, in substance the counterpart of the writing, is not necessary to establish contractual relationship.

3. Brokers ⇨40.

Defendants permitting brokers to continue efforts to interest prospective lessee, without informing brokers premises were leased, held liable on implied contract on consummation of lease for different premises (Civ. Code § 1589).

Civ. Code, § 1589, provides that a voluntary acceptance of benefit of transaction is equivalent to consent to all obligations arising from it so far as facts are known or ought to be known to person accepting. Defendants employed broker to procure tenant for particular premises, but, after broker had interested proposed tenant, leased premises to third person, and leased different premises to tenant procured by broker. Defendants contended there was no contractual relationship as to premises actually leased.

the parties with reference to the location at storeroom No. 749 South Hill street continued over a period of several weeks. In the meantime, the storeroom at No. 745 South Hill street, although leased to a third person or corporation, remained unoccupied. But at no time after such premises at No. 745 South Hill street were so leased did the defendant ever notify or inform the plaintiff of such fact; nor until after the premises at No. 749 South Hill street had been leased as hereinafter stated, did the plaintiff have any knowledge of the fact that the premises at said No. 745 had been leased. To the contrary, with knowledge of the fact that the plaintiff was in complete ignorance of the leasing of the storeroom at said No. 745, the defendant permitted and encouraged the plaintiff to use and exert its endeavors in behalf of the defendant toward inducing the prospective tenant to enter into a lease with the defendant—the plaintiff all the time assuming that the storeroom at No. 745 South Hill street was the premises to be leased. A lease of No. 749 South Hill street was finally entered into between the defendant and the tenant introduced to the defendant and presented to it by the plaintiff. After demand had been made by the plaintiff upon the defendant that it pay the usual commission charged by real estate brokers in the city of Los Angeles for such services as had been rendered by the plaintiff to the defendant in the matter, and following the refusal by the defendant to compensate the plaintiff for such services, the action herein was commenced.

On the trial of the action the principal evidence introduced in substance having been as hereinbefore indicated, judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff; and the defendant appeals therefrom.

Appellant urges the points that "without a contract of some kind, no broker can recover"; and that "the law will not imply a contract to pay for services, where those services have been rendered pursuant to an express contract."

[1-3] It is plain enough that in circumstances of the nature of those here under consideration some sort of contractual relation between the parties is a necessary prerequisite to a recovery by the person who performs the services as against the person for whom or in whose behalf the services are rendered. However, it is well-settled law that neither a written proposal on the part of one person which in terms is accepted by another, nor even as between the parties, an oral substitute, in substance the counterpart of what might have been a writing, is necessary to establish a contractual relationship. In this case the relationship of the respective parties, followed by unambiguous conduct one toward the other, constituted a clear manifestation that the defendant desired the plaintiff to perform certain services in behalf of the defendant; and on the performance of which the law assumes that compensation was to be made therefor. At least, as far as concerns the premises at No. 749 South Hill street, there was no express contract between the parties. However, the fact that the plaintiff was not correctly informed by the defendant as to the particular floor space which it desired to lease to some other person, or of the exact street number by which such place was known or designated, should present no legal barrier to the just compensation of the plaintiff for services honestly performed by it in procuring a tenant for the defendant at its request or at least with its consent and acquiescence.

Section 1589 of the Civil Code provides as follows: "A voluntary acceptance of the benefit of a transaction is equivalent to a consent to all the obligations arising from it, so far as the facts are known, or ought to be known, to the person accepting."

With full knowledge of all the facts which related to the situation, and particularly that the plaintiff knew nothing with reference to the fact that the storeroom at No. 745 South Hill street had already been leased to another corporation, the defendant voluntarily accepted the benefits which arose from the efforts of the plaintiff in endeavoring to procure a tenant for the defendant, with the result that the storeroom at No. 749 South Hill street was leased to the identical corporation with which during all the time involved in the matter the plaintiff had been negotiating—from which it follows that defendant consented "to all the obligations" which would have arisen from the transaction had both of the parties thereto been fully cognizant of all the facts and had entered into an agreement with reference thereto.

The other points presented by appellant and upon which reliance is also placed as constituting sufficient grounds for reversal of the judgment are to the effect that, where no contract exists between a landlord and a broker, the landlord will incur no liability to the broker by leasing the premises in question to a person introduced by the broker to the landlord in connection with "another matter"; also, that the broker "must perform within the time specified."

Considering the facts in the instant case, it is difficult to perceive the application to them of the principles of law enunciated by appellant. As this court has attempted to elucidate herein, by reason of the conduct of the parties to the transaction, and in view of the situation and the knowledge of each of them with reference to the facts involved, an implied contract resulted. With the acquiescence and consent of the defendant, the plaintiff performed certain services in behalf of the defendant which, to say the least, largely contributed to the leasing of the premises in question. Compensation for such services should follow as a matter of course.

The judgment is affirmed.

Evidence showed wide boulevard had been constructed in front of lessee's garage and auto camp, and that access to and egress from it had both been facilitated by construction of proposed highway.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action by the People against Joseph Millett and another to condemn land for highway purposes. From the judgment, defendant Frank Marschall appeals.

Paul F. Fratessa and Fabius T. Finch, both of San Francisco, for the People.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal by defendant Frank Marschall from a judgment entered against him in an eminent domain proceeding.

The facts are briefly these: The state of California, acting through the California highway commission, brought this action to condemn, for highway purposes, a small strip of land in San Mateo county fronting on the county road. The defendant Joseph Millett is the owner of the land sought to be taken, and also the owner of a large area contiguous thereto. On February 3, 1925, Millett and wife leased to defendant and appellant, Frank Marschall, all of the lands owned by Millett, except the dwelling house, for a term of ten years. The rental for the first three months was $75 per month, and $200 per month for the remainder of the lease. Only a very small portion of the land leased to Marschall is sought to be condemned in these proceedings. Marschall was in possession of the land leased and was using the same for an auto camp and garage business. One of the auto camp cottages projected a short distance onto the land sought to be taken, but this cottage was moved by plaintiff to another location on the leased premises.

The new road runs near a garage built by Marschall on premises leased. Plaintiff, however, before the commencement of this action, paid appellant $2,500 damages to the garage and, therefore, the question of damages to the garage is not an issue in this case.

The case was tried before the court without a jury, and the court found that Millett had sustained damages in the sum of $2,473.50 for the land taken, and also sustained further damages in the sum of $2,400 by reason of its severance from the balance of the land not taken, making a total sum of $4,873.50, and rendered judgment accordingly.

The court also found that the appellant Marschall had sustained no damages whatever, either by reason of the taking of the small strip under lease, the removal of the cottage, or by reason of its severance from the other portion of the land held by him under lease.

Appellant Marschall contends that the court erred in awarding all of the damages to Millett and none to him—that he should have been awarded $2,207 thereof, and prays that the judgment be modified accordingly; or, in other words, he claims that the uncontradicted evidence shows that his leasehold interest was damaged, by reason of the taking of the strip for highway purposes and its severance from the portion not taken, in the sum of $2,207, and that out of the total damages awarded by the court to Millett he should have been paid that amount.

[1, 2] The court having found that appellant's leasehold interest was not damaged, and that Millett, the owner of the land, was entitled to all of the damages awarded, we are helpless to interfere, provided the findings of the court are sustained by the evidence. This rule is so well established that citation of authority is entirely unnecessary.

We have examined the entire record with care, and we think the findings of the trial court find substantial support in the evidence. The evidence shows that a wide boulevard has been constructed in front of appellant's garage and auto camp, and that access to and egress from it have both been facilitated by the construction of the proposed highway.

The testimony of Mr. E. G. Poss, assistant division engineer of the California highway commission, is sufficient upon which to sustain the findings of the trial court.

It is unnecessary to state the evidence here in detail. The case, in its last analysis, is a simple question of fact, and the trial court having determined that question upon sufficient evidence, against the contention of appellant, we are powerless to interfere. In view of this fact, we deem a further discussion of the case entirely unnecessary.

The judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

FARUM v. GARRISON et al.
Civ. 7287.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 2, California.
Dec. 2, 1930.

1. Automobiles ☞171(1).

Automobile driver approaching intersection could not assume road was unoccupied, or that there was no one else, except automobile collided with, traveling on road.

2. Automobiles ☞208.

Automobile driver entering intersection held not contributorily negligent if failing to keep continuous watch on movements of defendants' car after seeing car approaching intersection.

3. Automobiles ☞146.

In determining automobile driver's negligence, physical facts should be considered.

4. Appeal and error ☞979(2).

Sufficiency of evidence is fact question reviewable by trial court, and discretion in granting new trial is not error of law which may be disturbed on appeal, unless discretion is abused.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; F. B. Brown, Judge.

Action by Julius L. Farum against V. G. Garrison and others. Verdict for defendants, plaintiff's motion for new trial was granted, and defendants appeal.

Order affirmed.

Owen D. Richardson and Donald B. Richardson, both of San Jose, for appellants.

Maurice J. Rankin and S. F. Holstein, both of San Jose, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J.

The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendants to recover a judgment for damages arising out of an automobile accident. The defendants answered and a trial was had before the trial court sitting with a jury. The verdict was for the defendants. The plaintiff made a motion for a new trial. The motion was granted, and the defendants have appealed under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[1, 2] In their first point the defendants claim that the evidence was clearly insufficient to support a verdict for the plaintiff because it showed that the plaintiff's negligence was a contributory cause of the injuries sustained by him. The accident happened at the intersection of two crossroads in a district where the speed limit was 20 miles per hour. As the plaintiff was approaching the crossing from the east he saw the defendants' car 100 or 150 feet south of the intersection. Plaintiff slowed down to 15 miles per hour and entered the intersection at that speed. He had his lights on, but it was just breaking day. As the plaintiff passed the curb line the other car was 20 or 30 feet south of the car tracks. He testified that he figured he had the right of way and took his eyes off of their car at that time. Having set forth the above portions of the record the defendants assert that the plaintiff's said negligence consisted of not keeping continuous watch on the movements of the defendants' car. He cites and relies on Towne v. Godeau, 70 Cal. App. 148, 153, 232 P. 1010; Truitner v. Knight, 83 Cal. App. 655, 661, 662, 257 P. 447; Cal. Jur. Supp. 135-136, and cases. If it is his contention that after the plaintiff saw the position of the defendants' car he was bound to keep looking at it and not to look at, nor to look out for, other dangers, if any, the authorities cited do not support him. The plaintiff was not entitled to assume the road was unoccupied. Rush v. Lagomarsino, 196 Cal. 308, 237 P. 1066. For the same reason he was not entitled to assume that there was no one else except the defendants traveling the road. We cannot say as a matter of law that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence if he failed to keep a continuous watch on the movements of defendants' car after seeing their car at the point indicated.

[3] In their next point the defendants argue that the evidence showed that they were not negligent. True, it is that they so testified. But it is also true that the plaintiff's evidence given on that subject was quite to the contrary. In this connection the physical facts should also be taken into consideration, and no doubt the trial court gave them the consideration to which they were entitled.

[4] The sufficiency of the evidence being a question of fact which the trial court was authorized to review, the exercise of its discretion was not error of law which may be disturbed by this court, except this court is able to say that the trial court abused its discretion. 20 Cal. Jur. 114. That it did abuse its discretion we are unable to say.

The order is affirmed.

In re BORBA'S ESTATE.

Civ. 7606.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California.

Dec. 2, 1930.

As Modified Dec. 23, 1930.

1. Wills ⇐440.

Real intent expressed in will must be discovered, if practicable, and should prevail, though requiring departure from literal construction (Civ. Code, §§ 1317, 1322).

Civ. Code, § 1322, provides that clear and distinct devise or bequest cannot be affected by any reasons assigned therefor, other words not equally clear and distinct, or argument from other parts of will, but section 1317 requires that will be construed according to testator's intent.

2. Wills ⇐472.

Clause declaring intention to give children who received no advances sum which would make all share alike must prevail over preceding conflicting portions of will (Civ. Code, § 1321).

3. Wills ⇐529.

Children of testator held entitled under will to equal shares of residue, including advances, less sums advanced to some of them (Civ. Code, § 1395).

The will gave one-eleventh share of residue, less amounts advanced, to six of testator's children, and one-eleventh portion, plus one-fifth share of portion of residue, increased by such advances, to his remaining five children, "it being my intention to give our children who have received no advances a sum which will make all share and share alike when taking into consideration the advances heretofore made." Civ. Code, § 1395, provides that "any estate * * * given by the decedent in his lifetime as an advancement to any child, or other heir, is a part of the estate * * * for the purposes of division and distribution, * * * and must be taken by such child, or other heir, toward his share of the estate."

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; P. F. Gosbey, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Joseph R. Borba, deceased. From an order and decree of distribution on petition of the American Trust Company, executor, etc., Annie Borba Ryan and others appeal.

Reversed, with directions.

Louis Oneal and Maurice J. Rankin, both of San Jose, for appellant Annie Borba Ryan.

Vincent W. Hallinan and Felix M. Cunningham, both of San Francisco, for appellants Joseph Borba and others.

Fry & Jenkins and Fred A. Wool, all of San Jose, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

Joseph R. Borba died on December 10, 1928, in Santa Clara county. He left a will, which was duly admitted to probate and letters testamentary issued thereon.

Among other provisions the will contained the following:

"Third: Prior to the making of this will I have advanced to Joe Borba the sum of one thousand dollars, to Dominicus Borba one thousand dollars, to Frank Borba three thousand dollars, to John Borba one thousand dollars, to Annie Borba seven hundred fifty dollars and to Rodgers Borba six hundred fifty dollars, all being sons and daughters of Anna S. Borba and myself, the other five children, to wit, Mary Garcia Pierce, Rosa Amaral, Minnie Dutra, Antone Borba and Willie Borba, also the children of Anna S. Borba and myself, having received no advancements whatsoever.

"Fourth: I give, devise and bequeath to Frank Borba, my son, one-eleventh less three thousand dollars heretofore advanced to him, of all of the residue of my estate; to Joe Borba, John Borba and Dominicus Borba, our sons, one-eleventh share, less one thousand dollars, to be deducted from each share, said deduction having been advanced to said sons during my life-time, of the residue of my estate; to Annia Borba one-eleventh share, less seven hundred fifty dollars, the sum having been advanced to her, of the residue of my estate; to Rodgers Borba, one-eleventh share, less six hundred fifty dollars, the same having been advanced to him during my lifetime, of the residue of my estate, and to Mary Garcia Pierce, Rosa Amaral, Minnie Dutra, Antone Borba and Willie Borba an one-eleventh portion of all of the residue of my estate, plus a one-fifth share of all that portion of the residue which was increased by the advances deducted from the shares of the above named sons and daughter, it being my intention to give our children who have received no advances a sum which will make all share and share alike when taking into consideration the advances heretofore made; it is my wish and I do so will that in the event of the death of any of the above named children without issue that his or her share shall be divided equally among the survivors."

On November 10, 1929, his executor filed a final account, and petitioned for distribution from which it appears that the property remaining to be distributed consisted of cash in the sum of $28,031.14. This sum by the decree of distribution was ordered to be distributed to the children of the decedent as follows: Frank Borba, nothing; Joe Borba, $1,548.28; Dominicus Borba, $1,548.28; Annie Ryan, formerly Annia Borba, $1,798.28; Rodgers Borba, $1,898.28; George W. Lyle, as sheriff of the county of Santa Clara, attaching officer in an action filed in the superior court of said county against John Borba, named therein as Jack Barbe, $1,548.28; to each of decedent's other children, namely, Mary Garcia Pierce, Rosa Amaral, Minnie Dutra, Antone Borba and Willie Borba, there was distributed $3,937.93.

Frank, Joseph, Dominicus, John and Rodgers Borba and Annie Borba Ryan have appealed from the order and decree of distribution. They claim that the court erred in its construction of the provisions of the will, and that they are entitled to more, and the heirs to whom no advances were made to less, of the amount remaining to be distributed than the decree provides.

In making distribution the court divided the amount which remained to be distributed into eleven parts each in the sum of $2,548.28; it then deducted from the shares of appellants the advances received by each of them, adding these amounts to the shares of the heirs to whom no advances had been made. The result was to give to each of the latter $1,389.63 more than the amounts received by the others through advance and distribution. Respondents urge that this result is supported by the terms of the will, which provides that the advances shall be deducted from the respective shares of those who received them, namely, six of the children; and that each of the other five children shall receive a "one-eleventh portion of all the residue plus a one-fifth share of all that portion of the residue which was increased by the advances deducted from the shares of the above named sons and daughters. * * *

[1, 2] While the provisions quoted, standing alone, might sustain this claim, and it is the rule that a clear and distinct devise or bequest cannot be affected by any reasons assigned therefor, or any other words not equally clear and distinct, or argument from other parts of the will (Civ. Code, § 1322), nevertheless a will is to be construed according to the intention of the testator (Civ. Code, § 1317; Estate of Phelps, 179 Cal. 703, 178 P. 846), it being the duty of the court to discover, if practicable, the real intent expressed in the will (Upham v. Plankinton, 152 Wis. 275, 140 N. W. 5, 48 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1004, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 376); and this should prevail, though it would require some departure from the literal construction of its provisions (Morton v. Barrett, 22 Me. 257, 39 Am. Dec. 575).

The intention of the testator in the present case was clearly shown by the declaration which follows the portion of the will last quoted, namely: "It being my intention to give our children who have received no advances a sum which will make all share and share alike when taking into consideration the advances heretofore made; it is my wish, and I so will, that in the event of the death of any of the above named children without issue that his or her share shall be divided equally among the survivors." If the preceding portions of the will can be said to be in conflict with this, the latter clause must prevail (Civ. Code, § 1321), as it was manifestly the testator's intention to place his children upon an equality with respect to the residue of his estate, taking into consideration the advances already made.

[3] To accomplish this result it will be necessary to follow section 1395 of the Civil Code, which has been held to apply as well to cases of testacy as to partial intestacy (Estate of Hayne, 165 Cal. 568, 133 P. 277, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 926), and which reads as follows: "Any estate, real or personal, given by the decedent in his lifetime as an advancement to any child, or other heir, is a part of the estate of the decedent for the purposes of division and distribution thereof among his heirs, and must be taken by such child, or other heir, toward his share of the estate of the decedent." So applied, the residue for the purpose of distribution would equal the amount of the estate remaining in the hands of the executor, namely, $28,031.14, plus the advances, a total of $35,431.11, the share of each child therein being the sum of $3,221.01. Deducting from their shares the sums advanced to them, the amounts the respective appellants are entitled to receive upon distribution are as follows: Frank Borba, $221.01; Joseph Borba, $2,221.01; Dominicus Borba, $2,221.01; John Borba $2,221.01; subject to the lien of an attachment levied by George W. Lyle, as sheriff of the county of Santa Clara, State of California, attaching officer in the action filed in the superior court of said county, entitled Art Ryan, Plaintiff, v. Jack D. Barbe, Defendant, number 38414; Rodgers Borba $2,571.01, and Annie Borba Ryan $2,471.01."

The order and decree is reversed, with directions to enter a decree in accordance with the views herein expressed.

Statute enlarging jurisdiction and limiting right of appeal held inapplicable to case tried before ascertainment of applicability or assumption of enlarged jurisdiction (Code Civ. Proc. § 112, as amended by St. 1929, p. 834, and § 982a as added by St. 1929, p. 833).

Code Civ. Proc. § 112, as amended by St. 1929, p. 834, enlarges jurisdiction of justices' courts in townships with population of 30,000 or more, and section 982a, as added by St. 1929, p. 833, requires appeals to be taken, heard, and determined as provided for municipal courts. Township in question had required population, but at date of trial there had been no finding to that effect, and court had not assumed to exercise the enlarged jurisdiction. Defendant sought to appeal for trial de novo as previously authorized.

Original mandamus proceeding by Hastain & Purman, Inc., against the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Los Angeles.

Writ granted.

Frank L. Simons, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Everett W. Mattoon, Co. Counsel, J. H. O'Connor, Asst. Co. Counsel, and S. V. O. Prichard, Deputy Co. Counsel, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J.

The superior court of Los Angeles county having declined to try and decide de novo an action appealed from the justice's court of Montebello township, and having dismissed the appeal, mandamus is sought to compel a vacation of the order of dismissal and a retrial of the issues.

By acts of the last Legislature section 112 of the Code of Civil Procedure was amended to confer upon justices' courts in townships having a population of 30,000 or more original jurisdiction in cases at law in which the demands, exclusive of interest, or the value of the property in controversy, should amount to $1,000 or less (Stats. 1929, c. 473, p. 834); and a new section numbered 982a was added, requiring that appeals from such courts be taken, heard, and determined, as provided by chapter 4, title 13, part 2 (section 983 et seq.) relating to appeals from municipal courts (Stats. 1929, ch. 471, p. 833). The amending acts became effective August 14, 1929. The petitioner herein was made a party defendant in an action for $288 filed in the justice's court of Montebello township on May 16, 1929, wherein judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiffs on August 30, 1929. On December 30, 1929, petitioner appealed to the superior court of Los Angeles county by the method formerly applicable to all justices' courts permitting of trials de novo. When called for trial upon appeal the plaintiffs moved to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that said township had been classed as one possessed of the enlarged jurisdiction, and that the superior court had lost jurisdiction of appeals therefrom, except upon a judgment roll and bill of exceptions or certified transcript.

By a proceeding entitled Los Angeles County v. Justice's Court of Beverly Hills, 208 Cal. 429, 281 P. 611, 612, the Supreme Court on October 24, 1929, directed the issuance of a writ of mandate commanding the justices' courts of several townships, including Montebello, to accept and exercise the jurisdiction prescribed for such courts in townships having a population of 30,000 or more. There had previously been no announcement by county or federal census as to its population, nor had its justice's court exercised jurisdiction of demands in excess of $300. In said decision it was said, in part: "The jurisdiction of the respondent courts depends upon the fact of there being the specified number of inhabitants within their respective territorial boundaries, and not upon any report or proclamation of the fact. * * * That being true, it would seem to follow that, when it is found by any proper mode of ascertainment that the various political subdivisions in which the respondent courts are located have the required population, the respondent courts must entertain, consider, and act in all those matters and causes falling within the jurisdiction prescribed by the recent law. * * * No objection was made to the report of the referee, and all the parties to this proceeding joined in a written stipulation that the report be affirmed as presented. That was done, and the court now finds, as a fact and in accord with the report of the referee, that each of the following townships of the county of Los Angeles, state of California, has a population of 30,000 inhabitants or more, viz.: Beverly Hills township, Glendale township, Inglewood township, Montebello township. * * * Therefore let a peremptory writ of mandate issue, directed to and commanding the respondents' justice's court of * * * Montebello township * * * to forthwith accept and exercise the jurisdiction prescribed by section 112 of the Code of Civil Procedure * * * for justices' courts * * * having a population of 30,000 or more."

It is stipulated in the instant proceeding that on and after August 15, 1929, said township had a population of more than 30,000, but it is manifest that, notwithstanding the amendments to the Code, there had been no finding by a proper mode of ascertainment that Montebello township had the required population to invest its justice's court with the enlarged jurisdiction; and said court had not at any time during the pendency, trial, or appeal of petitioner's case assumed or been authorized to exercise a jurisdiction other than that conferred by preexisting laws. It cannot in the absence of express legislative intent be said that the amendments of 1929 may be given by construction a retroactive effect which deprives parties of their rights of appeal. This rule was recognized in Harris v. Moore (Cal. App.) 283 P. 76, 77, as applied to appeals from the superior court after judgment in and appeal from the municipal court. Quoting from various authorities upon the subject, it was there held: "Retrospective legislation, except when designed to cure formal defects, or otherwise operate remedially, is commonly objectionable in principle, and apt to result in injustice; and it is a sound rule of construction which refuses lightly to imply an intent to enact it." Cooley, Const. Lim., p. 62. "It is in view of consequences such as these that all writers upon the construction of law concur in the opinion that, whether constitutional or statutory, it should be construed to operate prospectively only, unless such construction is absolutely precluded by the language used." Cassard v. Tracy, 52 La. Ann. 835, 27 So. 368, 370, 49 L. R. A. 272.

The writ is granted.

R. L. THOMPSON, J.

This is an appeal from a judgment rendered against each of the plaintiffs in the foregoing six cases which were consolidated for trial. Each of the actions was based upon the claims of materialmen against a surety bond which was given to pledge the faithful performance of a subcontractor for the construction of specific parts of a building. The court held that the bond was not liable for the labor performed or the materials furnished. The judgment depends upon a construction of the bond.

The Breakers Hotel Company, a corporation, awarded a contract to construct a hotel of the same name at Long Beach to William G. Reed at a cost of about $850,000. The court found that Reed agreed to furnish and pay for all necessary labor and materials to complete the building according to the contract. Mr. Reed, as principal, and the Metropolitan Casualty Insurance Company, as surety, executed and delivered to the hotel company a bond pursuant to section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure for the faithful performance of the contract. This bond was duly recorded. It guaranteed "the payment in full of the claims of all persons performing labor upon or furnishing materials to be used in the work" of constructing the hotel building. By the terms of this bond its provisions were to "inure to the benefit of any and all persons who should perform labor upon or furnish materials for the work" performed under the contract.

William G. Reed, the general contractor, made a subcontract with Jensen Electrical Company for the furnishing of materials and the performance of certain portions of the structure. Each plaintiff in this group of consolidated cases furnished the subcontractor, Jensen Electrical Company, with materials of substantial value which were used in the construction of the building. For the faithful performance of this subcontract an independent common-law bond was executed and delivered to Reed, the general contractor, with Jensen Electrical Company as principal and United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company as surety. This was the only bond executed by the last-mentioned surety on account of the structure. It provides, in part: "Whereby the said party of the second part (the subcontractor) undertakes to furnish all necessary labor and material and to perform and complete for the said party of the first part * * * (the work contracted for) we, Jensen Electrical Co., as Principals, and the United States Fidelity and Guaranty Company, * * * as Surety, are held and firmly bound unto said William G. Reed. * * *. The condition of this obligation is such that if said contract is made, and if the said contractor shall well and faithfully keep and perform all of the covenants and agreements of said contract, by them to be kept and performed, and shall turn over and deliver to said General Contractor, said improvement according to said contract, and shall save and hold harmless the said general contractor from any and all loss or damage arising out of the failure of said contractor to fulfill said contract, then the above obligation to be void; otherwise to remain in full force and effect."

The trial court rendered judgment in favor of the defendant in these consolidated cases. From this judgment the several plaintiffs have appealed.

[1] A bond which is given for the faithful performance of a contract, to which it refers, binds the surety for labor performed and materials furnished thereunder as completely as though the surety were a party to the contract. Callan v. Empire State Surety Co., 20 Cal. App. 483, 129 P. 978, 981; Fuller & Co. v. Alturas School Dist., 28 Cal. App. 609, 153 P. 743; Fickling v. Jackman, 203 Cal. 657, 662, 265 P. 810; Ryan v. Shannahan (Cal. Sup.) 285 P. 1045, 1047. In the case last cited it is said: "It is also elementary that a bond given to guarantee the execution of a contract according to its terms becomes a part of such contract, and to that contract the sureties become parties the same as though they had actually made and executed the contract itself. Therefore, in interpreting the language of the undertaking for the purpose of gathering its scope or the measure of the liability of the sureties, we must do so by treating or viewing the contract and the undertaking as a whole or as constituting an indivisible contract."

[2] A bond which undertakes to guarantee the faithful performance of a subcontract to furnish all necessary labor and materials for a specified portion of a structure implies a promise to pay for such labor and materials so furnished. It is unreasonable to hold the obligation is fulfilled by the mere supplying of the labor and materials. Wheeler, Osgood & Co. v. Everett Land Co., 14 Wash. 630, 45 P. 316; Mayes v. Lane, 116 Ky. 566, 76 S. W. 399; Crowley v. U. S. Fidelity & Guar. Co., 29 Wash. 268, 69 P. 784, 786. In the case last cited it is said: "The true meaning and intent of the provision requiring the contractor to furnish materials was certainly that he should pay for them, and not that he should simply supply them, and leave respondent to pay for them. This is the only reasonable deduction from such an agreement."

[3] A common-law undertaking which is furnished to a general contractor for the faithful performance of an agreement with a subcontractor for the supplying of labor and materials for a structure is not a pledge for the sole benefit of the general contractor, but inures to the benefit of any person who performs labor or furnishes materials which are used in the structure pursuant to the provisions of the subcontract. Sunset Lumber Co. v. Smith, 91 Cal. App. 746, 267 P. 738; Fuller & Co. v. Alturas School Dist., 28 Cal. App. 609, 153 P. 743.

[4, 5] The obligation of the respondent in the present cases to guarantee payment for labor performed and materials furnished under the subcontract seems fixed and certain. The fact that these claimants may have been entitled to recover compensation from the original general surety, Metropolitan Casualty Insurance Company, does not release the respondent from the clear obligations of its contract. In the event of securing judgments against the original general surety by the claimants in this action, it would then be entitled to be subrogated to all the rights of these plaintiffs for the purpose of reimbursement, which would include the right to resort to respondent's bond to satisfy their claims. Sections 2848, 2849, 2854, Civ. Code; Adamson v. Paonessa, 180 Cal. 157, 179 P. 880.

SCHUBERT v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY.

Civ. 7586.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California.

Nov. 18, 1930.

Divorce ⚭262.

Petitioner in contempt for failure to comply with decree could not compel hearing of motion for modification of interlocutory decree of divorce.

Petition for writ of mandamus by Frank W. Schubert against the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the County of Los Angeles.

Writ denied.

Robert J. Sullivan, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Everett W. Mattoon, Co. Counsel, and S. V. O. Prichard, Deputy Co. Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, Acting P. J.

A motion having been presented by the petitioner herein to the superior court for modification of an interlocutory decree of divorce in which he was named as defendant, he was denied permission to examine the plaintiff or to introduce any evidence, upon the ground that he had previously been adjudged in contempt of court for a failure to comply with the terms of said decree. The petitioner applies to this court for a writ of mandamus requiring the hearing and determination of such motion.

The decree provided for certain regular monthly payments of money by petitioner for the maintenance and support of a minor child of the parties, which provision it was found by the court he had violated for a period of about four months. The order in this respect, dated February 25, 1930, recited that "the court finds the defendant guilty of contempt for failure to pay order, having the ability so to do." Upon interposing his motion for modification of the decree, the plaintiff's counsel objected to the introduction of evidence upon the ground that the defendant was in contempt of court, and that the court was without jurisdiction of the matter, which objection was sustained. The instant proceeding is predicated upon Archer v. Superior Court, 81 Cal. App. 742, 254 P. 939, 940, principally, it is said, because the cases are not dissimilar. But an important distinction is at once apparent from the fact that Archer's motion for modification of an interlocutory decree was filed before an order to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt had been heard. Both proceedings were placed upon the calendar, but were held in abeyance, and, for no other reason than that expressed, the trial court ruled: "Until he (defendant) does show some evidence of good faith, I will not listen to his motions." Thereafter a substantial payment was made, the petitioner was discharged in the contempt proceedings, and the court still refused to entertain his motion. The petitioner herein ignored the provisions of the decree, was ordered to show cause why he should not comply therewith, upon a hearing was adjudged to have willfully violated the same, and was held in contempt of court. Following further derelictions, he has again been cited to show cause, yet he prays the equitable indulgence of the court which he has persistently defied. Reviewing the history of such summary powers of trial courts, a thorough consideration was afforded the rule upon refusal to strike a complaint from the files, in O'Neill v. Thomas Day Co., 152 Cal. 357, 92 P. 856, 859, 14 Ann. Cas. 970. It was there observed that section 1991 of the Code of Civil Procedure provided for drastic action in proper cases, but that it was predicated upon the party being adjudged guilty of contempt. Further, it was said: "To such a judgment for a contempt, committed out of the immediate presence of the court, a citation and showing is necessary. The court, having found the contempt, must punish the plaintiff for it, and in a proper case that punishment may take the form of a rule striking out his complaint. A certain discretion is vested in the court in this regard, but it is not a discretion which would permit the court in one case and under a given state of facts to strike out the complaint, and in another case and under an identical state of facts to refuse to strike it out. If the plaintiff upon being adjudged guilty of contempt should express his willingness to obey further orders of the court, and to answer the questions propounded to him, clearly whatever other punishment might be awarded against him for his contempt that of striking out his complaint would be altogether too severe. But, upon the other hand, if the plaintiff remain obdurate and contumacious, it would not only be the right, but as well the duty, of the court, to refuse to proceed with his litigation further, and to evidence its refusal by ordering the pleading stricken from the files."

Likewise, in Weeks v. Superior Court, 187 Cal. 620, 203 P. 93, 94, upon numerous authorities of this and other jurisdictions, including O'Neill v. Superior Court, supra, it was said: "No party to an action can, with right or reason, ask the aid and assistance of a court in hearing his demands while he stands in an attitude of contempt to its legal orders and processes. * * * 'No rule of law seems more widely prevalent or better established than that a court whose authority has been put to naught will extend no favors or privileges to the party in contempt until he has acknowledged its authority by purging the offense.'"

Petitioner, having failed to bring himself within the foregoing rules, is not entitled to the writ of mandamus herein prayed.

The writ is denied.

Dec. 3, 1930.

Criminal law ☞ 1130(5).

Defendants' liberty being at stake, court examined all contentions, notwithstanding violation of rule requiring brief to present points separately (Rule 8 of Rules of Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal).

Appeals from the Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. W. Fulkerth, Judge.

Nathan Yaroslowsky, Theodore Rosner, and Morris Itzkowitz were convicted of possessing stills, and they appeal.

C. B. Conlin, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Frank Richards, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

IRA F. THOMPSON, J.

The defendants Theodore Rosner and Morris Itzkowitz, together with William F. Crane and Carl Williams, were charged by information with the possession of two stills. The defendant Yaroslowsky, by a separate information, was charged with the possession of a still. The information was dismissed as to the defendant Carl Williams. The remaining defendants were found guilty of the offenses charged. William F. Crane was granted a new trial. The other three prosecute this appeal from the judgment pronounced upon the verdict and also from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

Being a criminal case and the liberty of the appellants being at stake, we have been at pains to examine all of their contentions, but have found them to be without merit. What we have done in this regard has been in spite of a violation of rule VIII of the rules of the Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal, which requires the brief to "present each point separately, under an appropriate heading, showing the nature of the question to be presented," and further says that "for the failure of the appellant" in this regard the court may of its own motion "dismiss the appeal." If counsel would only take into consideration the difficulties with which we are confronted in an endeavor to determine from the record and the briefs exactly the occurrences in the trial court, and the precise points upon which they rely, we are sure it would not be necessary to call to their attention a rule adopted for the purpose of preventing a conglomeration of recitals which we are expected to dissect for the purpose of attempting to arrive at their contentions. A dismissal of the appeal would be a proper proceeding in this and all other like violations of the rule. However, as we have indicated, so far as we can discover, there is no merit in the appeal.

Judgment and order affirmed.

Rehearing Granted Dec. 19, 1930.

1. Negligence $\S$ 56(1).

"Proximate cause" is efficient cause and moving influence.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Proximate Cause," see Words and Phrases.]

2. Appeal and error $\S$ 209(1).

Trial court's finding, not attacked as not supported by evidence, is binding on appellate court.

3. Automobiles $\S$ 201(2).

Excessive and unlawful speed of both automobiles approaching street intersection held proximate cause of injuries to pedestrian on sidewalk who was struck by one automobile when both swerved to avoid collision.

Accident in question resulting in injuries to plaintiff while on sidewalk before crossing street occurred at intersection of street running north and south with one running east and west. When drivers of respective automobiles discovered that a collision was imminent, the one approaching from the left or from the west swerved to his left and ran upon sidewalk and there struck pedestrian, resulting in injuries complained of, while the one approaching from the right or from the south swerved to the right, thereby avoiding collision. Testimony showed that there was sufficient space between northerly curb on east and west street and northerly street car rail on that street to allow automobile approaching from the left to pass without going upon sidewalk.

4. Appeal and error $\S$ 656(3).

Where conclusions of trial court from findings in action for personal injuries arising out of automobile accident were erroneous, appellate court could amend conclusions and enter proper judgment (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 956a).

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Louis H. Ward, Judge.

Action by James J. Beatty against Albert McGuirk and others. Judgment against defendant named and in favor of defendants Edward M. Wiegmann and the Lewald Coal Company, and plaintiff appeals.

Judgment modified, and, as modified, affirmed.

Hubbard & Hubbard, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Cooley, Crowley & Gallagher and Cooley & Crowley, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

BURROUGHS, Justice pro tem.

A judgment in the sum of $2,336, together with costs, was entered in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant Albert McGuirk. A judgment was entered in favor of the defendants Edward M. Wiegmann and Lewald Coal Company, a corporation, and against the plaintiff, for the costs incurred in this action by the two last-named defendants. From the judgment in favor of the latter defendants, the plaintiff appeals. The cause of action arose out of an automobile accident which occurred at the northeast corner of the intersection of O'Farrell and Larkin streets in the city and county of San Francisco. It is the contention of the appellant that, under the facts found, amplified by an examination of all the evidence, the court erred in the conclusion that the proximate cause of the injuries received by plaintiff was the sole negligence of the defendant McGuirk and in absolving the defendants Wiegman and Lewald Coal Company, a corporation, from all blame as proximately contributing to said injuries.

The court found that O'Farrell and Larkin streets in San Francisco are public thoroughfares and intersect at right angles; that

$\S$ For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

*Rehearing granted 298 P. 510.

O'Farrell street runs easterly and westerly and Larkin street runs northerly and southerly; that each of said streets from curb to curb at said intersection are 44 feet and 9 inches wide; that a single track street car line runs along O'Farrell street through said intersection; that running through said intersection on Larkin street is a double track street car line; that the distance from the northerly rail of said O'Farrell street track to the northerly curb of O'Farrell street is 19 feet and 8 inches; that at the time of the accident plaintiff was walking southerly on the sidewalk on the easterly side of Larkin street towards the intersection of Larkin and O'Farrell streets; that about the time plaintiff arrived at the northeasterly corner of Larkin and O'Farrell streets, and before he had stepped from the sidewalk, defendant McGuirk drove a Dodge automobile in an easterly direction along O'Farrell street, through the intersection above referred to; that at said time and place McGuirk drove said automobile at an excessive, dangerous, and unlawful rate of speed, to wit, at a speed of approximately 30 miles an hour; that a very short time after Wiegmann drove a certain Ford automobile in a northerly direction along Larkin street and into said intersection at a careless, dangerous, and unlawful rate of speed, to wit, at a speed of approximately 25 miles an hour; that defendant Wiegmann did not see the automobile driven by defendant McGuirk until after both of said automobiles had entered into said intersection and until a passenger in said Wiegmann's car shouted to him; that, for the purpose of avoiding a collision between said automobiles, defendant McGuirk swerved to his left from about the center of said intersection over to the northeasterly corner of said intersection and partly on to the sidewalk; that the left front wheel of said automobile struck plaintiff's right foot, inflicting injuries upon the person of plaintiff; that, when defendant Wiegmann saw the automobile of defendant McGuirk as aforesaid, Wiegmann swerved his automobile in said intersection to the right; this was done for the purpose of avoiding a collision with defendant McGuirk's automobile; that both of said automobiles for a space ran in parallel courses in a northeasterly direction, with their running boards not more than 12 inches apart; in swerving to the right, defendant Wiegmann drove his Ford in such a manner that the left front wheel of his said car crossed and ran to the north of the northernmost rail of the street car track on O'Farrell street; defendant Wiegmann succeeded in turning to his right and going easterly on O'Farrell street without bringing his automobile into collision with that of the defendant McGuirk, or with the plaintiff's body; that there was sufficient space between the left side of said Wiegmann's automobile and the northerly curb line of O'Farrell street for defendant McGuirk to have driven down

O'Farrell street in an easterly direction, but on the wrong side of O'Farrell street, without running upon the sidewalk and injuring plaintiff as aforesaid; that said accident happened very suddenly; that the space between the left side of said Ford and the northerly curb of O'Farrell street was not more than a few feet, that is, 5 or 6 feet, wider than the width of McGuirk's automobile; that each automobile is approximately 5 feet wide. The court further found that Wiegmann was employed by the Lewald Coal Company, a corporation, and at the time of the accident was acting within the scope of his employment; that plaintiff's damage by reason of said accident is the sum of $2,336; that at the time of the accident Wiegmann intended to proceed directly across O'Farrell street in a northerly direction and defendant McGuirk intended to proceed directly across Larkin street in an easterly direction; that each of the defendants changed the course of his automobile solely for the purpose of avoiding a collision with each other; that the plaintiff exercised reasonable care for his own safety and was not guilty of contributory negligence. From the said findings, the court concluded that the defendant McGuirk was guilty of negligence in driving his automobile at an excessive, unlawful, and dangerous rate of speed and upon the sidewalk and into collision with plaintiff; that defendant Wiegmann was also guilty of negligence in driving his automobile at an excessive, dangerous, and unlawful rate of speed; that defendant McGuirk had the right of way through the intersection of O'Farrell street because of the fact that he entered the intersection before defendant Wiegmann; that, because of the employment of Wiegmann by the Lewald Coal Company and because Wiegmann was in the performance of his duty, his negligence was imputable to the said coal company; that the proximate cause of the injuries to plaintiff was the negligence of defendant Albert McGuirk as set forth in the findings; that the negligence of the other defendants did not contribute as a proximate cause of the plaintiff's injuries, because defendant McGuirk could have driven between the Ford automobile operated by Wiegmann and the northerly curb of O'Farrell street without running upon the sidewalk and without injuring plaintiff. The court then ordered judgment for plaintiff and against McGuirk, and denied relief against the other defendants, and gave the latter judgment for their costs.

[1-3] Appellant claims that under the findings the court should have concluded that all three of the defendants should be held responsible as the proximate cause of plaintiff's injuries; that the mere fact that there was a space between the curb line on O'Farrell street and the car driven by Wiegmann through which McGuirk might have driven his car without running on the sidewalk does not constitute an intervening cause that would relieve Wiegmann and the Lewald Coal Company from their negligence. In Hill v. Jacquemart, 55 Cal. App. 498, 203 P. 1021, 1022, it is held that "the proximate cause of an injury is the efficient cause; * * * the moving influence." In Merrill v. Los Angeles Gas & Elec. Co., 158 Cal. 499, 111 P. 534, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 559, 139 Am. St. Rep. 134, the proximate cause of an injury is epitomized in the syllabus as follows: "An independent wrongful act, to constitute the proximate cause of an injury, by displacing the original primary cause, must be so disconnected in time and nature as to make it plain that the damage occasioned was in no way a natural or probable consequence of the original wrongful act or omission." What was the efficient cause, the moving influence in the series of events which led to plaintiff's injuries? Under the court's findings there can be but one answer to this question—the excessive, dangerous, and unlawful rate of speed at which both McGuirk and Wiegmann were driving their cars and which caused them, for the purpose of avoiding a collision with each other, to swerve their cars, Wiegmann's to the right so that he turned into O'Farrell street, crossed the center line thereof and then brought his car to the right side and stopped; the defendant McGuirk drove his car in a northeasterly direction to the northeast corner of Larkin and O'Farrell streets, where his car went on the sidewalk and injured the plaintiff. We think the foregoing shows without further elaboration that the primary cause of the accident was the negligence of both McGuirk and Wiegmann. Having fixed the conduct of both Wiegmann and McGuirk as the original primary cause of the injury, was there any independent wrongful act that displaced the original primary act as the proximate cause of the injury? It is claimed by the respondent that the finding of the court that "there was sufficient space between the left side of said Ford automobile and the northerly line of O'Farrell street for McGuirk to drive on down O'Farrell street in an easterly direction and on the wrong side of O'Farrell street without running upon the sidewalk and injuring plaintiff as aforesaid" establishes that Wiegmann was not responsible for the injury to plaintiff and must be so accepted by this court. The trial court having made the finding, and it not being attacked as not supported by the evidence, it is binding as a fact, but as to whether it is a new and independent act that relieves Wiegmann and the Lewald Coal Company from its original responsibility to plaintiff must be determined by this court.

After examining the authorities, we are satisfied that, notwithstanding the finding of the court that the defendant McGuirk could have driven between the Ford car and the northerly curb of O'Farrell street without running on the sidewalk and without injuring plaintiff, Wiegmann, and hence his employer, the Lewald Coal Company, are responsible with McGuirk to the plaintiff for the latter's injury, and that there was no intervening cause that relieved either of responsibility. We believe the following decisions are in point and sustain the above view.

In Keiper v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co., 36 Cal. App. 362, 172 P. 180, 182, defendant Elkus left his car unattended, parked across the street railway track. While in that position it was struck by a street car and catapulted in a diagonal direction from 50 to 75 feet, striking and injuring plaintiff, who was on the sidewalk. The street car was traveling at a good rate of speed, but under such circumstances that the servant of the street car company should have seen the automobile. Judgment was for plaintiff against defendant Elkus, who is the appellant; the claim being made that neither the complaint nor the proofs disclosed that the appellant's negligence was the proximate cause of the accident and injury complained of. Defendant Elkus admitted negligence, but claimed that the negligent act of the operator of the street car was an active intervening cause of the accident and that negligence on his part ceased the instant that the street car negligently struck his automobile.

The court said: "If it was negligence to leave and allow the automobile to remain standing on the street car tracks in the first instance, upon what logical hypothesis may it be said that that negligence did not continue until the accident and injury which the collision of the car with the automobile produced? * * * It is, of course, obviously true, as counsel declare, that but for the negligence of the defendant electric company the accident and its disastrous result would not have happened. But it is equally obvious that the damage suffered by the plaintiff would not have been produced but for the negligence of the appellant. Thus it is clear that the case as presented is essentially and peculiarly one where the injury complained of was produced by the concurrence of two separate, distinct and independent acts of negligence on the part of two separate and different persons. In other words, it is a case where the injury could not and would not have been produced by the act only of one of the two tort-feasors. * * * Hence it cannot logically be said that the negligence of the appellant was not 'an active, continuous, contributing cause, and therefore at least a necessary element of the proximate cause of the injury.' Spear v. United Railroads, 16 Cal. App. 659, 117 P. 956. In such a case both parties through whose direct joint agency the injury has been sustained are joint tort-feasors and may be sued either jointly or separately."

In Springer v. Pacific Fruit Exchange, 92 Cal. App. 732, 268 P. 951, 954, defendant John Franzioa who had previously parked his Peerless automobile off the paved portion of the highway and headed west, was attempting to enter the paved road from the north side and continue westerly. A Buick car driven west by Ritchie, employee of Pacific Fruit Exchange, was approaching from the east on the north half of the 18-foot pavement. At the time the Peerless and Buick came together, both machines were moving, the Peerless slowly, the Buick very fast. The Peerless' left front wheel and fender came in contact with the right front wheel and fender of the Buick. The Buick, after colliding with the Peerless, went in a southwesterly direction across the highway 30 or 40 feet, and collided with a stage parked entirely off the pavement, then veered back to the middle of the pavement and at a distance of 30 or 40 feet further on veered south and hit a Franklin car traveling easterly on the south half of the pavement. The Franklin was overturned, and plaintiff riding in the Franklin was injured. Plaintiff dismissed the action against the Pacific Fruit Exchange, owners of the Buick car, and proceeded against Franzioa, owner of the Peerless, and a jury returned a unanimous verdict in favor of Franzioa. Plaintiff was granted a new trial. The appeal was from that order. The appellate court affirmed the order granting a new trial on the ground that "there is substantial evidence in the record to support a finding that plaintiff was injured by the concurrent negligence of both appellant and Ritchie." The court says: "In order that the independent negligence of Ritchie might constitute the sole proximate cause of the injury to plaintiff, and displace the original negligence of appellant, it must appear from the evidence that Ritchie's negligence was so disconnected in time and nature as to make it plain that the damage occasioned was in no way the natural or probable consequence of the original negligence of appellant. Therefore, how far the Buick car might go after it collided with the Peerless before the driver would be chargeable as an independent actor would also be a question of fact."

In commenting on the facts the court says: "If Ritchie had been traveling at a lawful rate of speed and had his car under control, he could have avoided the collision with the appellant. On the other hand, if appellant, when he approached the paved portion of the highway, had looked in the direction from which the traffic was coming, he would have seen the approaching Buick and could have waited until it passed him, and thus have avoided the collision."

"The court or jury would therefore be warranted in saying that appellant and Ritchie were both negligent and that their concurrent negligence caused the collision between their two cars. This being true, the appellant would be a participant in whatever injury might reasonably follow from his negligent acts. The Peerless deflected the Buick from its course, and as the Buick veered from one side of the road to the other it finally came in contact with the Franklin and caused the injury to plaintiff. * * * If plaintiff was injured by the concurrent negligence of both appellant and Ritchie then each is and both are the proximate cause of her injuries, and she may recover from either or both at her election."

In Hansen v. Bedell Co., 126 Or. 155, 268 P. 1020, where an automobile approaching an intersection was so negligently driven as to cause another automobile approaching from his right to swerve and thereby injure a pedestrian who was on the sidewalk, it was held that the first driver was not relieved of liability because the second driver may not have used due care and caution to avoid striking the pedestrian. Other authorities to the same effect are 19 Cal. Jur. 573; Hansen v. Market St. R. R. Co., 64 Cal. App. 426, 221 P. 955; Spear v. United R. R., supra; Merrill v. Los Angeles Gas & Elec. Co., supra; King v. San Diego Electric Ry. Co., 176 Cal. 266, 168 P. 131; Lotesto v. Baker & Henikoff, 246 Ill. App. 425; Schilling v. Hayes, 55 Cal. App. 1, 202 P. 680; Hill v. Jacquemart, supra.

Under the head of proximate cause, the defendants have cited a large number of authorities as supporting their position that the question of proximate cause in the instant case rested solely with the trial court. They cite Bancroft-Whitney Co. v. McHugh, 166 Cal. 140, 134 P. 1157; Stohlman v. Martin, 28 Cal. App. 654, 152 P. 319; Metzler v. Los Angeles R. R. Corp., 99 Cal. App. 656, 279 P. 190; Off v. Crump, 40 Cal. App. 173, 180 P. 360; Newman v. E. E. Overholtzer Sons' Co., 182 Cal. 778, 190 P. 175; Milwaukee & St. Paul R. R. Co. v. Kellogg, 94 U. S. 469, 25 L. Ed. 256, also many other cases to the same effect.

We are of the opinion that the cited cases do not apply to the instant case. Here the trial court has found facts as above stated that place the original primary cause of the accident on all three defendants; this being true, was there any independent intervening cause that relieved the defendants or either of them from responsibility? In the reply brief of respondents it is admitted that there was no "intervening cause." They also admit that the doctrine of "last clear chance" has no application. We are satisfied that the proximate cause of the injury received by the plaintiff was the concurrent negligence of all three defendants, and the court was in error in releasing the defendants Wiegmann and the Lewald Coal Company from liability.

[4] It is well settled in cases of this class that this court may amend the conclusions of law and enter a proper judgment. 2 Cal. Jur., § 587, p. 990; section 956a, Code Civ. Proc. It is therefore ordered that the court's conclusion of law No. 6 be amended to read as follows: "The proximate cause of the injuries complained of by the plaintiff was the concurrent negligence of the defendants, Albert McGuirk, Edward M. Wiegmann, and Lewald Coal Company, a corporation, as in these findings and conclusions set forth. Plaintiff is entitled to judgment against said Albert McGuirk, Edward M. Wiegmann, and Lewald Coal Company, a corporation, in the sum of $2,336 and for plaintiff's costs."

The conclusion of law No. 7 is hereby amended to read as follows: "Let judgment be entered in accordance with these findings and conclusions."

The judgment herein is amended to read as follows:

"Judgment.

"The court having made and filed herein its findings of fact and conclusions of law, judgment is hereby rendered in favor of plaintiff, James J. Beatty, and against the defendants, Albert McGuirk, Edward M. Wiegmann, and Lewald Coal Company, a corporation, for the sum of $2,336 and for plaintiff's costs herein in the sum of $———."

As thus modified, the judgment is affirmed.

This is a petition for a writ of review by which it is sought to annul an award made by the Industrial Accident Commission to applicant Bessie Halpern. The facts of her injury and subsequent treatment are as follows:

On May 29, 1929, while applicant was employed as a nurse at the Los Angeles County Hospital, she fell on a cement floor while reaching upward to a shelf, resulting in injury to her low back and hip. She left her work on June 3 and became a patient at the Los Angeles County Hospital, where she remained until July 15. While in the hospital one of the medical staff was in attendance upon her, but during the last ten days while she was there she called in, with the permission of the regular attending physician, Dr. Arnov, the latter being a member of the visiting medical staff at the hospital. Dr. Arnov then took complete charge of her case, the other physician permitting him to order such medicines and treatment as he prescribed. Two days after applicant left the hospital she developed lockjaw and called Dr. Arnov to her home to attend her. He advised her to go to a sanitarium and suggested in this connection Loma Linda Sanitarium. She left in a few days for this sanitarium and remained there until the 16th of August. She paid her hospital bill at the Loma Linda Sanitarium and also paid Dr. Arnov a part of his fee, and it is reimbursement for these amounts and for compensation awarded her which forms the basis of petitioner's complaint.

Pursuant to her application to the Industrial Accident Commission, a hearing was had on February 6, 1930, in which she was adjudged to be entitled to her reasonable medical expenses which were to be fixed subsequently upon request and the filing of itemized bills; she was further awarded the sum of $20.83 a week commencing June 10 and to and including November 28, 1929. Thereafter defendants petitioned for a rehearing before the Industrial Accident Commission, which was granted, and which resulted in an affirmation of the award.

The petitioner here now contends, in effect, that the respondent commission failed to find upon the question of whether the applicant left the county hospital of her own accord or was discharged therefrom, and further that any finding to the effect that she did not leave voluntarily would be unsupported by the testimony. Hence it is said the commission was without jurisdiction to render its award.

[1] As to petitioner's first contention that the award cannot stand in the absence of a finding on the question of whether "the employer had refused or neglected to furnish proper medical treatment," the record discloses the fact that no point was made in its petition for rehearing before the commission of the failure to find upon this question, as is required by section 64 of the act (St. 1917, p. 873). Therefore the question may not be raised for the first time before this court. The following authorities comment upon this section as follows:

Great Western Power Co. of California v. Industrial Acc. Commission, 196 Cal. 593, 238 P. 662, 665: "Complaint is made by petitioner that no allowance was made by the commission in fixing the amount of the contribution to the dependents, for hospital dues, and certain small personal expenditures by the employee at the petitioner's commissary, which were deducted from the employee's wages in issuing his pay checks. The findings are silent on the subject, but the claim of the petitioner cannot be considered in this proceeding on the writ of review, for the reason that it was not made to the commission in the petition for rehearing filed by petitioner in the proceeding below. Workmen's Compensation Act, § 64(c)." (Italics ours.)

In Pacific Coast Casualty Co. v. Pillsbury, 171 Cal. 54, 151 P. 658, one of the grounds for petition for writ of review was that "in making the award the commission failed to credit the employer with the sum of $25 paid by him to the employee." The court there said: "It is sufficient to say that no such point was made in the application for rehearing filed by the petitioner with the Accident Commission; the result being that this objection must be held to have been finally waived. * * * The Workmen's Compensation Act requires that an application for rehearing before the commission 'shall set forth specifically and in full detail the grounds upon which the applicant considers said final order, decision, award,' etc., unjust or unlawful."

Petitioner's remaining point may be disposed of by a determination of whether there was any evidence in the record to support the findings. The evidence in some respects is in conflict and notably on the question of whether applicant left the county hospital of her own accord, or whether that hospital discharged her, but we find ample evidence to support the view that she did not leave "independently of any request or order from the officials of the hospital." The evidence is susceptible of the construction that she was discharged therefrom as cured

[2] Inasmuch as the evidence in the record supports both the findings and award, we are concluded from disturbing the award. Walker v. Industrial Accident Commission, 177 Cal. 738, 171 P. 954, L. R. BEETSON v. HOLLYWOOD ATHLETIC CLUB.

Civ. 5949.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 1, California.

Nov. 20, 1930.

1. Bailment ⇨14(1).

Plaintiff's delivery of automobile to club attendant for parking, there being charge for such service, constituted bailment for hire, imposing on club duty to exercise reasonable care to preserve car against loss or damage (Civ. Code, §§ 1851, 1852).

2. Bailment ⇨31(3).

Evidence held sufficient to establish liability against club for damages to automobile left for parking.

3. Bailment ⇨32.

One recovering bailed property unlawfully taken from bailee receives it in mitigation of damages, measure of damage being expense of procuring return with interest (Civ. Code, § 3336).

4. Bailment ⇨31(1).

Plaintiff suing for damage to automobile taken from parking place had burden to prove certain expenditures necessarily made and reasonableness thereof.

The expenditures in question were $8 for telegrams; $50 to sheriff of place where car was finally located; $326 to railroad for freight in transporting car back; and $45 for services of investigator.

5. Pleading $\hookrightarrow$ 126.

Answer in form of negative pregnant held not to raise damage issue, admitting damage alleged.

The complaint alleged damages in the sum of $254.19, and the defendant by denying that plaintiff's automobile was damaged in the sum of $254.19 admitted damage in any less sum, or $254.18. As the law disregards trifles, this was not sufficient to raise an issue.

6. Bailment $\hookrightarrow$ 32.

Plaintiff was entitled to recover rental value of car during time he was deprived of its use after it was taken from defendant's parking place.

7. Bailment $\hookrightarrow$ 32.

Expenditure for taxicabs held not to constitute item of damages for deprivation of use of automobile taken from defendant's parking place.

HOLLZER, Justice pro tem.

Defendant prosecutes this appeal from a judgment awarding plaintiff damages, claimed to have been sustained in connection with the disappearance of and damage to plaintiff's automobile while left with the defendant.

The evidence showed that on the night of March 1, 1925, the plaintiff, a member of the defendant club, drove his automobile into a parking place provided for that purpose and operated by the defendant, and delivered the car to an employee of the defendant, who was the attendant in charge. The keys for the car were left therein. At the time of delivering his car the plaintiff signed a slip required for that purpose by the defendant, and the same was retained by the attendant. For this parking service, defendant charged the plaintiff fifteen cents.

On returning about an hour later for his car, plaintiff learned that the same had disappeared and that the parking place had been left without any attendant.

The evidence further disclosed that it was the custom of the attendant, on leaving the parking place, to remove the keys from all of the automobiles and deposit the same in the defendant's office, where they would be obtained by the respective owners as they called for their cars. On the occasion in question, however, the keys which plaintiff had left in his car were not delivered by the attendant to the defendant's office.

Several years previously the defendant's board of directors had adopted a resolution reading: "That in accepting the parking of automobiles of members and guests, the club is not to be held responsible in case of loss through fire, theft or injury to the car or its contents, the club using due caution in the protection of automobiles left in its care." (Italics ours.)

The attendant who had been in charge of defendant's parking place at the time plaintiff's car was delivered there was not called as a witness. Likewise, the defendant offered no evidence tending to explain how the plaintiff's car was removed from its custody.

Some weeks after its disappearance, plaintiff, through the service of an investigator, learned that his car had been removed to Texas, and he thereupon had the same shipped back to him.

The lower court found that plaintiff's car had been stolen through defendant's negligence while the same was in its care; that the car had been damaged after it had been stolen and before it was returned to plaintiff in the sum of $254.19; that the latter had expended $440.36 in conducting his search for the automobile and on account of freight charges for the return of the same; and also that the plaintiff had sustained further damage in the sum of $350 through the loss of the use of said automobile. Accordingly, plaintiff was awarded judgment in the total sum of $1,044.55.

The grounds upon which the defendant seeks a reversal may be summarized under two points: The first is the contention that the evidence is insufficient to establish liability against defendant. Secondly, it is claimed that the court erred in computing the damages allowable to plaintiff.

[1] Upon the question of liability, while it may be said that no case arising out of facts substantially similar to those presented in the action at bar has been decided in California, we have no doubt that, under the law of this state, the delivery by plaintiff of his automobile to the defendant's attendant under the circumstances heretofore stated constituted a bailment of the same for hire, and thereby imposed upon the defendant the duty to exercise reasonable care to preserve the same against loss or damage. Civ. Code, §§ 1851 and 1852; 4 Cal. Jur., Bailments, § 2, p. 3, and § 13, p. 21, and cases there cited.

In a case arising out of facts strikingly similar to those presented here, the appellate division of the New York Supreme Court reached a similar conclusion.

The case referred to was that of Galowitz v. Magner, 208 App. Div. 6, 203 N. Y. S. 421, 422. There it appeared that the plaintiff drove his automobile into a parking station operated by the defendant, delivered the same to one of the defendant's attendants, paid 50 cents therefor and received a ticket from the attendant. Upon the reverse side of the ticket there was printed in fine print the following: "The person accepting this ticket assumes all risk of accident, and expressly agrees that the managements shall not be liable, under any circumstances for any injury to person, loss, or damage." When plaintiff returned several hours later for his car he discovered that the same was gone. The proof further showed that the parking space was enclosed with an eight-foot wooden fence, had one entrance and one exit, and that on the day in question there were three attendants looking after the cars.

In the course of his opinion, Mr. Justice Young, speaking for the court, said: "I think, however, it was a bailment for hire. It was, in my opinion, of the same nature as checking parcels, and the disclaimer of liability could only become effective, if brought to plaintiff's knowledge (citing cases).

"Neither the face of the ticket nor the disclaimer of liability printed on the back throws any light on the subject. Its presence on the ticket or stub is quite as consistent with a contract of bailment as with one for mere rental of parking space. It seems to me obvious that plaintiff had the right to believe, from the fact that defendant maintained an inclosed space for parking cars, with an entrance and exit and attendants, that he was paying the parking fee in consideration of care and watchfulness to prevent injury or loss. Otherwise he might almost as well have parked upon the public street and saved the fee. * * *

"The proof in this case is very meager, but is in my opinion sufficient to present a question of fact for the jury. Where a space is inclosed by an 8-foot board fence, for parking cars, with an entrance and an exit, a checking system, and three attendants to look after and take care of the cars as they came in and went out, the jury might infer that the theft of plaintiff's car could not have occurred had defendant and his employees properly performed their duty. Indeed, it seems to me that such inference is well-nigh irresistible, because some one must have taken out plaintiff's car without presenting a check or ticket therefor, and to permit this was clearly negligent."

While the judgment rendered in the case cited was set aside, it should be noted that the reversal was ordered upon the ground that the complaint failed to allege that plaintiff's car was lost through the defendant's negligence, and because the trial court instructed the jury that the burden rested upon the defendant to show that the theft did not occur through want of due care on his part.

Again in the case of Dalton v. Hamilton Hotel Operating Co., 242 N. Y. 481, 152 N. E. 268, 270, the court of appeals held that an agreement for gratuitous storage of a prospective tenant's baggage until she could be given possession of an apartment leased constituted a bailment, and that the failure of the hotel to return the trunks upon demand established a prima facie case of gross negligence on the part of the hotel operator. The court further held that proof that the trunks had been deposited in a room under constant watch of competent employees was not sufficient alone to rebut the presumption of gross negligence arising from the failure to deliver the trunks. In upholding plaintiff's right to recover, the court of appeals said in part:

"But if we assume that the trunks were placed in the proper depository under the watchfulness provided by the defendant, we do not think that this fact answers the presumption arising in favor of plaintiff on failure to deliver her trunks or satisfactorily explains their disappearance. Presumptively under this system the trunks should have been in defendant's possession and ready for delivery when called for, and it is the failure of what was to be expected that defendant is called on to explain. * * * So far as concerns the exemption clause on the checks, independent of any other answer, we do not think it is to be assumed that it was the intention of the parties that it should relieve the defendant from its own gross negligence."

The cases cited by appellant support the rule that a bailee is required to exercise reasonable care to protect the property deposited with him against loss or damage.

In Perera v. Panama-Pacific Int. Exp. Co., 179 Cal. 63, 175 P. 454, 456, and Webber v. Bank of Tracy, 66 Cal. App. 29, 225 P. 41, cited by appellant, the bailee was absolved from liability because the evidence in those cases furnished no sufficient basis for any inference of negligence on the part of the bailee.

In the Perera Case, however, the Supreme Court declared: "It is true, of course, that evidence of facts and circumstances from which want of ordinary care may reasonably be inferred is sufficient to support a conclusion of negligence, in which event the question of negligence is one for the jury."

[2] On the other hand, applying the decision rendered in Galowitz v. Magner, supra, it might well be inferred from the facts in the action at bar that the disappearance of plaintiff's car could not have occurred had the defendant's employees properly performed their duty. Indeed, the inference of negligence is well-nigh irresistible from the fact that, upon the occasion in question, the defendant's attendant left its parking place without taking the slightest precaution to protect plaintiff's car against theft. Likewise, it might well be added that had this attendant even taken the precaution of removing the keys from plaintiff's car and depositing the same in defendant's office in accordance with the practice which defendant admits its employees customarily followed when leaving the parking place unattended, it is highly improbable that plaintiff's car would have been taken.

[3] When we come to consider the amount of damages awarded, a more serious question is presented. In their opening brief appellant's counsel say: "Had the theft been due to the negligence of defendant, the loss would have amounted in such case to conversion, and the damages in such case would have been fixed by section 3336 of our Civil Code, reading as follows:

"The detriment caused by the wrongful conversion of personal property is presumed to be:

"1. The value of the property at the time of the conversion, with the interest from that time, or, where the action has been prosecuted with reasonable diligence, the highest market value of the property at any time between the conversion and the verdict, without interest at the option of the injured party; and

"2. A fair compensation for the time and money properly expended in pursuit of the property."

Where, however, one recovers his property which had been unlawfully taken from him, he is considered as having received it in mitigation of damages, and the measure of damage, in the absence of special damage, is the expense of procuring its return with interest. Blewett v. Miller, 131 Cal. 149, 151, 63 P. 157. Citing 1 Sutherland on Damages, 239; 3 Sutherland on Damages, 527; 1 Sedgwick on Damages, § 58.

"So where goods are lost by the negligence of the bailee, and the bailor, by the aid of detectives, legal proceedings, and the expenditure of money, recovers some of the property, and repairs such of it as is damaged, he may be allowed to prove, against the objection of the bailee, what expenses were thus incurred. In such a case the bailor was not bound to seek for his property. When the bailee failed, on demand, to deliver it, he became liable for the whole. What was done, therefore, to recover the property, so far as it was successful, was for the bailee's benefit, and he was entitled to credit for the property thus recovered, less the expense of recovering it." 3 Ruling Case Law, Bailments, § 80, citing Jones v. Morgan, 90 N. Y. 4, 43 Am. Rep. 131.

In the present case, the plaintiff was not only put to the expense of procuring the return of his car, but also was obliged to have the same repaired, and in addition was deprived of its use for sixty-five days.

[4] The only evidence as to the amount expended to procure the return of the car was that furnished by the testimony of one Gilmore, who was employed by plaintiff to investigate what had become of the car and to secure its return. This witness testified that he advanced on behalf of plaintiff the sum of $8 for telegrams; $50 to the sheriff at San Angelo, Texas, the place where the car was finally located, and also the sum of $326 to the Santa Fe Railway as freight for transporting the car back to Los Angeles, and in addition paid himself $45 for the services he had rendered conducting the investigation to locate the car.

On the other hand, there is nothing in the record to disclose why the sum of $50 was paid to the sheriff at San Angelo, or the necessity for expending $8 for telegrams, nor was it shown that the sum of $45 was a reasonable charge for the services performed by the witness.

Assuming that the last three mentioned items were recoverable as damages, nevertheless the burden rested upon the plaintiff to prove that such expenditures were necessarily made, and that the same were reasonable. In the absence of such proof, we must conclude that there was no basis for allowing the same in the present case.

[5] Upon the issue respecting the damage to plaintiff's automobile, the complaint alleged "that said automobile was damaged while out of the possession of the plaintiff, after such bailment and before found by the plaintiff, in the sum of Two Hundred Fifty-four and 19/100 Dollars ($254.19)." In its answer the defendant denied "that said automobile was damaged while out of the possession of the plaintiff, after such bailment or before found by plaintiff, in the sum of Two Hundred Fifty-four and 19/100 Dollars ($254.19). * * *

By thus answering in the form of a negative pregnant, defendant admitted that the damage to said automobile was any sum less than $254.19, to wit: $254.18. As the law disregards trifles, this was not sufficient to raise an issue. Janeway et al. v. Long Beach Co., 190 Cal. 150, 153, 211 P. 6.

[6, 7] With respect to the damage sustained by plaintiff because of being deprived of the use of said automobile, the trial court found that "plaintiff lost the use of said automobile for the period of two (2) months, to his damage in the sum of three hundred fifty dollars ($350.00)."

Plaintiff was entitled to recover the rental value of his car during the period he was deprived of its use. Taylor v. Bernheim, 58 Cal. App. 404, 410, 209 P. 55, 58; Nahhas v. Brown, 181 Cal. 55, 183 P. 442, 6 A. L. R. 476; Blodgett v. Rheinschild, 56 Cal. App. 728, 739, 206 P. 674.

The only evidence bearing upon this subject is to be found in the testimony of the plaintiff. According to his testimony, the car which he had delivered to the defendant was "a regular stock Buick sedan automobile, model 1924, which cost approximately $2,300." For a period of about a week immediately following the disappearance of his car, plaintiff hired taxicabs at a total expense of $50, and for a period of two months he hired a Peerless sedan, for which he paid $150 per month.

As observed in the case of Taylor v. Bernheim, supra, "From the description given in the testimony of the car in question, the court may well have inferred that the rental value of such a car would not be less than the one rented."

However, as already noted, the rental value of the car which plaintiff rented in the present suit for the period during which he was deprived of the use of his own car amounted to $300, whereas the trial court here allowed the plaintiff $350. While the latter sum may have included an item of $50 expended for taxicabs, we know of no authority warranting such an allowance as part of the damages which may be recovered in an action of this character.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is modified by deducting from the same the sum of $153, and, as thus modified, the judgment is affirmed.

Affirmed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; SEAWELL, J., dissenting.

NOURSE, P. J.

The plaintiff sued for the reasonable value of a "bonus" promised to be paid to his assignor in a letter which read, in part: "I have a job for you. I will give you $50 a week and a bonus to try it out." The cause was tried before a jury, which returned a verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $5,000. On a motion for a new trial the trial court reduced the verdict to $2,000, and, from the judgment for that amount, the defendant has appealed upon a bill of exceptions.

Defendant was engaged in a very successful business in the city of New York. Plaintiff's assignor was employed in a clerical capacity in an insurance company in San Francisco. They became very warm friends and defendant made the written offer to employ plaintiff's assignor in her New York office with the end in view that she might become a valuable member of her organization. The offer was accepted, and the employment continued for approximately one year, when a dispute arose and plaintiff's assignor terminated the employment. During all this time she was paid regularly $50 a week for her services, but nothing was said by either regarding the bonus until some time after the employment ceased. On this appeal the only question involved is whether plaintiff's assignor is entitled to recover a bonus under the contract.

[1] The first contention of the appellant is that there was no enforceable contract to pay a "bonus," because the writing is uncertain and incomplete. Upon this issue the principle of law may be taken to be settled that a contract is unenforceable which is not complete and certain. 6 Cal. Jur., p. 215; 13 Cor. Jur., pp. 266, 267. If, therefore, the words "and a bonus to try it out" are so uncertain and incomplete that the court or jury could not determine what the parties meant, it follows that the contract was unenforceable under this rule. To escape this situation the respondent argues that he is not suing to enforce payment of a bonus as such, but is suing on a contract to pay a nominal salary of $50 a week, "together with a further reasonable compensation for her said services to be fixed at convenient intervals."

[2, 3] If respondent can sustain his theory of the case, it will dispose of all the assaults upon the judgment covering the merits of the controversy, because, if he was entitled to sue in quantum meruit under the circumstances, he was entitled to judgment on proof of the services and of their reasonable value. Respondent's theory finds support in the authorities. The promise to pay the bonus was not a promise to make a gift, but was made in part to induce the promisee to accept the employment and so was a promise to pay additional compensation. Fuller v. Brown (C. C. A.) 15 F.(2d) 672, 676, and cases cited; Payne v. U. S., 50 App. D. C. 219, 269 F. 871, 873; Warren v. Mosher, 31 Ariz. 33, 250 P. 354, 49 A. L. R. 1311; Johnson v. Fuller & Johnson Mfg. Co., 183 Wis. 68, 197 N. W. 241, 245, and cases there cited. Hence, where the promise to pay additional compensation does not fix the amount of the wage, recovery is to be based on quantum meruit. Nave v. Taugher, 49 Cal. App. 308, 193 P. 508; Toomy v. Dunphy, 86 Cal. 639, 25 P. 130. And we find this principle recognized in our statutes (section 1611, Civ. Code), which declares that when the amount of the consideration is not fixed in the contract it is to be determined on the basis of quantum meruit.

[4] From the foregoing we conclude that the respondent was entitled to sue for the reasonable value of the services rendered under the promise to pay a bonus in addition to the stipulated weekly wage.

The verdict of the jury was based upon evidence which was widely conflicting upon the two elements—the amount of work performed and the reasonable value of the services. If the jury believed the story of respondent's assignor, it must have found that she performed many duties outside of those for which she was paid $50 weekly. The value of such services was a matter of opinion, and, though the estimate placed thereon by respondent's assignor and approved by the jury seems wholly unreasonable, we cannot say that the sum of $2,000 to which the verdict was reduced by the able trial judge is not a fair or just amount.

[5] The appellant assigns error in the admission of evidence. She objected to the reading in evidence of a great number of letters written by her to respondent's assignor, or to members of her family. These letters, of course, contained much extraneous matter which could well have been omitted if objection had been made to those portions. But the letters were admissible to show that the promise to pay a bonus was an inducement to enter appellant's employment for which a reasonable compensation was intended to be paid above the weekly wage and to show that the bonus was not intended as a gift or gratuity.

[6] The other assignments relate to the admission of evidence tending to prove the reasonable value of the services rendered. Under respondent's theory of the case, that he was entitled to recover reasonable value, this evidence was admissible, and, having approved that theory, we find no error in the admission of this evidence.

Appellant bases her criticism on the modification of instruction No. 5 on the claim that the testimony of respondent's assignor showed that she had been fully paid for all services performed by her. The testimony of this witness is not subject to the interpretation placed on it by appellant. It was conceded that the witness had been paid $50 weekly by appellant, but her testimony that this sum was in payment of the services which she rendered to appellant could not be taken to mean that it was in full compensation for all services rendered. For the same reasons the trial court did not err in refusing to give appellant's proposed instructions numbered 7, 8 and 9.

Proposed instructions numbered 10, 11, 12, 13, and 14 were all tied into appellant's theory that, unless the offer to pay a bonus was definite and clear as to the amount and manner of payment, there could be no recovery. The unsoundness of this theory under the circumstances here presented we have already pointed out, and hence we conclude that the proposed instructions were properly refused.

Instructions numbered 2, 3, and 4, given at the request of the respondent, were designed to present to the jury respondent's theory that, under the special circumstances of this case, the bonus was not intended as a gift or gratuity, but was intended as a promise to pay additional compensation for the services over and above the payment of $50 weekly, and that respondent was entitled to recover the reasonable value of such services if the jury found such value to be in excess of the weekly sum. As we have heretofore said, respondent's theory is amply supported by the authorities; hence we find no error in these instructions.

The judgment is affirmed.

STURTEVANT, J.

The trial court gave the plaintiff judgment for moneys alleged to be due on a written instrument. From that judgment the defendant has appealed and has brought up the judgment roll. On the 15th day of October, 1924, the plaintiff deeded to the defendant lands near Stockton in exchange for lands at Columbus, Ohio, and as a part of the consideration for the exchange defendant gave to plaintiff twenty-five shares of stock in Lampron Bakery Company, a corporation, and at the same time the defendant executed and delivered a writing in words and figures as follows, to-wit:

"Oakland, Cal., Oct. 15, 1924.

"Two years after date, I, the undersigned, do hereby agree to purchase from J. W. Pellow 25 shares of common stock of the Lampron Bakery Co. of Springfield, Mass., at the price of $50.00 per share.

"George W. Bollinger,
"1245 Niagara St., Buffalo, N. Y.
"c/o R. H. Connor Co."

[1, 2] On April 17, 1928, the plaintiff commenced this action. During the trial in the lower court the defendant contended, and in his briefs in this court the defendant contends, that the instrument sued on was an option, and that the plaintiff waived his rights by not demanding performance on the date of the expiration, that is, two years after October 15, 1924. 25 Cal. Jur. 526. The plaintiff concedes that the contention of the defendant is sound if the instrument is merely an option, but in that behalf he contends that it is an extension of credit and not an option. In support of his position he cites and relies on Maurer v. King, 127 Cal. 114, 59 P. 290, 291. In his reply brief the defendant claims that the Maurer Case is not in point because the contract there involved was in the nature of a guaranty. Conceding that the contract there involved, among other things, was a contract of guaranty, that fact was not the determining fact on which the decision was rested. That contract had three separable features which we have numbered. As so numbered the contract read: "(1) I guarantee that it will be worth fifty cents or more per share inside of two years from this date, in cash, (2) and if he holds said stock at the end of two years from this date, and so requests, I will take it from him, and pay him for it at fifty cents per share, (3) and I will pay all assessments on said stock that may be levied on it up to April 1, 1895, gratis—as witness my hand the day and date above written." Both contracts grew out of exchanges of property. In each case the corporate stock was transferred in lieu of cash. At page 117 of 127 Cal., 59 P. 290, 291, the court said: "Maurer had paid the consideration for the contract, but Smith had not fully performed. The stipulated two years was not a period within which Maurer was bound to do anything. It was an extension of credit to Smith. Within that time Smith could not be compelled to pay the $500 in lieu of the stock. No doubt, Maurer was bound to exercise his option within a reasonable time after the expiration of the credit, and he certainly did do so." In the instant case the trial court made a finding that the plaintiff made his demand within a reasonable time. The evidence is not before us, as the transcript contains merely the judgment roll. Under these circumstances we are unable to say that the trial court committed any error.

The judgment is affirmed.

DOOLING, Justice pro tem.

This case grows out of a dispute that has already been much litigated and the basic facts have been twice previously before the appellate courts. Mancini v. Setaro, 69 Cal. App. 748, 232 P. 495; Mancini v. Patrizi, 87 Cal. App. 435, 262 P. 375. As in the two former cases, plaintiff and respondent has obtained judgment for the statutory penalty of $400 for the refusal of defendant and appellant to transfer on the books of L'Italia Press Company, a corporation of which appellant is the president, eight shares of its capital stock represented by certificate No. 19. How respondent acquired this certificate is set out in the two opinions above cited and need not be repeated here, further than to say that he purchased it for value and without notice of the by-law relied upon by appellant to justify his refusal to recognize him as a stockholder. That by-law was adopted on October 14, 1909, and reads as follows: "No share of stock in this corporation is transferable without the holder thereof first presenting the same to the office of the corporation and offering the same for sale to said corporation."

In Mancini v. Setaro, 69 Cal. App. 748, 232 P. 495, the Supreme Court expressly reserved the question of the validity of this by-law in denying a petition for hearing after judgment in the District Court of Appeal. In Mancini v. Patrizi, 87 Cal. App. 435, 262 P. 375, the by-law was held void as authorizing a paying to the stockholder of part of the capital stock contrary to Civil Code, § 309.

In this case appellant has sought to avoid the effect of this latter decision by proving: (1) That there is in the treasury of the corporation $16,000 of undistributed profits a portion of which could be used to purchase this stock without impairing the capital of the corporation; and (2) that respondent is a competitor of and bitterly hostile to L'Italia Press Company. This latter fact is claimed to bring the case within the exception laid down in Stewart v. Stewart Hotel Co., 33 Cal. App. 167, 164 P. 620. In our view of the case we may concede without deciding that under these facts the by-law in question might be effectively invoked against a purchaser with notice of its existence.

[1] In the case before us, however, respondent was a purchaser for value without notice or knowledge of the existence of this by-law.

The certificate contained the usual recital, "Transferable on the books of the company by endorsement hereon and surrender of this certificate," and there was nothing printed on the certificate in any way calculated to advise a purchaser that the corporation had attempted to place any restriction on this right of transfer. Having issued its certificate in this form, we must hold on well-settled principles that the corporation is now estopped to assert against a bona fide purchaser for value a restriction on the right of transfer of which he had no notice at the time of purchasing the stock.

[2-4] It is settled in this state that by-laws are of no binding force upon third persons having no knowledge of them. Newton v. Johnston Organ Co., 180 Cal. 185, 191, 180 P. 7; Anglo-California Bank v. Grangers' Bank, 63 Cal. 359. And by the issuance of a certificate in regular form a corporation is estopped against a bona fide purchaser without notice of the facts even to assert that the certificate has been gratuitously and fraudulently issued. Green v. Caribou Oil Co., 179 Cal. 787, 178 P. 950; Smith v. Martin, 135 Cal. 247, 67 P. 779. The application of these principles is determinative of this case. By issuing the certificate in the form in which it did the corporation clothed the holder with the apparent authority to transfer title to the shares of stock which it represented by indorsement in such manner as to entitle the transferee to have the stock transferred to him upon the books of the corporation without restriction. Respondent having purchased the stock in reliance upon that appearance of authority, the corporation must be held estopped to assert against him the restrictive by-law of which he had no notice or knowledge at the time of purchase.

We have carefully examined the cases from other jurisdictions cited by appellant in which similar by-laws have been enforced against purchasers of stock certificates and find nothing in them opposed to the conclusion here announced. In Barrett v. King, 181 Mass. 476, 63 N. E. 934, 935; In re Laun, 146 Wis. 252, 131 N. W. 366, and Nicholson v. Franklin Brewing Co., 82 Ohio St. 94, 91 N. E. 991, 137 Am. St. Rep. 764, 19 Ann. Cas. 699, there were recitals on the certificate sufficient to put the purchaser on notice and the purchaser had actual knowledge of the restriction in Casper v. Kalt-Zimmers Mfg. Co., 159 Wis. 517, 149 N. W. 754, 150 N. W. 1101; Cook Ry. Signal Co. v. Buck, 59 Colo. 368, 149 P. 95; Baumohl v. Goldstein, 95 N. J. Eq. 597, 124 A. 118, and Sterling Loan & Investment Co. v. Littel, 75 Colo. 34, 223 P. 753. No case has in fact been cited by appellant where the question of estoppel was raised or discussed in connection with such an attempted restriction upon the transfer of stock.

If we are correct in our conclusion, the judgment in this case should put a definite end to this protracted litigation.

Judgment affirmed.

1. Highways ⇨166.

County board of supervisors may designate public highways as boulevards, and, under certain conditions, require vehicles to stop before entering or crossing (St. 1923, p. 563, § 145, as amended by St. 1925, p. 414, § 17).

2. Highways ⇨166.

County's designation of highways as boulevards and requirement that all vehicles stop before entering or crossing same can only become effective through action of board of supervisors (St. 1923, p. 563, § 145, as amended by St. 1925, p. 414, § 17).

3. Highways ⇨166.

Determination of facts warranting county regulation requiring vehicles to stop before entering or crossing certain highways held nondelegable legislative function (St. 1923, p. 563, § 145, as amended by St. 1925, p. 414, § 17).

Determination by board of supervisors pursuant to St. 1923, p. 563, § 145, as amended by St. 1925, p. 414, § 17, on which highways, conditions, and volume of traffic are sufficient to require cross traffic to stop before entering thereon, and establishing regulation requiring vehicles to stop before entering designated boulevards, involves exercise of judgment and discretion by members of board. The statute grants authority to boards of supervisors to prescribe local regulations of traffic, within certain limitations.

4. Highways ⇨166.

Placing of stop signs along designated boulevard without action in matter by county board of supervisors held ineffective to require traffic to stop before entering boulevard (St. 1923, p. 563, § 145, as amended by St. 1925, p. 414, § 17).

St. 1923, p. 560, § 131, as amended by St. 1925, p. 412, § 15, provides that, when two vehicles approach an intersection of public highways at approximately the same time, the vehicle approaching from the right shall have the right of way, provided such vehicle is traveling at a lawful speed, and that the driver of a vehicle entering a public highway from a private road or drive shall yield the right of way to all vehicles approaching on the highway. The Vehicle Act gave no authority to local authorities to change or modify the provisions of the act governing rights of way at intersections.

MARKS, Acting P. J.

This is an action for personal injuries following an automobile collision. It was tried before a jury, which returned a verdict in favor of respondent in the sum of $2,500.

Foothill boulevard is a public highway running in a general easterly and westerly direction in the county of San Bernardino, state of California. Linden avenue intersects Foothill boulevard at right angles.

On the 19th day of June, 1927, respondent was riding in an automobile with her two sons traveling in an easterly direction on Foothill boulevard. Her older son, Julius, of the age of about twenty-one years, was driving the car. A younger son, Sydney, was riding on the front seat beside his brother. Respondent, at the time of the accident, was lying on the rear seat of the car. William Lindenbaum, the husband and father, who was the owner of the automobile, was working in San Bernardino. The 19th day of June, 1927, was his birthday, and on this day respondent and her two sons were proceeding to San Bernardino to visit and have dinner with him.

At and near the point of the accident, Foothill boulevard had a width of 54½ feet between curbs which were set out 14 feet from the property lines, giving the street a total width of 82½ feet. A strip in the center, 18 feet wide, was paved. The roadways between the pavement and the curbs were improved with oil and gravel. Linden avenue was 60 feet wide between the property lines. North of Foothill boulevard it was improved with an oil strip about 12 feet in width. South of Foothill boulevard it had a narrower oiled strip which was in poor condition. A boulevard stop sign was maintained on the northwest corner of the intersection just inside of the curb return on Foothill boulevard. A similar stop sign was maintained near the southeast corner of the intersection on Linden avenue at about the southerly line of Foothill boulevard.

As respondent was lying down on the rear seat of the automobile, she knew nothing of the circumstances preceding the collision. Sydney Lindenbaum, called as one of her witnesses, had not been paying particular attention to the operation of the car in which he was riding, and his testimony is of little value to either party. Julius Lindenbaum testified for respondent, and was her main witness to the facts of, and the circumstances preceding the accident. He testified that he was driving easterly on Foothill boulevard approaching its intersection with Linden avenue at a speed of about 25 to 30 miles per hour; that, when he was about 60 feet westerly from the west line of the intersection, he saw appellant's automobile proceeding south on Linden avenue toward the intersection. Lindenbaum reduced the speed of the car he was driving to about 15 miles per hour at the time it entered the intersection. At that time he placed the automobile of appellant in the intersection with its front wheels upon or just approaching the north edge of the paved portion of Foothill boulevard. This placed respondent's car just entering the intersection and appellant's car with its front wheels about 32 feet southerly from the northerly intersection line. He further testified that appellant's car was about 10 feet from him at this time, and that it had not stopped opposite or near the boulevard stop sign. Lindenbaum applied his brakes and swerved his car to the right, its left front fender coming into collision with the right side of appellant's car just to the rear of the door. The force of the impact drove appellant's car to its left, and it came to rest on the east side of Linden avenue, east of the oiled portion thereof. The car in which respondent was riding was turned completely around by the impact, and it came to rest in the southerly portion of the street intersection, facing west. Its left front and rear fenders and its left running board were either torn off or badly crumpled. He fixed the speed of appellant's car, in approaching and crossing the intersection, at approximately 15 miles per hour.

Appellant specifies numerous errors in the rulings of the trial court on objections to the introduction of evidence, and complains of a number of instructions given to the jury. The principal ground upon which he seeks a reversal of the judgment is that the evidence does not show negligence on his part in the events leading up to the accident. He urges that under the California Vehicle Act he had the right of way at the intersection, as he entered it first and was traveling at a lawful rate of speed, and that the driver of the automobile in which respondent was riding was negligent in not yielding the right of way and in running into his car. To meet this contention, respondent relies solely upon the provisions of an ordinance of the county of San Bernardino providing for boulevard stops on Foothill boulevard and attempting to regulate motor traffic thereon and providing rights of way at intersections on this boulevard. The pertinent parts of this ordinance are as follows:

"Ordinance No. 261. Adopted November 9, 1925; effective December 9, 1925. An Ordinance of the County of San Bernardino regulating motor traffic upon certain highways in the County of San Bernardino and fixing a penalty for the violation thereof.

"Section 1. That * * * all motor vehicles driven upon Foothill Boulevard shall have the right of way over vehicles driven on Riverside Avenue, Etiwanda Avenue, Turner Avenue, Archibald Avenue and Hellman Avenue. * * *

"Section 2. And that all motor vehicles being driven on said * * * Foothill Boulevard, * * * shall have the right of way at all intersections of all other roads not herein mentioned when a stop sign is maintained at the side of the Roadway near such intersection.

"Section 3. That any and all persons driving and operating motor vehicles and approaching said * * * Foothill Boulevard, * * * at the intersection hereinabove mentioned in Section 1 hereof, and at other intersections upon which a Stop Sign is maintained shall come to a full stop at a point outside the boundary line of said Highways and within 30 feet thereof, and shall not again move until the intersection being approached is clear of traffic and there is sufficient space clear of motor vehicle traffic on either side of said intersection to permit such persons so approaching said intersections to cross same without in any way interfering with the traffic upon said highways so approached as aforesaid."

Section 145 of the California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 563, § 145, as amended by St. 1925, p. 414, § 17) in effect at the time of the collision provided in part as follows:

"Powers of Boards of Supervisors and Legislative Bodies of Cities. Nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as to prevent boards of supervisors in their respective counties and the legislative bodies of incorporated cities from * * * designating certain public highways as boulevards and requiring that all vehicles shall be stopped before entering or crossing such boulevards, provided all such boulevards are clearly marked or signposted to give notice of such fact. * * *"

[1-3] In the foregoing section, in so far as it relates to boulevard stop signs, boards of supervisors are given the power, first, to designate certain public highways as boulevards; and, second, to require that all vehicles stop before entering or crossing the same, provided boulevard signs are maintained clearly indicating such stop. Thus it would seem that the powers of boards of supervisors are limited to the designation of the boulevards and the requiring of stops. It should be noted that these powers, in so far as they affect county highways, are given to boards of supervisors and to no other body, organization, or person. It follows that the powers must, then, be exercised by boards of supervisors in order to become effective. First, the board can determine, from among the various highways of the county, the ones upon which the conditions and volume of traffic are sufficient to require the cross traffic to stop before entering thereon. Second, it can then establish the regulation requiring vehicles to stop before entering upon these boulevards. The exercise of these powers is a legislative function. Wulzen v. Board of Supervisors, 101 Cal. 15, 35 P. 353, 40 Am. St. Rep. 17; 5 Cal. Jur. 676; Smith v. Strother, 68 Cal. 194, 8 P. 852. It is a grant of authority by the Legislature of the state to the boards of supervisors to prescribe local regulations of traffic, within the limitations contained in the California Vehicle Act. Under such grant of power a board of supervisors cannot exceed the authority directly given to it. 5 Cal. Jur. 680, and cases there cited. The board of supervisors cannot delegate this legislative power to another. It involves the exercise of judgment and discretion on the part of its members, the responsibility for which they cannot escape by shifting it to another. Egan v. City and County of San Francisco, 165 Cal. 576, 133 P. 294, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 754; Knight v. City of Eureka, 123 Cal. 192, 55 P. 768.

[4] This ordinance of the county of San Bernardino provides that all vehicles approaching Foothill boulevard shall stop at its intersections with Riverside avenue, Etiwanda avenue, Turner avenue, Archibald avenue, and Hellman avenue, and "at all intersections of all other roads not herein mentioned when a stop sign is maintained at the side of the roadway near such intersections." As Linden avenue is not named in the ordinance as a street upon which traffic must stop before entering Foothill boulevard, it must be one of the intersections of "all other roads" therein mentioned, if included within the provisions of the ordinance. As the right to determine the roads upon which traffic must stop is a legislative function, it must be exercised by the board of supervisors, and cannot be delegated by it to another. We have searched the record carefully, and cannot find any intimation of any action taken by the board of supervisors of San Bernardino county regarding stops or stop signs along Foothill boulevard other than that contained in this ordinance. Seemingly the board has never required traffic on Linden avenue to stop before entering Foothill boulevard. In fact, one witness testified that the stop signs were placed at this intersection by a volunteer with no official connection with any of the legally constituted authorities of the county of San Bernardino. There is no other evidence in the record bearing upon the authority by which the stop signs at this intersection were established or maintained. It is self-evident that a mere volunteer, not even remotely connected with a county government, may not usurp the legislative functions of a board of supervisors and create lawful boulevard stops by the promiscuous scattering of stop signs along a boulevard. The stop signs at the intersection in question had no lawful significance.

[5] It will also be observed that the ordinance in question went further than designating Foothill boulevard as a boulevard and requiring vehicular traffic to stop at certain intersections. It attempted to provide that motor vehicles on Foothill boulevard should have the right of way over vehicles on certain intersecting streets, and attempted to establish a rule governing the rights of way of motor vehicles at these intersections contrary to the rules established by the Legislature in the California Vehicle Act. Section 131 of this act in force at the time of the accident provided as follows:

"Right of Way. (a) When two vehicles approach an intersection of public highways at approximately the same time, the vehicle approaching from the right shall have the right of way, provided such vehicle is traveling at a lawful speed. (b) The driver of a vehicle entering a public highway from a private road or drive shall yield the right of way to all vehicles approaching on said public highway." St. 1923, p. 560, § 131, as amended by St. 1925, p. 412, § 15.

It has been held that the provisions of this section give the right of way at an intersection to the vehicle entering it first, if traveling at a lawful rate of speed. Lipp v. Moon, 100 Cal. App. 618, 280 P. 710; Wynne v. Wright, (Cal. App.) 286 P. 1057. It is immediately apparent that the provisions of the ordinance of San Bernardino county attempting to establish rights of way at certain intersections on Foothill boulevard are in direct conflict with the provisions of section 131 of the California Vehicle Act in force at the time of the accident. The state law gave no authority to local authorities to change or modify the provisions of the California Vehicle Act governing rights of way at intersections such as the one we are considering. A board of supervisors has no power to change a law by ordinance under the circumstances presented by this case. Ex parte Daniels, 183 Cal. 636, 192 P. 442, 21 A. L. R. 1172. We must therefore hold that the provisions of the ordinance are void in so far as they endeavor to change the state law regulating rights of way at intersections on Foothill boulevard. It follows as a matter of course that the effort of respondent to sustain the judgment because of the purported violation of the county ordinance by appellant must fail.

[6, 7] We are presented with an unusual situation in view of the condition of the record before us. We do not feel justified in holding that Julius Lindenbaum was guilty of negligence, or of contributory negligence as a matter of law under the authorities cited in White v. Davis (Cal. App.) 284 P. 1086. There is just enough in his testimony to raise an issue of fact, on the questions of his negligence, or of his contributory negligence, and the negligence of appellant, if any, to require the case to be submitted to the jury. The jury returned a verdict in favor of respondent.

Thus far in this opinion we have set forth only the facts most favorable to the case of respondent which appear from the testimony of her son Julius. His testimony was thoroughly contradicted by all of the other witnesses in the case. Appellant and his wife testified that their car was stopped opposite the boulevard stop sign on the northwest corner of the intersection, where it remained stationary for one or two minutes to allow the traffic on Foothill boulevard to pass and the intersection to become clear. When this traffic had passed, appellant put his car in second gear and proceeded to cross the intersection. Before doing so, he and his wife looked in both directions on Foothill boulevard for approaching traffic, and the only vehicle in sight, according to their testimony, was the one in which respondent was riding. It was approaching the intersection from the west at a distance of 300 feet or more. Appellant proceeded across the intersection, and did not again look for, nor see, respondent's car until the time of the collision. His automobile was south of the paved portion of the street at the time of the impact.

A disinterested witness testified that he saw appellant stop opposite the boulevard stop sign and remain stationary for a brief period. His attention was next attracted by the screeching of brakes, and he saw the collision which occurred in the southerly portion of the intersection south of the pavement on Foothill boulevard. He examined the tracks made by the Lindenbaum car. At a point about 60 feet west from the intersection, there were black marks on the pavement made by the sliding of the left tires of the Lindenbaum car, the right wheels being off the pavement and on the graveled portion of the road. The tire marks showed that the Lindenbaum car bore to its right for a distance of about 60 feet before reaching the intersection and turned sharply to its right after reaching it. Another disinterested witness testified that he followed the black marks made by the left tires of the Lindenbaum car between 30 and 35 feet westerly from the intersection. In view of this very convincing evidence strongly indicating negligence, or at least contributory negligence, on the part of young Lindenbaum, we can find but one reasonable explanation for the verdict rendered in this case.

Ordinance No. 261 of the county of San Bernardino was admitted in evidence without any objection on the part of appellant. The trial court gave the following instruction to the jury:

"The general rule is that every person has a right to presume that every other person will perform his duty and obey the law, and in the absence of reasonable ground to think otherwise it is not negligence to assume that he is not exposed to danger which comes to him only from violation of law or duty by such other person."

With the ordinance in evidence, this instruction told the jury in effect that appellant was guilty of negligence if he violated any of its provisions. As we have seen, some of the provisions of this ordinance were contrary to law and void. The violation of such provisions could not constitute negligence. Therefore the giving of this instruction, with the ordinance in evidence and before the jury, constituted prejudicial error, and the judgment cannot be sustained.

Judgment reversed.

We concur: BARNARD, J.; WARMER, Justice pro tem.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM.

Respondent has filed her petition for rehearing in which she requests this court to reconsider the case upon two principal grounds. First, she urges that, as no objection was made to the introduction of ordinance number 261 of the county of San Bernardino, which is the boulevard stop ordinance, no error can be predicated on this ordinance. In support of this contention she cites 2 California Jurisprudence, pp. 234-263. Next she urges that, since the case was tried upon the theory of the validity of the ordinance, its validity cannot be questioned upon appeal, citing Sommer v. Martin, 55 Cal. App. 603, 204 P. 33.

[8, 9] The judgment in this case was not reversed because of the introduction of this ordinance in evidence, but because of an instruction to the jury which this court considered prejudicially erroneous with the ordinance in evidence and before the jury. "Giving an instruction, although no objection to such instruction was made, * * * are deemed to have been excepted to." Section 647, Code Civ. Proc. An error of law committed during a trial and excepted to, even though the exception has been reserved to a party and made by operation of law, has always been held grounds for the reversal of a judgment, if the error be prejudicial. In view of the evidence before us, we still consider this error of law prejudicial.

[10] Petitioner further complains that this court went beyond the points raised by appellant in stating its reasons for a reversal of the judgment. It is well-settled law in this state that, while an appellate court in deciding a case is not required to go beyond the errors pointed out in the briefs, it is not bound to confine itself to a consideration of the questions presented, but may make an independent investigation of the record should it so desire. 2 Cal. Jur. pp. 729, 730, and authorities cited. Permanent Supplement to Cal. Jur. 1928, pp. 133, 134. In our opinion, we went beyond the points raised in the briefs filed and made an independent investigation of phases of the case not argued by counsel because we regarded them of sufficient importance to justify our doing so.

The petition for rehearing is denied.

BAYSIDE FISH FLOUR CO. v. ZELLER-BACH et al.
Civ. 7616.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 2, California.
Nov. 20, 1930.

1. Statutes ☞263.

Law speaks from time it goes into effect.

2. Statutes ☞263.

Statute has no force until taking effect, and acts done thereunder before such time are void.

3. Mandamus ☞154(7).

Mandamus petition to compel issuance of fish permit, alleging operation of plant under order of fish commission for revocable permit made before effective date of act authorizing permit, did not show application for permit under statute authorizing same and was insufficient (St. 1925, p. 595; St. 1929, p. 901).

St. 1925, p. 595, authorized Fish and Game Commission to issue permits to take sardines for the purpose of manufacturing same into product for human consumption; and St. 1929, p. 901, in effect August 14, 1929, authorized commission to grant revocable permits to use fish. Petitioner for mandamus to require fish and game commission to issue revocable permit to petitioner alleged that petitioner had been operating manufacturing plant continuously since 1924 by virtue of permit issued August 22, 1925, and alleged application for revocable permit July 8, 1929, which was granted August 5, 1929, that on August 15 commission advised petitioner authorizing him to proceed until permit was actually issued, and that thereafter petitioner operated plant and was entitled to have commission issue a revocable permit, which commission refused.

Mandamus by the Bayside Fish Flour Company against I. Zellerbach and others.

Writ denied.

Roy Daily, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Eugene D. Bennett, of San Francisco, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J.

This is an application for a writ of mandate directing the defendant board to issue to the petitioner a revocable permit to take and use ten thousand tons of sardines to manufacture an edible fish flour. The petitioner alleges that it is a corporation having its principal place of business in San Francisco; that it owns and operates a " * * * manufacturing plant located in the city and county of Monterey, State of California * * *"; that it has been operating continuously since the year 1924 under and by virtue of a permit issued by respondents on the 22d day of August, 1925; and pleads in hæc verba said permit; that on the 8th day of July, 1929, the petitioner applied for a revocable permit, and pleads in hæc verba said application; that a hearing on said application was had on the 29th day of July, 1929; that on the 5th day of August, 1929, the defendant board entered in its minutes an order directing the issuance of a revocable permit for the season of 1928-1929; that on the 15th day of August, 1929, the defendant board caused a letter to be sent to the petitioner advising the petitioner of its action and authorizing petitioner to proceed until the permit was actually issued; that thereafter from August 15, 1929, to February 14, 1930, the petitioner operated its manufacturing plant; that petitioner's plant has a capacity to handle ten thousand tons of sardines during each season, that is, from August 1st of one year until February 15th of the following year. And then in paragraph VI it is alleged: "That petitioner is entitled under the law to have the Fish and Game Commission of the Department and Natural Resources of the State of California issue to petitioner a revocable permit, but which said commission refused to do although demand therefor has been made upon it and after this petitioner has complied with all conditions precedent requisite to have said revocable permit issued." It thus appears that the petitioner alleges an application for a permit in 1924 and an application for a permit in 1929. Although it is not clear that such was the intention of the pleader, we will assume that in paragraph VI it attempted to allege another application. As to the last application we have quoted everything contained in the petition that purports to plead a compliance with the provisions of the statute.

[1, 2] Before proceeding further, it should be noted that by chapter 551 of the Statutes of 1919, p. 1203, the basic act to conserve fish was enacted. It took effect July 25, 1919. By its terms only offal might be used in a reduction plant without first obtaining a written permit from the defendant board. That statute was amended by chapter 340 of the Statutes of 1921 p. 458, which took effect July 29, 1921. By its terms it authorized the use of fish in a reduction plant when the fish were to be reduced into a product for human consumption. The statute, in that behalf, authorized the issuance of an order by the defendant board, said order to be granted for a period not longer than a seasonal run. Chapter 340 of the Statutes of 1925, p. 595, in effect July 23, 1925, by its terms authorizes the defendant board to issue permits to take sardines for the purpose of manufacturing the same into a product for human consumption. Chapter 525 of the Statutes of 1929, p. 901, in effect August 14, 1929, with certain exceptions, prohibited the taking of fish or the using of fish in a reduction plant. One exception is addressed to plants engaged in " * * * canning, drying, salting, smoking, or pickling." The other exception is worded as follows: " * * * Provided, further, that the fish and game commission may grant a revocable permit or permits in such amount and subject to such restrictions, rules or regulations as the fish and game commission may adopt or prescribe to take and use fish by a reduction or extraction process for the manufacture of edible products fit for, intended to be used and in fact used for human consumption providing it shall be shown and appear to the satisfaction of the fish and game commission that such use of such fish will not tend to deplete the species, or result in waste or deterioration of such fish; and provided, further, that no such permit shall be granted unless at least fifty per cent (50 %) of the wet weight of the whole ground fish or all of the oil extracted from such fish is manufactured into such products within the State of California." It becomes necessary to notice when each particular law took effect. A law speaks from the time it goes into effect. Until the time arrives when it is to take effect a statute has no force whatever for any purpose, and all acts purporting to have been done under it prior to that time are void. 23 Cal. Jur. 623; Harrison v. Colgan, 148 Cal. 69, 76, 82 P. 674. The permit granted August 22, 1925, rests on the provisions of chapter 340 of the Statutes of 1925. But all of the statutes except the act of 1929 are silent as to revocable permits. The application made on July 8, 1929, and the minute entry made by the defendant board on August 5, 1929, must find support, if any, in the act of 1925, because chapter 525 of the Statutes of 1929 did not take effect until August 14, 1929. But, as just stated, the act of 1925 contained no passage regarding revocable permits. The statutory conditions in the act of 1925 are not the same as the conditions imposed by the act of 1929.

[3] The question then arises as to whether the petitioner has alleged facts showing that subsequent to August 14, 1929, it made an application under chapter 525 of the Statutes of 1929. It is sufficient to state that the pleader does not attempt to do anything in this behalf except to plead certain legal conclusions.

The defendants interposed a general demurrer and an answer. From what has been said above it is clear that the application can be disposed of by ruling on the demurrer and that it is unnecessary to take up the issues made by the answer.

The demurrer is sustained, and the application is denied.

PEOPLE v. FONTES.

Cr. 1596.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California.

Dec. 1, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 15, 1930.

1. Witnesses $\S$ 277(2).

Accused becoming witness in own behalf waives protection of Code prohibiting reading of prior conviction or comment thereon, and may be cross-examined as to prior conviction (Const. art. 1, § 13; Pen. Code, § 1025).

Const. art. 1, § 13, provides that no person may be witness against himself, and Pen. Code, § 1025, declares that fact of prior conviction must not be alluded to at trial.

2. Criminal law $\S$ 722(2).

Reference by district attorney to defendant's companions as "gang" held not erroneous in prosecution for robbery and burglary.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Stanley Murray, Judge.

John Fontes was convicted of robbery and burglary, and he appeals.

Affirmed.

Frederick Dubovsky, of Oakland, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Ralph O. Mar-ron, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

TYLER, P. J.

Defendant and appellant was charged by information filed by the district attorney of Alameda county with the crimes of robbery and burglary and also a prior conviction. Defendant admitted the prior conviction, and entered a plea of not guilty to the charges contained in the first two counts. He was found guilty of robbery and burglary in the first degree.

It appeared in evidence that on January 22, 1930, defendant, in company with another, entered a store in the city of Oakland and asked to be shown certain goods. After the proprietor had complied with their request, defendant and his companion demanded money from him. Failing to receive it, they proceeded to beat him about the head and knocked his teeth out. They then took from his person an English one-pound note and other property. A pistol was used in the commission of the crime. Defendant and his confederate then drove away in an automobile.

It is here urged as ground for a reversal of the judgment that the trial court erred in forcing the defendant to admit his prior conviction; it being contended that such act was in violation of the provisions of section 13, art. 1, of the Constitution, which provides that no person may be a witness against himself. It is further urged that it is also a violation of the provisions of section 1025 of the Penal Code, which declares that the fact of a prior conviction must not be alluded to at the trial.

[1] The point is not one of first impression in this state. It has been held that, when a defendant presents himself as a witness in his own behalf, he becomes subject to all the ordinary rules of evidence, and, his truth, honesty, and integrity being in issue, he may be asked, as here, on cross-examination if he has ever been convicted of a felony. The provisions of section 1025 of the Penal Code to the effect that, where a defendant has suffered a previous conviction, and has pleaded guilty thereof, it shall not be read to the jury, nor commented on at the trial, are not intended to prevent the asking of such general question upon cross-examination of the defendant as a witness on his own behalf. By becoming such witness, he waives the protection of that section of the Code. People v. Oliver, 7 Cal. App. 601, 95 P. 172; People

v. Hickman, 113 Cal. 80, 45 P. 175; People v. Bishop, 134 Cal. 689, 66 P. 976.

[2] Appellant next complains of the action of the trial court in curtailing the cross-examination of the prosecuting witness. There is no merit in the objection. Full opportunity was afforded defendant to disprove the testimony of this witness. And, finally, appellant complains of the action of the district attorney in referring to defendant's companions as a "gang." We see no merit in this objection.

The judgment is affirmed.

MERCER et al. v. DUNSCOMB et al.
Civ. 6999.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California.

Nov. 24, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 24, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 19, 1931.

1. Corporations ⇨326.

Constitutional liability of corporate directors for moneys misappropriated held applicable only to misappropriation of corporate funds and not to funds intrusted to corporation for investment (Const. art. 12, § 3).

Third party deposited with corporation a certain amount of money for purpose of purchasing bonds. Substantially all of money was misappropriated to use and benefit of corporation by its directors. Const. art. 12, § 3, provides that directors of corporations shall be jointly and severally liable to creditors and stockholders for all moneys embezzled or misappropriated by the officers of such corporation during the term of office of such directors.

2. Corporations ⇨361.

In action against corporate directors to recover funds misappropriated by officers, evidence showing general business practice to receive funds for investment and issue interim certificates therefor held admissible.

Such evidence was admissible to charge all directors as matter of law with knowledge of matter in which deposits were being kept and disposed of by officers of corporation, and therefore legally sufficient, in absence of explanatory evidence showing individual efforts on directors' part to safeguard and prevent loss, to establish against them prima facie liability for misappropriation of deposits to use and benefit of corporation by officers.

3. Corporations ⇨344.

Directors' release by trustee in bankruptcy, for stated consideration, of liability to bankrupt corporation, held not release of liability to third party for funds misappropriated by officers.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; John J. Allen, Judge.

Action by Edith A. W. Mercer and another against Charles E. Dunscomb and others. From part of judgment favorable to defendant named and defendant Otis Marston, as executor of the estate of William H. Marston, deceased, plaintiffs appeal.

Reversed.

Thornton Wilson, of Oakland, and Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Redmond C. Staats, of Berkeley, and James M. Koford, of Oakland (J. J. Earle, of Oakland, of counsel), for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

Plaintiffs sued the defendants above named for $13,000, and obtained a judgment against two of them, Munro and Huey, for the sum of $12,680.26. The third defendant, Cornwall was not served with summons, and consequently as to him no relief was granted; and the remaining two, Dunscomb and Marston, were absolved by the trial court from all liability on the indebtedness sued upon. From the latter part of the judgment plaintiffs have appealed.

As will hereinafter more particularly appear, the amount plaintiffs sued for had been deposited by them with the Security Bond & Finance Company, a corporation, of which the defendant Dunscomb and the deceased Wm. H. Marston were two of the five directors, for the purpose of purchasing for plaintiffs certain bonds, and substantially all of it was misappropriated to the use and benefit of the corporation by the defendants Cornwall and Huey, with the consent of Munro, the three being at the time the remaining members of the board of directors, and also, respectively, the vice president and manager, the secretary, and the president of the corporation.

The amended complaint contained two causes of action, separately stated. The first was based upon the liability created against directors of corporations by section 3 of article 12 of the state Constitution; but the trial court held that such liability applies only to the embezzlement or misappropriation of funds belonging to the corporation, and that therefore, since the money here sought to be recovered admittedly belonged to plaintiffs and not to the corporation, the liability created by said constitutional provision could not be invoked by plaintiffs. The second cause of action, as against Cornwall, Huey, and Munro, was based upon the fact of the actual misappropriation by them of the intrusted funds; and, as against Dunscomb and Marston, upon allegations to the effect that such misappropriation was the result of the negligent manner in which the latter performed their duties as directors. The trial court found, however, that the evidence on this issue was legally insufficient to establish negligence on their part, and consequently, as stated, judgment was entered in their favor, but against the defendants Munro and Huey for $12,680.26, the amount of the defalcation.

[1] The first question presented for determination is whether, as the trial court held, the directors' liability created by section 3 of article 12 of the Constitution applies only to the cases of embezzlement or misappropriation of funds belonging to the corporation; or whether, as plaintiffs contend, it extends to cases such as we have here—the misappropriation of funds intrusted to a corporation in the regular course of its business. The portion of said section 3 of article 12, which is pertinent, reads as follows: “* * * The directors or trustees of corporations and joint-stock associations shall be jointly and severally liable to the creditors and stockholders for all moneys embezzled or misappropriated by the officers of such corporation or joint-stock association, during the term of office of such director or trustee.”

So far as our attention has been called, no case has been decided by the reviewing courts involving a state of facts analogous to those presented here; but on several occasions said constitutional provision has been construed in actions involving the embezzlement or misappropriation of corporate funds, and, in all of them it is clearly indicated, we think, that said constitutional liability extends only to the embezzlement or misappropriation of funds belonging to the corporation itself, in whose services the defaulting officer is employed.

As said in the case of Fox v. Hale & Norcross Silver Mining Co., 108 Cal. 369, 41 P. 308, 326: “It does seem that it was the intention of the framers of the Constitution to make each director of a corporation severally liable, whether individually culpable or not, for certain kinds of losses to the corporation occurring during his term of office; that is to say, he is made liable for embezzlement or misappropriation of corporate funds by officers of the corporation.” Later, in the case of Winchester v. Howard, 136 Cal. 432, 64 P. 692, 69 P. 77, 81, 89 Am. St. Rep. 153, it was said: "The design plainly was to prevent speculating in corporate funds by directors, and to make them vigilant for their beneficiaries. * * * I think it clear that when an officer of a corporation knowingly appropriates funds intrusted to him for unlawful and unauthorized purposes, and loss ensues to the corporation, the directors are liable under this clause of the constitution." And again in Dean v. Shingle, 198 Cal. 652, 246 P. 1049, 1054, 46 A. L. R. 1156, the court says: "The design plainly was to prevent speculation and misappropriation of corporate funds. * * * But before the directors can be held liable for moneys so misappropriated as to make the officer misappropriating liable, and authorizing the creditors and stockholders to sue, it must be established: First, that there has been a misappropriation; and second, that a loss to the corporation has resulted." (All italics ours.)

Moreover, in the case of Dean v. Shingle, supra, it is said that the action authorized to be maintained against directors under the constitutional provision above mentioned "is one, in effect, to recover assets of the corporation which constitute a fund to which all the creditors may look for satisfaction of their claims (Winchester v. Mabury, 122 Cal. 522, 524, 55 P. 393)"; and, continuing, the court said that the recovery, if any be had, constitutes a fund for the benefit of all the creditors; and that if, after satisfying their claims, any of the fund remains, it will belong to the stockholders. The foregoing construction would seem to be wholly at variance with the theory advanced by plaintiffs herein to the effect that said constitutional provision confers upon the creditors of a corporation the right to maintain separate actions against the directors for the recovery of money intrusted by said creditors to the corporation and by the officers thereof embezzled or misappropriated, because, manifestly, any money recovered in such actions would belong to the creditor who had intrusted it to the corporation, and would not, as contemplated by the decision in Dean v. Shingle, supra, "constitute a fund for the benefit of all creditors."

In support of their theory, plaintiffs emphasize certain language employed in the case of Fox v. Hale & Norcross Silver Mining Co., supra, in interpreting the meaning of the word "misappropriation" as used in said constitutional provision, wherein it was said: "* * * In my opinion the word 'misappropriation' is to be construed by the maxim, 'noscitur a sociis.' It means something like embezzlement, or in other words, it means the misapplication of funds intrusted to an officer for a particular purpose, by devoting them to some unauthorized purpose, and does not apply to the payment of an extravagant price for services or materials properly appertaining to the business of the corporation—which is this case." But, as will be observed from the language quoted as well as from the other facts appearing in the opinion, only corporate funds were there involved, and it is apparent therefrom that the expression "funds entrusted to an officer" as there used meant only corporate funds intrusted to such officer and not funds intrusted to the corporation by others. For the reasons stated, we are in accord with the trial court's conclusion that the liability created by said constitutional provision applies only to the embezzlement or misappropriation of corporate funds.

[2] With respect to the second cause of action, plaintiffs make no claim that the evidence adduced at the trial was legally sufficient to justify a finding that Dunscomb and Marston were negligent, but it is contended that prejudicial error was committed in excluding certain evidence offered by them which they claim would have been legally sufficient to establish a prima facie case against the respondent defendants for the loss of said intrusted funds. The facts leading up to the rulings complained of were as follows: Said Security Bond & Finance Company was engaged in the business of buying and selling securities. It had offices in Berkeley, and operated in connection with its business a safe deposit department for the deposit of securities belonging to its clients. The plaintiff Edith Mercer was a resident of Palo Alto, and held power of attorney from her brother and coplaintiff Woodsum. For a number of years she had counseled with and followed the advice of Munro in making financial investments for herself and brother. The business was transacted through said corporation, and the securities it purchased for plaintiffs were left on deposit with the corporation for safe-keeping. In pursuance of such business relationship, and just prior to December 31, 1925, said corporation held in its possession and belonging to plaintiffs a number of bonds of the total par value of $16,000, which Mrs. Mercer desired to sell and with the proceeds to purchase tax exempt securities. After consulting Munro, he advised the purchase of Palo Verde Irrigation District bonds, and she authorized the corporation to proceed accordingly. On January 2, 1926, said corporation informed plaintiffs that the transaction had been consummated, and issued and delivered to them a receipt dated January 2, 1926, containing a list of the bonds it claimed to have purchased, and stating that it was retaining the same in its possession for safe-keeping as gratuitous bailee. On May 20, 1926, the corporation closed its doors, and later went into the hands of a receiver, and was adjudged bankrupt.

Upon learning of the collapse of the corporation, plaintiffs presented their receipt to the receiver and demanded delivery of the bonds enumerated therein. It was then discovered that the statements set forth in the receipt were false; that no bonds whatever had been purchased for plaintiff, but, on the contrary, that the money they intrusted to the corporation for such purposes had been misappropriated by Cornwall, Huey, and Munro by mingling the same with the general funds of the corporation and expending all of it in carrying on its business; and that, in lieu of purchasing the bonds called for by said receipt and depositing the same in plaintiffs' safe deposit file, the officers named placed therein a so-called "Interim Certificate," which proved to be worthless. It read as follows: "Par Value $13,000.00. Number 1304 Security Bond and Finance Company Interim Certificate Berkeley, California, December 31, 1925. This is to acknowledge that there is due Mrs. E. A. W. Mercer, Trustee for, or order Howard C. Woodsum thirteen thousand and no/100 ($13,000.00) dollars, par value of Palo Verde Irrigation District 6's due various dates. When received by us we will deliver the same upon surrender of this certificate, properly endorsed. Should the above bonds not be issued, this certificate, properly endorsed, will be redeemed by us for thirteen thousand three hundred ninety and no/100 dollars, the sum originally paid for the same, together with interest thereon at the rate of six (6) per centum per annum from date of this certificate to the time of its redemption, provided, however, that interest shall cease to accrue thirty days after notice is transmitted to the holder thereof that the delivery of the above bonds will not be made. Security Bond and Finance Company, By H. Soderholm, Cashier. (Corporate Seal.)"

After having established the foregoing facts, plaintiffs offered to prove further that the general practice of the corporation was to mingle the money intrusted to it by its various clients for the purchase of securities with its general funds and to issue interim certificates therefor, without maintaining a reserve fund for the redemption of such certificates in case the securities were not purchased, that in 24 different instances it had done so, and "that the amount of such interim certificates outstanding between December 31, 1925, and May 20, 1926, varied from a maximum of $159,684.35 on January 16, 1926, to a minimum of $116,279.90 on dates between April 12 and 17, 1926." But the evidence was excluded on objection of the defendants.

We are of the opinion that under the law as laid down in the case of Vujacich v. Southern Commercial Co., 21 Cal. App. 439, 132 P. 80, 81, such evidence was admissible. In that case the defendant corporation was engaged ostensibly in the grocery and liquor business, its customers consisting mostly of laborers, who from time to time deposited their earnings with the corporation for safe-keeping. But, instead of keeping the intrusted funds separately, the officers of the corporation mingled the same with the corporation's funds, deposited the whole thereof to its credit in the bank, and afterwards misappropriated the same to its own use and benefit in purchasing and operating a distillery in another state. Thereafter the depositors brought suit against the corporation and its directors for the recovery of their money, and obtained judgment accordingly. No evidence was introduced to show, however, that two of the directors sought to be held liable, one of whom was Mrs. R. E. Hansard, the wife of J. L. Hansard, the manager of the corporation, had any actual knowledge of the illegal use of the intrusted money; and mainly upon that ground those two directors appealed, Mrs. Hansard contending that, in the absence of evidence showing actual knowledge of the illegal use of the intrusted funds, she was not personally liable for the misappropriation of any part thereof. This contention was held to be without merit, the court saying: "It is true that no directors' meetings were shown ever to have been held, and no evidence was introduced showing that actual knowledge was brought home to director R. E. Hansard of the condition of the affairs of the company, or its conduct with respect to the money of plaintiff and his assignors. On the other hand, this appellant did not testify or offer any proof showing that she had no such knowledge, or that she could not have obtained it by the exercise of ordinary diligence as a director of the company. Where the business of receiving deposits by a corporation is so general as it was with the corporation defendant herein, it must be presumed that the directors had full knowledge of the manner in which such moneys were kept or used; and unless a showing is made of some excuse, such as a protest offered by the director not consenting to the misappropriation and of steps taken by such director to prevent loss from accruing to the depositors, such director becomes personally liable to the persons damaged."

It seems clear, therefore, that under the foregoing doctrine plaintiffs in the present case were entitled to show, if they could, that it was the general business practice of said corporation to receive deposits from its numerous clients and to issue these interim certificates therefor; because, as held in that case, proof of such fact would have been legally sufficient to charge all of the directors as a matter of law with knowledge of the manner in which said deposits were being kept and disposed of, and consequently legally sufficient, in the absence of explanatory evidence showing individual effort on their part to safeguard and prevent the loss of such deposits, to establish against them prima facie liability for the misappropriation of such deposits to the use and benefit of the corporation by the officers thereof. No such explanatory evidence was introduced on behalf of Dunscomb and Marston, the former not having testified in the case, and, as stated, Marston having died before the action was begun. The rulings excluding plaintiffs' evidence were therefore prejudicial.

In justification of the exclusion of such evidence, the respondent defendants contend that, by the weight of outside authority, while a director may be held liable to a creditor for loss sustained as a result of the director's misfeasance or malfeasance, he cannot be held liable in the absence of express enactment for mere nonfeasance, such as inaction, inattention, or indifference to the duties of his office; in other words, that proof of affirmative acts violative of some right of the party suffering the loss or injury is essential to such liability. But the facts of the cases declaring such rule differ materially from those presented here and in the Vujacich Case, and therefore, in our opinion the principle adhered to in those cases is not applicable here. Many of those cases involved liability of directors for loss of corporate funds, as distinguished from intrusted funds; and, as we have seen, such rule of liability has been greatly enlarged in this state in cases where the loss occurs through misappropriation or embezzlement of corporate funds, by the adoption of the rule of liability embodied in section 3 of article 12 of said Constitution, the decisions of this state having repeatedly held that in such cases the directors are severally and personally liable "whether individually culpable or not." Fox v. Hale & Norcross Silver Mining Co., supra; Dean v. Shingle, supra. Some of the other cases cited deal with the liability of directors of insolvent banks which received deposits after the bank had apparently become insolvent; consequently those cases do not involve the relationship of bailor and bailee. Others involve only the question of the individual liability of directors for personal injuries resulting from the negligent manner in which the corporation operated its business. True, one case, Cohen v. Maus, 297 Pa. 454, 147 A. 103, dealt with the question of the personal liability of directors for the conversion by the officers of the corporation of plaintiffs' goods which he had left temporarily in the possession of the corporation, after having purchased and paid for the same. But, as will be noted, only a single bailment was there involved, there being no claim made as here and in the Vujacich Case, supra, that the corporation was engaged in the general practice of retaining possession of goods, which obviously is the essential element in charging directors with constructive knowledge of the manner in which the subject-matter of the bailments are being kept and disposed of. On the other hand, we have the case of Frontier Milling, etc., Co. v. Roy White Co-op. Mercantile Co., 25 Idaho, 478, 138 Pac. 825, which would seem to be not only similar in principle to the case at bar and to the Vujacich Case, but which fully sustains the legal doctrine declared in the Vujacich Case. There the corporation issued warehouse receipts to its numerous customers for grain stored with the corporation, and which was afterwards appropriated by the officers of the corporation to its use; and it was held in effect that under such circumstances the directors were presumed to know the relationship existing between the corporation and its customers, and that, if by the exercise of reasonable diligence and care on their part they could and would have known that the grain was being unlawfully diverted and embezzled by their own officers, they were personally liable for the loss sustained (citing cases). In the case at bar it was alleged in substance in the second cause of action that between December 30, 1925, and April 10, 1926, Cornwall and Huey "then and there well knowing that the sum of $13,000 * * * had been entrusted to said corporation for the purpose above stated, used said sum of $13,000 to pay debts of the corporation owing to persons other than plaintiffs, and thereby embezzled and misappropriated said sum of $13,000"; also that the defendants Huey, Cornwall, and Munro knew that the bonds mentioned in said receipt had not been purchased, and that the said sum of $13,000 had been misappropriated and embezzled by the defendants Cornwall and Huey; and that, by the exercise of reasonable care, Dunscomb and Marston "could and would each have discovered prior to April 10, 1926, all of said matters and things of which the defendants M. A. Huey, Neill C. Cornwall, Niel E. Munro, had knowledge. * * *" The foregoing allegations were legally sufficient, in our opinion, to bring the case within the rule of the Vujacich and Idaho cases, and therefore warranted the introduction of the excluded evidence.

[3] The respondent Dunscomb pleaded in bar of the action a release from the trustee in bankruptcy to the effect that, in consideration of the payment by Dunscomb to the trustee of the sum of $10,000, the trustee released Dunscomb "of any and all liability * * * to the estate of said bankrupt resulting from the directors * * * and of all claim or claims that the trustee in bankruptcy as such could make or assert against the said Chas. E. Dunscomb." The trial court found that said release had been given, but stated no conclusion as to its legal effect. However, it is evident that it can have no effect upon the merits of the present action, for the reason that it relates entirely to the liability of a director of a defunct corporation arising under the Federal Bankruptcy Law (11 USCA) which is entirely foreign to the liability here-in sued upon.

The judgment is reversed.

1. Automobiles ⇨181(2).

Phrase "without giving compensation therefor," in statute respecting motorist's liability to guest, indicates intention not to limit compensation to person specifically paying for transportation in cash or equivalent (St. 1923, p. 517, § 141¾, as added by St. 1929, p. 1580).

California Vehicle Act, St. 1923, p. 517, § 141¾, as added by St. 1929, p. 1580, defines "guest" as person who accepts ride in any vehicle without giving compensation therefor. "Compensation" means that which constitutes or is regarded as an equivalent or recompense; that which makes good the lack or variation of something else; that which compensates for loss or privation; amends; remuneration; recompense.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Compensation," see Words and Phrases.]

2. Automobiles ⇨181(2).

"Guest," within statute respecting motorist's liability, is one who accepts driver's hospitality and takes ride for his pleasure or business, without making any return or conferring any benefit upon driver (St. 1923, p. 517, § 141¾, as added by St. 1929, p. 1580).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Guest," see Words and Phrases.]

3. Automobiles ⇨181(2).

Prospective buyer of automobile accepting ride to test fitness is not "guest" within statute respecting motorist's liability to guest (St. 1923, p. 517, § 141¾, as added by St. 1929, p. 1580).

BARNARD, J.

This is an action for damages on account of injuries received by plaintiff Mary W. Crawford on September 28, 1929, while riding in an automobile which was being demonstrated to the plaintiffs by defendant Martens, as the agent of defendant Foster. Foster was in the business of selling Essex automobiles in Ontario, Cal., and Martens was one of his salesmen. On September 27, 1929, plaintiff C. H. Crawford called at the defendants' place of business and manifested an interest in the purchase of an automobile. He told Martens that he would not buy a car unless his wife was satisfied. There was evidence that the two plaintiffs proposed to buy a car together, with funds of which they were equal owners. By arrangement, Martens called at their home on the following day and took both plaintiffs out for a demonstration, during which he drove the car across a dip in the pavement in such a manner that Mrs. Crawford was thrown from her seat and suffered the injuries complained of. The complaint sets up two causes of action, the first being predicated upon negligence. It is alleged that in the sale of Essex automobiles it is necessary to demonstrate such automobiles to prospective purchasers; that the plaintiffs were prospective purchasers of the car then being demonstrated to them by the defendant Martens; and that the vehicle was negligently operated during the actual demonstration thereof to the plaintiffs. A second cause of action is based upon gross negligence. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs upon the first cause of action, and in answer to special interrogatories submitted to it, found that the plaintiff Mary W. Crawford was a prospective purchaser of the automobile, and that the defendant Frank M. Martens was not guilty of gross negligence in driving the car in question. In the instructions of the court the jury was told that "it was the duty of the defendants, if they were demonstrating, by the said Frank M. Martens, the said automobile to the plaintiffs as prospective purchasers thereof, to have used ordinary care, caution and prudence."

[1-3] The defendants have appealed from the judgment which followed, the only question raised being whether Mary W. Crawford was a guest within the meaning of section 141¾ of the California Vehicle Act, which became effective August 14, 1929. The pertinent part of this section reads as follows:

"Any person who as a guest accepts a ride in any vehicle, moving upon any of the public highways of the State of California, and while so riding as such guest receives or sustains an injury, shall have no right of recovery against the owner or driver or person responsible for the operation of such vehicle.
* * *

"Nothing in this section contained shall be construed as relieving the owner or driver or person responsible for the operation of a vehicle from liability for injury to or death of such guest proximately resulting from the intoxication, wilful misconduct, or gross negligence of such owner, driver or person responsible for the operation of such vehicle; provided, that in any action for death or for injury or damage to person or property by or on behalf of a guest or the estate, heirs or legal representatives of such guest, the burden shall be upon plaintiff to establish that such intoxication, wilful misconduct or gross negligence was the proximate cause of such death or injury or damage.

"For the purpose of this section the term 'guest' is hereby defined as being a person who accepts a ride in any vehicle without giving compensation therefor." St. 1929, p. 1580.

Appellants argue that the Legislature having thus defined the word "guest," the definition is binding upon the courts, citing In re Monrovia Evening Post, 199 Cal. 263, 248 P. 1017. And, further, that the language used must be strictly applied even though it appear probable that a different object was in the mind of the legislature, citing City of Eureka v. Diaz, 89 Cal. 467, 26 P. 961. While these rules apply when the language of an act is plain and unambiguous, it is often necessary, in ascertaining the intent of the legislature, not only to examine the language used, but to look further, if doubt or uncertainty still exists. In this case, while an attempt is made, in the final paragraph of the act, to define the word "guest" as therein used, in deciding whether Mrs. Crawford came within that definition, we must determine what is meant by accepting a ride without giving compensation therefor. The language used leaves a doubt as to what sort of compensation is intended. Appellants argue that to give compensation implies a transfer, a bestowal, or a parting with some thing. In effect, their view would define a guest as one who accepts a ride without actually handing over some definite payment therefor. To thus assume that the recompense or compensation contemplated by the act is the payment of a cash fare or its equivalent appears to us to place altogether too narrow a construction upon the words used. Webster's New International Dictionary defines "compensation" as follows: "That which constitutes, or is regarded as an equivalent or recompense; that which makes good the lack or variation of something else; that which compensates for loss or privation; amends; remuneration, recompense." Automobile dealers and salesmen are not only willing but anxious to exchange their time and the use of a car for the time and attention of a person who is in the market for such a car. There can be no question that in actual business the one is regarded as an equivalent or recompense for the other. It will be noted that the definition in the statute does not say "without paying therefor," but rather says "without giving compensation therefor." This indicates an intention not to limit the same to a person definitely and specifically paying for his transportation in cash or its equivalent, but to include in its scope a person who gives such recompense for the ride as may be regarded as a compensation therefor; that is, a return which may make it worth the other's while to furnish the ride. The value of advertising is measured by the prospects secured. The giving of an opportunity to make an actual demonstration of the goods, by such a prospect, is equally worth while to a dealer. In Searcy v. Grow, 15 Cal. 118, the word "compensation" is defined as "that return which is given for something else; in other words, a consideration." A consideration may be any benefit conferred or any prejudice suffered. Civ. Code, § 1605. The taking of a demonstration of an automobile, with its accompanying possibilities of profit, would not only seem to be a benefit to the dealer, but a return fully proportionate to any benefit conferred on the prospect. We think the meaning of the language used is that a guest is one who is invited, either directly or by implication, to enjoy the hospitality of a driver of a car; who accepts such hospitality; and who takes a ride either for his own pleasure or on his own business, without making any return to or conferring any benefit upon the driver of the car, other than the mere pleasure of his company. And, further, that one who is looking at an automobile with a view of purchasing the same, and who accepts a ride therein as a part of the examination thereof, solely to test its fitness for his use, is not accepting a ride as a matter of hospitality, but is rendering value received for his transportation. Such a person is no more a guest of the dealer than is one who examines and tests goods offered for sale in a store, but the one is just as much a customer as the other.

The relationship between the parties here is not entirely dissimilar to that existing between the owner of a store and a customer using an elevator therein. In such a case, the Supreme Court has said:

"Naturally this facility of transportation would increase its patronage and necessarily its profits in business. In fixing the price at which its goods and merchandise must be sold so as to return a profit, necessarily the operating expenses of the establishment, including this elevator service, must be taken into consideration and provided for. The prices charged and paid by customers for goods would include a reimbursement to appellant for its expenses entailed in the operation of the elevator for its patrons, and hence would constitute a sufficient reward for their carriage, so as to bring appellant within the category of a carrier of passengers for hire and subject to the same duties and responsibilities." Champagne v. Hamburger, 169 Cal. 683, 147 P. 954, 958.

The indirect benefit to the merchant is in that case held to be compensation for a ride in an elevator. A similar benefit appears in the instant case, which we think must be held to be a compensation, given and received, for the ride in question. While the respondents may not have been passengers for hire, having given compensation for the ride, they were not guests.

While there are exceptions, notably in the case of persons staying at a hotel, in its ordinary use the word "guest" connotes something other than a business transaction. The taking of a prospective purchaser out to ride in a car for the purpose of demonstrating its good qualities is a usual and ordinary incident in the automobile business. While the question now before us has not heretofore been passed upon in this state, the general situation of an automobile being demonstrated to a prospective purchaser by a dealer is not new. It is significant that in such cases heretofore, the prospective purchaser, when referred to, has usually, if not always been designated as a passenger, or a buyer, rather than as a guest. We feel that this designation has not been accidental. The words "passenger" or "buyer," as used in such cases, better convey the meaning intended than would the word "guest," because such a demonstration partakes more of the nature of a contractual relationship than of the entertainment of an invited guest, or the conferring of a favor by a host, with no hope of return and no profit in view. It is not undertaken by the dealer as an act of hospitality, or a favor, but as a real and vital part of his business, with an eye to his own profit. It is participated in by the customer, not as a means of obtaining free transportation, but as an integral part of a business transaction. It may be considered as a distinct benefit to the dealer.

In Massachusetts, although they have no statute similar to the one here in question, the rule has been established that where an invited guest is riding in a machine with the owner thereof, he cannot recover for injuries sustained, unless the owner and driver of the car was guilty of gross negligence. Mas-saletti v. Fitzroy, 228 Mass. 487, 118 N. E. 168, L. R. A. 1918C. 264. Ann. Cas. 1918B, 1088; West v. Poor, 196 Mass. 183, 81 N. E. 960, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 936, 124 Am. St. Rep. 541. But in applying the rule, the courts of that state have distinguished between cases where one is a mere guest of another and has been permitted to ride gratuitously, and cases where one, in riding, is conferring some benefit upon the driver of the car. Lyttle v. Monto, 248 Mass. 340, 142 N. E. 795; Jackson v. Queen, 257 Mass. 515, 154 N. E. 78; Labatte v. Lavallee, 258 Mass. 527, 155 N. E. 433; Loftus v. Pelletier, 223 Mass. 63, 111 N. E. 712. Not only is such a distinction a logical one, but that it was intended by the statute here in question is indicated by the use of such broad words as "giving compensation," instead of words limiting the meaning to the payment of a fare, or the transfer of a definite consideration.

[4] It has been held that the terms of a statute should be construed with their intent and purpose in view. Evans v. Selma Union High School Dist., 193 Cal. 54, 222 P. 801, 31 A. L. R. 1121. The purpose and object that the Legislature had in mind sometimes throws light upon the meaning of the language used. The situation that this section was apparently designed to prevent is well known. As the use of automobiles became almost universal, the proverbial ingratitude of the dog that bites the hand that feeds him, found a counterpart in the many cases that arose, where generous drivers, having offered rides to guests, later found themselves defendants in cases that often turned upon close questions of negligence. Undoubtedly, the Legislature, in adopting this act, reflected a certain natural feeling as to the injustice of such a situation. Neither this feeling nor the reasons therefor apply to a situation arising out of an ordinary business transaction, such as the efforts of a dealer to sell an automobile to a customer. Doubtless, the Legislature intended to change the rule heretofore adopted in this state, that a mere invited guest could recover for simple negligence, and to provide that such a person could not recover in the absence of a showing of gross negligence. However, we think the language used in this section has no application to a case where a dealer is anxious to demonstrate his goods to a prospective purchaser in the hope of making a sale; where the expense of making the demonstration trip is a usual and not inconsiderable part of the overhead expense of the business; where this expense may be presumed to be paid out of the returns from the business; and where a real benefit and advantage accrues to the dealer, in the opportunity to make a sale and profit thereby. In such a case, whether a particular trip results in a sale or not, the prospective customer is giving such compensation as removes him from the status of a "guest," within the meaning of the act we have been considering.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Civ. 159.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.
Dec. 3, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 2, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 29, 1931.

1. Negligence ⇨136(9).

Contributory negligence is question of law only when reasonable men can draw but one inference, that plaintiffs' negligence proximately contributed to injury.

2. Automobiles ⇨245(80).

Driver, swinging to left when meeting truck starting to make left turn held not guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law (St. 1923, p. 557, § 123).

St. 1923, p. 557, § 123, provides that in crossing intersections driver must keep vehicle on right half of highway unless obstructed or impassable. Plaintiffs' automobile and defendant's truck were meeting. Evidence showed truck driver signaled for and started to make left turn, but thinking plaintiff was not yielding right of way swung back to right, and that plaintiff who had already swung to the left to yield right of way, turned still further to the left in effort to avoid the collision.

3. Trial ⇨296(9).

Instruction as to truck driver's duty to make left turn after signaling held not erroneous in connection with other instructions (Const. art. 6, § 19).

Instruction given, and claimed to violate Const. art. 6, § 19, told jury that when driver gave signal for turn in given direction, other operators had right to assume he would turn in that direction, and that it was negligence for him to turn in any other direction without signaling such intended change of direction. Court also charged that if truck driver, after giving signal, continued on straight course on his own right-hand portion of highway because continuation of turn would make collision imminent, it was his duty to forego making left turn.

4. Automobiles ⇨246(58).

Instructions as to last clear chance in automobile collision held warranted by the evidence.

5. Appeal and error ⇨216(2).

Instructions as to last clear chance in collision between truck and automobile, though not as full as they might have been, held without prejudice when no further instructions were requested.

The instructions given told jury that if they believed from the evidence that plaintiffs were negligent in passing to left hand side of road at time of collision between their automobile and defendant's truck, and by so doing placed themselves in a position of peril, and that defendant saw and knew that plaintiffs were in such position of peril but could by the exercise of ordinary care have avoided the injury complained of, defendants were liable, and that if they believed from the evidence that plaintiffs negligently placed themselves in position of peril which was known to defendant and that defendant could have by the exercise of reasonable or ordinary care avoided the accident or collision, but failed to exercise such reasonable or ordinary care, and that such failure was the proximate and efficient cause of the accident, such conduct was negligence and defendant would be liable.

6. Automobiles ⇨246(58).

Instruction on hypothesis that imminent peril of plaintiffs just before automobile collision was caused by defendant's negligence held warranted by the evidence.

CARY, P. J.

The plaintiffs, husband and wife, brought this action against defendants to recover for injuries received in a collision between plaintiffs' automobile and defendants' truck. A jury returned a verdict against defendant Vernon P. Hunt, and from the resulting judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

Defendants contend as ground for reversal: (1) That plaintiffs' recovery is barred by their contributory negligence, and (2) that certain errors in instructions were prejudicial.

The facts follow. The accident took place on the outskirts of the city of San Bernardino. Tippecanoe avenue runs north and south. Mission boulevard enters Tippecanoe avenue at right angles from the east and there ends. The collision occurred at the intersection thus formed. Plaintiffs' roadster, north bound, and defendants' truck, south bound, both on Tippecanoe avenue, were approaching this intersection at approximately the same time. As the defendants' truck arrived at a point some 200 feet north of the center of the intersection, its driver signaled for a left turn, which would have taken the truck east into Mission boulevard. At this moment plaintiffs' car was an equal distance south of the center of the intersection and both vehicles were on their own right half of the pavement and were proceeding at a speed somewhere between 12 and 20 miles per hour. There are no traffic warts or buttons at this intersection, nor are there any markings indicating the course to be traveled in turning from Tippecanoe avenue into Mission boulevard. When the truck had reached a point 75 feet north of the center of the intersection, the truck driver repeated his signal and started to make the turn. In doing so he did not proceed past the center of the intersection as required by the California Vehicle Act, but cut the corner, hugging the east side of the curve from Tippecanoe avenue into Mission boulevard. At the same moment plaintiffs' automobile, then approximately the same distance south of the center of the intersection, turned slightly to its left intending to yield the right of way to the truck and allow it to complete its turn. The truck driver, apparently believing that plaintiffs were going to continue their course straight north and thus render the completion of the truck's turn into Mission boulevard impossible, suddenly abandoned his turn, swinging his truck to his right and wobbling uncertainly from side to side, headed back to his right or westerly side of Tippecanoe avenue. Plaintiffs, seeing the truck headed, as they thought, straight for them, veered still further to their left or westerly side of the road in an unsuccessful endeavor to avert a collision. The defendants' truck headed southwest and the plaintiffs' automobile headed northwest crashed at the westerly edge of the intersection.

[1, 2] The defendants argue that plaintiffs were guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law because they turned to their left of the road, thereby violating section 123 of the California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 557), which provides that in crossing intersections a driver must keep his vehicle on the right half of the highway unless such right half is obstructed or impassable, and defendants cite the rule that where the violation of a statute by plaintiff contributes proximately to the accident it constitutes negligence per se and will bar a recovery. But contributory negligence is a question of law only when from the facts reasonable men can draw but one inference—that the negligence of the plaintiffs proximately contributed to their injuries. In all other cases the question is one of fact for the jury. Flores v. Fitzgerald, 204 Cal. 374, 376, 268 P. 369. We have read in full the testimony and feel that it is far from presenting a situation so clear that but one inference—that the negligence of the plaintiffs contributed proximately to the accident—could be drawn therefrom. We therefore hold this point to be without merit.

[3] Instruction No. 14, given at plaintiffs' request, is as follows: "You are instructed that when the driver of an automobile upon a public highway has given a signal indicating that he intends to turn in a given direction, other operators of vehicles upon the highway have a right to assume that such driver so giving such signal will turn in the direction indicated by such signal, and it is negligence for the driver of a vehicle so giving such signal to turn or travel in any other direction than that indicated by the signal, without first indicating or signaling such intended change of direction."

Defendants contend that by this the court, in violation of the constitutional inhibition (Const. art. 6, § 19), told the jury that the defendants were guilty of negligence as a matter of law regardless of the apparent danger which may have confronted the driver of the truck and regardless of anything he may have done. They argue that many situations might arise where, when he sees that some other vehicle does not intend to heed his signal, a truck driver might suddenly be compelled to change his course without having time to give another signal. If we view this instruction by itself, the criticism is well founded, but instructions must be construed as a whole. By defendants' instruction No. 30, given by the court, the jury were told that if after giving the signal for a left turn the truck driver continued on a straight course on his own right-hand portion of the highway because he saw that plaintiffs' car and his own truck were in such proximity that a continuation of his turn would make a collision imminent, it was the truck driver's duty to forego making his left turn. When the two instructions are construed together we are of the opinion that the effect of the second was to render any error in the first without prejudice.

[4, 5] Instructions numbered 22 and 23, given at plaintiffs' request, are as follows:

No. 22. "You are instructed that if you believe from the evidence that the plaintiffs were negligent in passing to the left-hand side of the road at the time of the collision involved herein, and by so doing placed themselves in a position of peril, and that the defendant saw and knew that the plaintiffs were in such position of peril, but could by the exercise of ordinary care have avoided the injuries complained of, the defendants in this case are liable."

No. 23. "If you believe from the evidence that the plaintiffs negligently placed themselves in a position of peril, which was known to the defendant, and that said defendant could have, by the exercise of reasonable or ordinary care, avoided the accident or collision but failed to exercise such reasonable or ordinary care, and that such failure on the part of such defendant to use reasonable or ordinary care was the proximate and efficient cause of the accident, such conduct of the defendant, if you so find, is negligence and the defendants would be liable for the damages suffered as a result thereof."

Defendants contend that these instructions neither severally nor collectively state the law with reference to the doctrine of last clear chance, in that they omit two necessary elements: (1) That as the result of the plaintiffs' negligence plaintiffs were in a situation of danger from which they could not escape by the exercise of ordinary care, and (2) that the truck driver realized, or ought to have realized, plaintiffs' inability to escape therefrom, citing Darling v. Pacific Electric Railway, 197 Cal. 702, 707, 242 P. 703. It is contended further that there was no evidence which would warrant the court in giving any instruction on the doctrine of last clear chance. We are of the opinion that there was sufficient evidence to warrant the submission of this question to the jury. While the instructions could very properly have been amplified by the inclusion of the elements specified, yet whether as they stand they require a reversal of the case is another matter. In Townsend v. Butterfield, 168 Cal. 564, 567-569, 143 P. 760, an instruction stating the last clear chance doctrine in a most abbreviated form was held not prejudicial, the court stating that had appellant desired a more full and elaborate instruction on the subject it was his duty to have requested it and not having done so he could not be heard to complain. This case has been followed in Galwey v. Pacific Auto Stages, Inc., 96 Cal. App. 169, 177, 273 P. 866; Kroll v. Rasin, 96 Cal. App. 84, 89, 273 P. 820; Rogers v. Interstate Transit Co. (Cal. Sup.) 290 P. 571; and Wirthman v. Isenstein, 182 Cal. 108, 110, 111, 187 P. 12. In the case at bar defendants made no request for any instruction on the subject. Under the authorities above cited the fact that the instructions were not as full and elaborate on this point as they might have been must be held to be without prejudice.

[6] Instruction No. 24, given at plaintiffs' request, is as follows: "If the evidence convinces you that the plaintiffs found themselves placed in sudden peril by or through the negligence of the defendant, their conduct under such circumstances is to be judged in view of the circumstances and surroundings and not by the standard applicable to one not conscious of being in danger. The plaintiffs under such circumstances, if you so find, were required to use ordinary care to protect themselves, which was the care an ordinary prudent person would use under the same or similar circumstances, considering the danger, proximity of the truck, its speed and movement, plaintiffs' position on the highway, and all the other facts and circumstances proved to have existed or occurred at the time of the accident. It must be remembered that a person in great peril, when action is necessary to avoid it, is not required to exercise that presence of mind and carefulness which are justly required of a careful and prudent man under ordinary circumstances."

Defendants object to this instruction, arguing that under the uncontroverted evidence the plaintiffs placed themselves in a position of peril, and that, since the imminent peril rule may be invoked only by one who is himself without fault (Vedder v. Bireley, 92 Cal. App. 52, 60, 61, 267 P. 724), plaintiffs may not take advantage of the rule. But under the evidence the question of whether plaintiffs placed themselves in a position of peril, or whether the truck driver's change of course after starting his turn had created such situation, was, as we have held above, a question of fact and not of law.

Defendants finally contend that the instructions taken as a whole are so contradictory and conflicting as to necessitate a reversal. We have carefully examined the instructions and do not find them open to the criticism urged. In this connection, however, it appears that, with a single exception, every instruction offered by either party was given—32 by plaintiffs and 34 by defendants. They were apparently given grouped just as respective counsel had offered them, all of plaintiffs' being first, followed by all of defendants'. While we are aware that this is a common practice, it would tend to render instructions more easy of comprehension if, instead of giving the instructions in two distinct groups as respectively tendered by the parties litigant, the court would first segregate from each group the instructions bearing on the same subject and then after eliminating those which are but repetition give them grouped according to their subject matter and in sequence. We believe that by this means the court's instructions which at best are difficult for a jury to grasp would be the more readily comprehended.

The judgment is affirmed.

In action for breach of marriage promise in which state of plaintiff's feelings was shown, question whether there was "anything to drink there that night" held improper on redirect examination.

5. Appeal and error ⇨882(10).

Defendant could not complain of exclusion of testimony where court merely suggested testimony was immaterial, stating, however, that defendant might proceed, whereupon counsel withdrew question.

6. Breach of marriage promise ⇨18.

Where defendant, sued for breach of marriage promise, relies on plaintiff's unchastity, it must be specially pleaded (Civ. Code, § 62).

7. Breach of marriage promise ⇨22.

Defendant sued for breach of marriage promise may prove plaintiff's bad character for chastity as bearing on question of damages by showing particular acts previous to as well as during engagement.

8. Appeal and error ⇨1056(1).

In action for breach of marriage promise, exclusion of testimony respecting plain-tiff's conduct on occasion when referring to separation she declared "she didn't care" held not prejudicial.

9. Breach of marriage promise ⇨27.

Jury may consider defendant's wealth in estimating damages for breach of marriage promise.

10. Trial ⇨62(3).

Rejection of testimony in rebuttal respecting defendant's financial condition held abuse of discretion, in action for breach of marriage promise (Code Civ. Proc. § 2050).

11. Appeal and error ⇨971(3).

Witnesses ⇨267.

Court has discretionary power over cross-examination, which will not be disturbed unless discretion was abused.

12. Witnesses ⇨268(16).

In action for breach of marriage promise, exclusion of cross-examination whether witness knew any reason for plaintiff being introduced as defendant's wife held not abuse of discretion.

13. Trial ⇨236(2).

Charge respecting testimony of witnesses who had willfully sworn falsely to material point held proper (Code Civ. Proc. § 2061).

The jury was charged substantially in the language of Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, and the court further explained that the section had reference to witnesses willfully false. The court also stated in effect that while witness willfully false in part should be distrusted as to all testimony, weight to be given part not willfully false was question for jury's determination.

14. Breach of marriage promise ⇨35.

In action for breach of marriage promise, instruction respecting plaintiff's services as housewife held not misleading.

The court instructed that testimony showing parties had lived together for some years, and that plaintiff performed services usually rendered by housewife, was admitted only as evidence on question whether there was promise of marriage, and further that plaintiff was not entitled to recover on any ground other than breach of alleged promise.

15. Damages ⇨151.

Exemplary damages need not be demanded by that name in complaint, but facts justifying recovery thereof must be pleaded (Civ. Code, § 3294).

16. Breach of marriage promise ☞30.

To authorize exemplary damages for breach of marriage promise, something more than mere refusal without sufficient excuse to perform contract must be shown (Civ. Code, § 3294).

17. Breach of marriage promise ☞35.

Instruction on exemplary damages held improper under pleading and evidence in action for breach of marriage promise (Civ. Code, § 3294).

18. Breach of marriage promise ☞18.

Plaintiff's want of chastity not being pleaded as defense in action for breach of marriage promise, evidence thereof could be considered only in mitigation of damages.

19. Appeal and error ☞1031(1).

Injury is not presumed from errors of law (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by Alexandria Belm against Jesse Patrick, also known as J. Patriceo, etc. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Reversed.

Joseph A. Brown, of San Francisco, for appellant.

William M. Malone, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

This action was brought by plaintiff, Alexandria Belm, against the defendant, Jesse Patrick, for damages for an alleged breach of promise to marry.

The complaint averred that on November 15, 1927, the parties agreed to marry, and that the promise was repeated on several occasions, the last promise being on February 25, 1928. It was charged that defendant breached the contract on August 3, 1928, by marrying another person. A trial by jury was had and a verdict rendered in favor of the plaintiff for $2,500. Following a motion for a new trial, which was denied, the defendant appealed from the judgment. As grounds therefor it is contended that the trial court erred in its rulings upon the admissibility of certain evidence and in its instructions to the jury.

The parties—both of whom were married at the time—commenced to live together in 1921. The plaintiff was then a waitress in a dance hall near the water front in San Francisco, and the defendant conducted an establishment in the same neighborhood, where, according to his testimony, soft drinks were sold. Shortly after their relations commenced the defendant procured a divorce from his wife, and in 1926 the plaintiff was divorced from her husband, the expense incurred being paid by the defendant. The parties continued to live together until June 28, 1928, when they separated.

[1] The defendant was called as a witness under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure; and it appeared from his testimony that the parties while living together had on one occasion visited Yosemite Valley. He was asked if he was not told by the plaintiff on this occasion that she had registered at the hotel as his wife. An objection to the question was overruled, and the ruling is assigned as error. This fact was relevant, and the question was proper on cross-examination.

[2, 3] On the cross-examination of the plaintiff she was asked whether she did not at one time live with one Silva as his wife. An objection thereto was sustained, and this is also assigned as error. Later, in response to a similar question by defendant, she testified that she had never lived with Silva. Any error in the ruling complained of was cured by this testimony. She was also asked whether Silva shortly before the alleged breach of promise gave her a pair of earrings. An objection to this question was also sustained. While the question was proper on cross-examination, the fact was not sufficiently material to make its rejection prejudicial error.

[4] Another witness called by the defendant testified on cross-examination to the state of plaintiff's feelings after she and the defendant had separated. This testimony tended to prove that the breach caused her mental suffering. Defendant's counsel then asked the following question: "Was there anything to drink there that night?" To which an objection was sustained. The question was improper on redirect examination and the ruling was correct.

[5] The defendant further complains that he was not permitted to testify in rebuttal that, contrary to plaintiff's claim, he never had sexual intercourse with her. There is no merit in this contention, as the court merely suggested that the testimony was immaterial, stating, however, that the defendant might proceed, but his counsel thereupon withdrew the question.

[6, 7] Defendant also sought to show by the testimony of a witness that the latter had sexual intercourse with the plaintiff in 1919. An objection thereto was sustained on the ground that the offered testimony was not relevant to the issues. Defendant by his answer merely denied the promise to marry and the damage alleged. While neither party is bound by a promise made in ignorance of the other's want of personal chastity, and either is relieved therefrom by unchaste conduct on the part of the other unless both participate therein (Civ. Code, § 62), it is nevertheless the rule that where a defendant relies upon the plaintiff's unchastity it must be specially pleaded (Reed v. Clark, 47 Cal. 194; Bowman v. Bowman, 153 Ind. 498, 55 N. E. 422; Herriman v. Layman, 118 Iowa, 590, 92 N. W. 710; Bracken v. Dinning, 141 Ky. 265, 132 S. W. 425; Cox v. Edwards, 120 Minn. 512, 139 N. W. 1070; Kniffen v. McConnell, 30 N. Y. 285); nevertheless a defendant may prove the bad character of plaintiff for chastity as bearing on the question of damages (Cox v. Edwards, supra; Gerlinger v. Frank, 74 Or. 517, 145 P. 1069), and this may be shown by particular acts of unchastity (Wigmore on Evidence, § 213; Sheahan v. Barry, 27 Mich. 217, 221; Stratton v. Dole, 45 Neb. 472, 63 N. W. 875; Gerlinger v. Frank, supra; Burnett v. Simpkins, 24 Ill. 265; Dupont v. McAdow, 6 Mont. 226, 9 P. 925; Albertz v. Albertz, 78 Wis. 72, 47 N. W. 95, 10 L. R. A. 584; Freeman v. Bennett (Tex. Civ. App.) 195 S. W. 238; Houser v. Carmody, 173 Mich. 121, 139 N. W. 9; Carney v. McGilvray, 152 Miss. 87, 119 So. 157, 159; Colburn v. Marble, 196 Mass. 376, 82 N. E. 28, 124 Am. St. Rep. 561), previous to as well as during the continuance of the engagement (9 Cor. Jur., Breach of Marriage Promise, § 77, p. 359, and cases cited).

[8] Another witness for the defendant testified that the plaintiff on one occasion, in referring to the separation, declared that "she didn't care because she had plenty of friends on the water front who would take care of her." He was then asked as to her conduct on this occasion. The witness replied that it was bad, but the court declined to allow counsel to pursue the inquiry, and this is also assigned as error. Her conduct on this occasion would add but little to the force of her declarations, and the rejection of the testimony, though the same had some relevancy, was not prejudicial.

[9] The plaintiff testified to statements by the defendant as to his wealth. It has been held that a jury may consider such evidence in estimating damages. Reed v. Clark, supra.

[10] Plaintiff's testimony in this particular was not denied by the defendant upon his examination in chief. Later his counsel requested permission to recall him, stating, "We wish to place the defendant on the stand again regarding his financial condition." Permission to do so was refused. Section 2050 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that "A witness once examined cannot be re-examined as to the same matter without leave of the court, but he may be re-examined as to any new matter upon which he has been examined by the adverse party. And after the examinations on both sides are once concluded, the witness cannot be recalled without leave of the court. Leave is granted or withheld, in the exercise of a sound discretion." The defendant had not rested his case. Statements as to his financial condition were related in detail by the plaintiff from which it might be concluded that he was worth approximately $50,000; and it is evident from the record that his counsel inadvertently omitted to inquire regarding the matter while the defendant was on the stand. The evidence was material on the question of damages, and it cannot be contended that it would have worked a surprise on the plaintiff. Under the circumstances, we think the court should have allowed the defendant to be recalled, and that its refusal was an abuse of discretion. Barry v. Bennett, 45 Cal. 80.

[11, 12] It was also testified that the defendant on one occasion introduced the plaintiff as his wife. The witness was asked on cross-examination if he knew any reason for her being so introduced. An objection to the question was sustained. Like many other questions asked by defendant's counsel, the materiality of the evidence sought to be elicited is not apparent nor was its purpose suggested to the trial court. While, so far as appears, the question was not improper, the court has discretionary power over cross-examination, which will not be disturbed on appeal unless its discretion has been abused (Grimbley v. Harrold, 125 Cal. 24, 57 P. 558, 73 Am. St. Rep. 19), and we cannot say that in this instance there was an abuse of discretion.

[13] The jury was charged substantially in the language of section 2061 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which has been held to be proper. O'Rourke v. Vennekohl, 104 Cal. 254, 37 P. 930. The court further explained that the section has reference to witnesses willfully false and not to those who from defective memory or understanding may have testified otherwise than according to the facts. The court also stated in effect that while a witness willfully false in part should be distrusted as to all his testimony, the weight to be given to the part not willfully false was a question for their determination. The instruction correctly stated the law. As the court said in White v. Disher, 67 Cal. 402, 403, 7 P. 826, quoting from a previous decision: "The rule is that the jury may reject the whole of the testimony of a witness who has willfully sworn falsely as to a material point; that is to say, the jury, being convinced that a witness has stated what was untrue, not as the result of mistake or inadvertence, but willfully and with a design to deceive, must treat all his testimony with distrust and suspicion, and reject all, unless they shall be convinced, notwithstanding the base character of the witness, that he has in other particulars sworn to the truth." It was for the trial court or the jury to determine to what extent the falsity of a part of the testimony of a witness affects the weight to be given the rest of his testimony (Rolland v. Porterfield, 183 Cal. 466, 191 P. 913), and the rule of rejection does not apply when the witness is innocently mistaken (People v. Strong, 30 Cal. 151; People v. Sprague, 53 Cal. 491).

[14] It was testified that the parties lived together for some years and that the plaintiff performed the services usually rendered by a housewife. The court instructed the jury that this testimony was admitted only as evidence upon the question whether there was a promise of marriage, and further that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover on any ground other than the breach of the alleged promise. The defendant criticizes the language of the instruction, claiming that the jury might have concluded therefrom that in case they found for the plaintiff it would be proper to make an allowance for her services as a housekeeper. The instruction was sufficiently clear and did not in our opinion mislead the jury.

[15-17] The defendant also complains of the following instruction: "Where you find damages must be paid by the defendant, in addition to the actual damages sustained you must consider what is known as exemplary damages, that is, damage to be awarded over and above those actually suffered by the plaintiff by way of punishment to defendant. In the event you find for the plaintiff and come to consider this phase of the matter, do so in the light of all the facts of the case."

Section 3294 of the Civil Code provides that in an action for the breach of an obligation not arising from contract, where the defendant has been guilty of oppression, fraud, or malice, express or implied, the plaintiff, in addition to actual damages, may recover exemplary damages. While exemplary damages need not be demanded by that name in the complaint, it is necessary that the facts justifying a recovery of such damages be pleaded (Moore v. Hopkins, 83 Cal. 270, 274, 23 P. 318, 17 Am. St. Rep. 248; Syfert v. Solomon, 95 Cal. App. 228, 272 P. 810; 17 Cor. Jur., Damages, § 309, p. 1005); and in actions for a breach of a marriage promise something more than a mere refusal without sufficient excuse to perform the contract must be shown in order to authorize such an award (Goddard

v. Westcott, 82 Mich. 180, 46 N. W. 242; Baumle v. Verde, 33 Okl. 243, 124 P. 1083, 41 L. R. A. [N. S.] 840, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 317; Dupont v. McAdow, supra; Chellis v. Chapman, 125 N. Y. 214, 26 N. E. 308, 11 L. R. A. 784). It has also been held that in the absence of such allegations it was error to award punitive damages though the evidence showed malice and oppression on the part of the defendant. Lorenz v. Hunt, 89 Cal. App. 8, 16, 264 P. 336. In the present case the complaint contains no allegations of fraud or deceit, or that the defendant entered into the engagement with no intention of performing or was actuated by evil motives, nor does the evidence establish any of these facts or more than a refusal without sufficient excuse to perform the contract. Under such circumstances, as was held in Moore v. Hopkins, supra, the instruction was erroneous.

[18] The jury was further instructed as follows: "If you find that a promise of marriage was made in this case and breached, and considering the question of damages, by way of mitigation thereof you can take into account any indelicate and unbecoming conduct, if any has been shown, on the part of the woman the plaintiff." It is claimed that by this instruction the jury was erroneously charged that evidence of plaintiff's conduct was material only on the question of damages. There was no error in the instruction for, as above stated, her want of chastity was not pleaded as a defense to the action, and such evidence could only be considered in mitigation of damages.

[19] Injury is not presumed from errors of law. Vallejo, etc., R. R. Co. v. Reed Orchard Co., 169 Cal. 545, 147 P. 238. It must appear affirmatively after an examination of the entire case, including the evidence, or from the intrinsic nature of the error itself, in order to justify a reversal. Const. art. 6, § 4½. But after examining the evidence, and considering the nature of the case, we are of the opinion that the errors mentioned, namely, the refusal to permit evidence of plaintiff's sexual relations with other men, the rejection of testimony in rebuttal as to defendant's financial condition, and the instruction that the jury might return a verdict for exemplary damages, were prejudicial; that it is reasonably probable that the same materially affected the action of the jury and resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

The judgment is reversed.

ROBB v. CARDOZA (two cases.)SAME v. MULHERN.

Civ. 7331.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California.

Nov. 29, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 29, 1930.

1. Bills and notes ⇨497(2).

Mere want of consideration for note does not operate to place upon holder burden of proving that he or predecessor acquired title as holder in due course (Civ. Code, § 3136).

2. Bills and notes ⇨497(2).

Evidence showing note was without consideration is inadmissible, in absence of evidence showing indorsee was not bona fide transferee for value and without notice (Civ. Code, §§ 3136, 3140).

3. Bills and notes ⇨497(2).

Proof of original want of consideration for note is not sufficient alone to establish defective title or place burden upon plaintiff to prove himself holder in due course (Civ. Code, §§ 3109, 3136, 3140).

4. Appeal and error ⇨931(1).

In determining whether trial court's findings support conclusions or judgment, findings must receive such construction as will uphold rather than defeat judgment.

5. Appeal and error ⇨931(3).

Appellate court in determining whether trial court's findings support conclusions or judgment may from facts found infer ultimate facts in support of judgment.

6. Appeal and error ⇨931(3).

Appellate court cannot infer from findings ultimate facts which would support judgment when such do not necessarily follow from facts found.

7. Bills and notes ⇨539.

Finding of want of consideration for note held not necessarily to warrant conclusion that indorsee was not holder in due course (Civ. Code, § 3133).

8. Bills and notes ⇨337.

To constitute notice of infirmity in note or defect in title, indorsee must have actual knowledge, or knowledge of such facts that action in taking instrument amounted to bad faith.

9. Bills and notes ⇨337.

Mere knowledge of facts sufficient to put prudent man upon inquiry or mere suspicion of infirmity or defect of title will not preclude indorsee of note from occupying position of holder in due course, unless remaining passive amounts to bad faith.

10. Bills and notes ⇨539.

Finding, if made, that notes were procured by fraudulent representations regarding financial condition of payee, would not sustain conclusion that indorsee was not holder in due course (Civ. Code, § 3133).

11. Bills and notes ⇨358.

Indorsee of note as security for pre-existing debt is holder for value in usual course of business (Civ. Code, § 3133).

12. Bills and notes ⇨497(2).

Where indorsee is shown to be holder for value in due course, burden is upon defendant to show indorsee had notice of maker's equities, unless evidence creates presumption that indorsee knew facts.

13. Bills and notes ⇨539.

Findings showing indorsee knew notes were executed for stock in insolvent corporation, and that notes were taken as security for pre-existing debt, held not to warrant conclusion that indorsee was not holder in due course (Civ. Code, § 3133).

Trial court found that makers received no consideration from payee for note; that payee indorsed note to bank as additional and collateral security upon pre-existing indebtedness; that bank at time had full knowledge of fact that notes were given in purchase of shares of capital stock in payee corporation, which had been unable to pay indebtedness to bank; that bank at time of notes held chattel mortgage upon certain chattels owned by payee as security for payment of indebtedness; and that part of chattels mortgaged had disappeared.

Appeals from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Two separate actions by M. Robb against T. J. Cardoza and a third action by M. Robb against W. P. Mulhern, tried together. Judgment for defendants in each case, and plaintiff appeals.

Reversed.

Charles H. Sooy, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Goldman & Nye and Reed M. Clarke, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

The above actions were brought on three promissory notes executed by the respective defendants to Big Creek Ranch Inc., a corporation, and by it indorsed before maturity to the Pacific National Bank of San Francisco. The bank assigned the notes to plaintiff for collection.

As defenses the defendants in each action alleged that the note was given without consideration, and that the bank was not a holder in due course. In two of the actions it was also alleged as a defense that the execution of the note was induced by false representations as to the financial conditions of the payee corporation.

The cases were tried together. The trial court made no finding on the defenses last mentioned, but found in each case that the note was given without consideration, and that the bank was not a holder in due course. In each case the conclusions from the findings were that the bank was not a holder in due course, and that defendant was entitled to judgment. Judgments were entered accordingly, and plaintiff has appealed therefrom. The appeals are presented upon the same transcript and briefs, and it is contended as grounds for the appeals that the findings do not support the conclusions of law or the judgments.

The findings, so far as material, are as follows:

"That said promissory note was executed and delivered by defendant to Big Creek Ranch Inc., a corporation, on the 10th day of November, 1926; that said defendant received no consideration whatsoever from said Big Creek Ranch Inc., and that the said Big Creek Ranch Inc. on or about the 30th day of November, 1926, transferred, endorsed and delivered the said promissory note to said Pacific National Bank of San Francisco as and for additional and collateral security upon an indebtedness by a promissory note then due, owing and unpaid from said Big Creek Ranch Inc. to the said Pacific National Bank of San Francisco; that at the time said Pacific National Bank of San Francisco took said promissory note as such additional and collateral security it had full knowledge of the following facts concerning said note executed by said defendant to said Big Creek Ranch Inc., a corporation, to-wit:

"1. That said note had been made, executed and delivered by defendant to said Big Creek Ranch Inc. for the purchase of certain shares of the capital stock of said Big Creek Ranch Inc., a corporation.

"2. That said Big Creek Ranch Inc., a corporation, was indebted to the said Pacific National Bank of San Francisco in the sum of approximately twenty-seven thousand dollars ($27,000.00).

"3. That said Big Creek Ranch Inc. was not then and for a considerable time prior thereto had not been able to pay the sum then due and owing from it to said Pacific National Bank of San Francisco, to wit, approximately the sum of twenty-seven thousand dollars ($27,000.00), or any portion thereof.

"4. That the said Pacific National Bank of San Francisco had demanded payment of said note from said Big Creek Ranch Inc. on a number of occasions at and subsequent to the due date of said promissory note, but that said Big Creek Ranch Inc. had not been able to pay and had not paid the sum then due and owing, or any portion thereof.

"5. That said Big Creek Ranch Inc. did not have money on hand with which to meet its indebtedness to the said Pacific National Bank of San Francisco.

"6. That the said Pacific National Bank of San Francisco at the time of the delivery to it of said promissory note of the defendant herein held a chattel mortgage upon certain cattle owned by said Big Creek Ranch Inc. as security for the payment to it by said Big Creek Ranch Inc. of said indebtedness, and that upon a count of said cattle shortly theretofore made the number of said cattle was found by said Pacific National Bank of San Francisco to be less than the number of cattle that had theretofore been mortgaged to said Pacific National Bank of San Francisco by said Big Creek Ranch Inc."

The statute provides that every holder is deemed prima facie to be a holder in due course; but when it is shown that the title of any person who has negotiated the instrument is defective, the burden is on the holder to prove that he or some person under whom he claims acquired the title as holder in due course (Civ. Code, § 3140), and that the title of any person who negotiates an instrument is defective when he obtained the instrument or any signature thereto by fraud, duress, force, or fear or other illegal means, or for an illegal consideration (Civ. Code, § 3136). It is also provided that an absence or failure of consideration is a matter of defense against any person not a holder in due course. Civ. Code, § 3109.

[1] The rule appears to be well settled that a mere want of consideration for the instrument does not operate to throw upon the holder the burden of proving that he, or the one under whom he claims, acquired the title as a holder in due course, as section 3136 of the Civil Code, which defines defective title, does not include a want or failure of consideration. 19 Cal. Jur., Neg. Instr., § 177, p. 1042; 8 Cor. Jur., Bills & Notes, § 1294, pp. 987, 988, and cases cited; Page v. Hallam & Co., 212 Ill. App. 462; Wheat v. Goss, 193 Ind. 558, 141 N. E. 311; Bank of Polk v. Wood, 189 Mo. App. 62, 173 S. W. 1093; Title Guarantee

& Trust Co. v. Pam, 232 N. Y. 441, 134 N. E. 525; Cole Banking Co. v. Sinclair, 34 Utah, 454, 98 P. 411, 131 Am. St. Rep. 885.

[2-6] Moreover, it has been held that in such actions evidence that the note was without consideration is inadmissible in the absence of evidence tending to show that a plaintiff indorsee was not a bona fide transferee for value and without notice of the alleged equities of the defendant. Lynch v. Holbrook, 49 Cal. App. 380, 193 P. 505. Consequently, proof of an original want of consideration for the instrument was not sufficient alone to establish that plaintiff's title to the instruments was defective, or to throw upon him the burden of proving that the one under whom he claimed was a holder in due course. And while the findings are to receive such a construction as will uphold rather than defeat the judgment, and from the facts found ultimate facts may be inferred in support of the judgment, it is not within the province of the appellate court to infer from the findings ultimate facts which would support the judgment when such do not necessarily follow from the facts found. Rossini v. St. Paul, etc., Ins. Co., 182 Cal. 415, 188 P. 564; Sargent v. Shumaker, 193 Cal. 122, 131, 223 P. 464; 2 Cal. Jur., Appeal and Error, § 513, p. 876.

[7] That the bank was not a holder in due course within the provisions of section 3133 of the Civil Code does not necessarily follow from the finding that there was a want of consideration for the notes; and under such circumstances, as held in the above cases, the ultimate facts cannot be inferred by this court.

Respondent claims, however, that the remaining findings sufficiently show that the bank was not a holder in due course. These facts are that the bank had knowledge that the notes were executed for the purchase of stock in the Big Creek Ranch, Inc., that this company was insolvent, and that security given the bank for a loan, namely, certain cattle, had disappeared; and, further, that the taking of the notes as collateral security under the circumstances amounted to bad faith.

In support thereof two cases are cited. In Hamilton v. Mihills, 92 Wash. 675, 159 P. 887, 889, a note for its bonds and stock was executed by the defendant to a corporation, and endorsed by the latter to its president as collateral security. The defense was fraud and that the indorsee was not an innocent holder. Judgment was entered for the defendant. The appellate court in passing upon the sufficiency of the evidence to support the finding that the plaintiff was not an innocent holder said: "At the time he took these notes * * * and for some time prior thereto had been, president of the company and in active management of its affairs. He must have known that the only assets of the company were merely options on the limestone land. It is conceded that he knew the note was given for bonds and stock. It cannot be doubted that he knew both bonds and stock were practically valueless."

In Mizell Live Stock Co. v. Sutton, 23 Ga. App. 270, 98 S. E. 102, the note sued upon was given for shares of stock in a corporation and was indorsed to the plaintiff. The stock was sold to the maker of the note by an agent. The Georgia statute provided that all promissory notes given for the purchase of stock in any incorporated company and sold by a traveling salesman or agent should have expressed on its face the consideration therefor. It was held that actual notice to the purchaser of the note that it was given for the purchase of stock in a corporation which was sold by an agent was as effective to put the purchaser of the note upon notice that he was taking it subject to the equities between the original parties as if the consideration had been expressed upon the face of the note.

[8-13] Neither of the above cases supports respondents' contention. Under the law of this state, to constitute notice of an infirmity in a negotiable instrument, or a defect in the title of the person negotiating the same, the person to whom it is negotiated must have actual knowledge of the infirmity or defect, or knowledge of such facts that his action in taking the instrument amounted to bad faith; and mere knowledge of facts sufficient to put a prudent man upon inquiry without actual knowledge, or mere suspicion of an infirmity or defect of title, does not preclude the transferee from occupying the position of a holder in due course, unless the circumstances or suspicions are so cogent and obvious that to remain passive would amount to bad faith. Goodale v. Thorn, 199 Cal. 307, 249 P. 11. While parts of the testimony tended to show that two of the notes were procured by fraudulent representations as to the financial condition of the payee corporation, there was no finding that that was the case; nor would such a finding, if made, have been sufficient alone to sustain the conclusion that the endorsee bank was not an innocent holder. The rule is well settled that the indorsee of a promissory note as security for a pre-existing debt is a holder for value in the usual course of business (Payne v. Bensley, 8 Cal. 260, 68 Am. Dec. 318; Smitton v. McCullough, 182 Cal. 530, 189 P. 686; Hunt v. Glassell, 47 Cal. App. 774, 191 P. 373; Griswold v. Morrison, 53 Cal. App. 93, 200 P. 62; People's State Bank v. Penello, 59 Cal. App. 174, 210 P. 432; Williams v. Walker, 66 Cal. App. 672, 226 P. 939); and, as held in Goodale v. Thorn, supra, and Blochman Commercial, etc., Bank v. Moretti, 177 Cal. 256, 170 P. 419, when these facts are shown, unless the evidence shows that the note was taken under circumstances creating the presumption that the indorsee knew the facts impeaching its validity, the burden is cast upon the defendant to show that the indorsee took with notice of the defendant's equities. The facts which the bank knew were quite similar to those in People's State Bank v. Penello, 67 Cal. App. 103, 227 P. 190, where it was held that the same furnished no sufficient ground for the inference that the bank had knowledge of the fraudulent inception of the notes at the time they were endorsed. And here the facts found furnish no evidence of actual knowledge of the infirmity or defect; nor do they necessarily or even reasonably support the conclusion that the bank's representative was as a prudent man thereby put upon inquiry, or that the acceptance of the note under the circumstances amounted to bad faith.

It is our conclusion that the findings are insufficient to support the conclusions of law or the judgments appealed from. The judgments are, accordingly, reversed.

ELLIS v. McNEESE.

Civ. 4210.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

Nov. 19, 1930.

1. Landlord and tenant ⇨164(1).

In absence of fraud, concealment, or covenant in lease, landlord is not liable for injuries from defective premises.

2. Landlord and tenant ⇨164(6).

To be liable for defective premises, landlord must have knowledge thereof; proof that defect was discoverable with reasonable care being insufficient.

3. Landlord and tenant ⇨162.

Landlord who reserves portion of premises for common use by himself and tenants, or by different tenants, must use ordinary care to keep such portions safe, and is liable to tenant, injured while putting premises to reasonably intended use.

4. Landlord and tenant ⇨169(11).

If landlord reserved stairway for common use of different tenants, and clothesline was attached when leased, it became question of fact whether he should have contemplated probability of tenant's leaning against railing to take clothes from line.

5. Landlord and tenant ⇨164(1).

If lessee, rather than landlord, reserved stairway for common use by sublessees, landlord was not obligated to keep stairway safe, or liable to sublessee injured by defective railing.

6. Appeal and error ⇨1064(2).

Instruction stating rule, and erroneously implying evidence warranted application, was prejudicial.

7. Trial ⇨191(1).

Instruction assuming existence of fact, improperly withheld from jury, held erroneous.

8. Landlord and tenant ⇨164(1).

Where landlord reserved no part of stairway for himself or other tenants, ordinary landlord tenant relationship existed, to which rule of caveat emptor applies.

9. Trial ⇨251(1).

Instruction submitting immaterial issue, impliedly authorizing recovery thereon, held erroneous.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Guerin, Judge.

Action by Walter Ellis against Samuel J. McNeese: Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Reversed.

J. Wiseman Macdonald, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Rosecrans & Emme and Bayard R. Rountree, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

Mr. Presiding Justice FINCH delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for damages on account of personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the defendant's negligence.

There is little conflict in the evidence. At all the times mentioned herein the defendant was the owner of a three-story building, divided into six flats, each flat having both a front and rear entrance. From a photograph contained in the transcript, showing the rear end of the building, and also from the testimony of the plaintiff, it appears that an independent outside stairway was provided for each of the flats in the second and third stories. For six or seven years before, and at the time of the accident, Mrs. Norma Vir Den held a lease on three of the flats, one on the second floor, one on the third, and the location of the third flat not appearing from the evidence. The plaintiff and his family resided in one of the flats on the third floor, under a sublease from Mrs. Vir Den. The rear stairway leading down from the plain-tiff's flat had a guard rail on either side thereof, consisting of a 2 by 4 inch scantling, apparently 16 or 18 feet in length, toenailed at either end thereof to upright 4 by 4 inch posts, and further supported by very light spindles toenailed to the treads of the stairs. Attached to the outer guard rail, about 3 feet from the upper end thereof, was a pulley constituting one end of "a pulley type clothes line," the pulley at the other end being attached "to the back fence." This clothesline was in use at the time Mrs. Vir Den took possession.

The plaintiff testified: "In the evening of that day I was taking some clothes off the line * * * and just as I got the clothes over here to where I could get them off the line * * * this guard rail gave way with me and I dropped three stories to the ground. * * * The line did not stick in any way. It pulled in easily. * * * When I went to reach for the clothes to get them, I had to lean against this banister to a certain extent, because I had to reach over to get my clothes. * * * As near as I can figure, I didn't have any weight at all, hardly, against the rail."

The plaintiff also testified: "Other persons besides myself and family used that stairway." His wife testified to the same effect. There is no evidence that other tenants used the stairway in question or that it was designed or intended to be used by tenants of other apartments. Mrs. Vir Den testified that no part of the premises were reserved for the defendant.

[1, 2] "In the absence of fraud, concealment, or covenant in the lease, a landlord is not liable to a tenant for injuries due to the defective condition or faulty construction of the demised premises." 15 Cal. Jur. 704; Gately v. Campbell, 124 Cal. 520, 57 P. 567; Toner v. Meussdorffer, 123 Cal. 462, 56 P. 39; Daley v. Quick, 99 Cal. 179, 33 P. 859; Farber v. Greenberg, 98 Cal. App. 675, 277 P. 534; Nelson v. Myers, 94 Cal. App. 66, 270 P. 719; Priver v. Young, 62 Cal. App. 405, 216 P. 966. It is not sufficient to show that by the exercise of reasonable care the landlord could have discovered the defective condition, but in order to hold him liable it must appear that he knew of such defect. Ayres v. Wright (Cal. App.) 284 P. 1077.

[3] A qualification of the foregoing rule is that, "where a portion of the premises is reserved by the landlord for use in common by himself and tenants, or by different tenants, a duty is imposed upon him to use ordinary care to keep those particular portions of the premises in a safe condition; and if he is negligent in this regard, and a personal injury results to a tenant by reason thereof, he is liable therefor." Hassell v. Denning, 84 Cal. App. 479, 482, 258 P. 426, 427; Brown

v. Pepperdine, 53 Cal. App. 334, 336, 200 P. 36. This qualification, however, does not apply unless the injury occurred while the injured party was putting the unsafe portion of the premises to a use reasonably intended. Smelser v. Deutsche Evangelische, etc., 88 Cal. App. 469, 475, 263 P. 838; De Motte v. Arkell, 77 Cal. App. 610, 626, 247 P. 254; Shellman v. Hershey, 31 Cal. App. 641, 650, 161 P. 132; Durkin v. Marshall Field & Co., 161 Ill. App. 505; Glain v. Sparandeo, 119 La. 339, 44 So. 120; Orcutt v. Kittery Point Bridge Co., 53 Me. 500; Stickney v. City of Salem, 3 Allen (Mass.) 374; Eisenhower v. Ceppl, 238 Mass. 458, 131 N. E. 184; Kinney v. Onsted, 113 Mich. 96, 71 N. W. 482, 38 L. R. A. 665, 67 Am. St. Rep. 455; Kelley v. Lawrence, 195 Mo. 75, 92 S. W. 1158; Walsh v. Frey, 116 App. Div. 527, 101 N. Y. S. 774; Kucera v. Grigsby, 24 Ohio App. 457, 156 N. E. 249; Gavin v. O'Connor, 99 N. J. Law, 162, 122 A. 842, 30 A. L. R. 1383; Robinson v. Leighton, 122 Me. 309, 119 A. 809, 30 A. L. R. 1386; Landers v. Brooks, 258 Mass. 1, 154 N. E. 265, 49 A. L. R. 562. In many of the cases cited, the alleged injuries resulted from leaning against defective railings. Some of the cases were not actions between landlords and tenants but between parties in such relations that the defendants were under obligation to exercise reasonable care for the safety of the plaintiffs. Powers v. Raymond, 197 Cal. 126, 239 P. 1069, is a case analogous in point of law.

[4, 5] There are other cases holding that, under the particular facts and circumstances thereof, it was a question of fact whether leaning on a railing was one of the intended uses thereof. Pavlovchik v. Lupariello, 101 Conn. 567, 127 A. 18; Price v. Florsheim, 13 La. App. 298, 127 So. 22; Urserleo v. Rosengard, 248 Mass. 542, 143 N. E. 497; McGinley v. Alliance Trust Co., 168 Mo. 257, 66 S. W. 153, 56 L. R. A. 334. If the defendant reserved the stairway involved in this case for the use of other tenants in common with the plaintiff, thereby becoming bound to use ordinary care to keep it in a safe condition, and if the clothesline was in place at the time he leased the three flats to Mrs. Vir Den, then it became a question of fact whether he should have contemplated that a tenant would probably lean against the railing in drawing in clothes on the line. On the other hand, if there was no such reservation, then the defendant can be held liable only on proof of a hidden defect of which he had knowledge and which the injured tenant did not know. There is an entire absence of proof tending to show that there was any such reservation. If Mrs. Vir Den rented the two flats on the third floor from the defendant, then he was under no obligation to keep the stairway in a safe condition, even if she reserved the common use of the stairway for both tenants on that floor. Such a reservation would be hers and not that of the defendant.

[6] The court instructed the jury that: "Where a portion of the premises is reserved by the landlord for use in common by different tenants, a duty is imposed upon him to use ordinary care to keep those particular portions of the premises in a safe condition; and if he is negligent in this regard, and a personal injury results to a tenant by reason thereof, he is liable therefor." The giving of this instruction was prejudicially erroneous in that it implies, contrary to the evidence, that there was proof of such reservation.

[7] For like reasons it was error to instruct the jury that: "You are the sole judges of the fact as to whether the plaintiff and the defendant, or either of them, had notice of the circumstances sufficient to put a prudent man upon inquiry as to the defective condition of the stairway and guard rail, and whether by prosecuting such inquiry he should have learned of such fact." This instruction implies that it was the duty of the defendant to keep the stairway in a safe condition, and assumes that it was in a defective condition. It was a question of fact for the jury to determine whether the railing was in a safe condition for the uses for which it was intended.

[8] Another instruction stated: "If you find from the evidence that the defect or insufficiency of the railing of the stairway which caused it to give way was of such a nature that it could not, by the use of ordinary care, be ascertained or known by the plaintiff, but that it was known or should have been known by the defendant, then you must find that the defendant was guilty of negligence." This instruction, not only assumes that the railing was defective, but, contrary to the decision in Ayres v. Wright, supra, states that the defendant was guilty of negligence if such defect "should have been known" to him. Since it does not appear that the defendant reserved any part of the stairway for the use of himself or other tenants, his relation to the plaintiff is the ordinary one of landlord and tenant, to which the rule of caveat emptor applies. Toner v. Meussdorffer, supra. That rule would be robbed of all its force if the landlord were to be held liable for hidden defects of which he had no knowledge but of which he could have learned by reasonable investigation.

[9] In another instruction it is stated: "If you find that the greater weight of all the evidence is in favor of the negligence of the defendant, * * * you should accept that as a proved fact in the case, while, if the evidence on that issue is * * * evenly balanced or preponderates against such negligence, it is not proven, and you should find that the defendant was not negligent." This instruction clearly implies that if the defendant was negligent the jury should find for the plaintiff. As stated, under the facts proved, the question of the defendant's negligence is not a material issue. The question for the jury to determine, under such facts, was whether the defendant was guilty of concealment, whether he knew of the alleged defects and failed to disclose them.

Other grounds urged for a reversal of the judgment, which are not covered by what has been said herein, are sufficiently answered by the authorities cited in respondent's brief, and therefore they need not be discussed.

The judgment is reversed.

MONTGOMERY v. GLOBE GRAIN & MILLING CO. et al.

Civ. 73.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

Nov. 19, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 12, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 12, 1931.

1. Automobiles ⇨245(9).

In action by railing painter injured on bridge approach when stage and truck collided, evidence held to support nonsuit in favor of truck owner.

There was no evidence indicating that there was any negligence on part of truck driver. Truck was proceeding upon its own right-hand side of road at speed of not more than 15 miles per hour, and when it arrived opposite plaintiff upon its own side of road, its left front fender was brushed by left front fender of stage; injury to plaintiff apparently being caused by stage pulling sharply to right to avoid more serious collision and pinning plaintiff to guard rail, injuring him.

2. Appeal and error ⇨277.

Erroneous instruction is error of law deemed excepted to as matter of law (Code Civ. Proc. § 647).

3. Trial ⇨285.

Instruction must relate to and be measured by circumstances of case in which given.

4. Appeal and error ⇨837(6).

On appeal from order granting new trial, court may consider whole evidence to determine whether instruction was error.

5. Automobiles ⇨194(2).

Under contract, owner of stage held not "independent contractor," as regards stage company's liability for injuries to bridge railing painter.

Contract between stage company and owner provided that company agreed to maintain depots and agencies to handle passengers, to give owner schedule of departures and not to sell transportation for other schedule until owner's bus was filled to capacity nor operate other busses on his run, and to pay owner certain compensation per passenger or per mile. Owner agreed to place such equipment into service, was required to operate on schedules over route and with equipment and drivers required by company, to maintain equipment satisfactorily, carry no other passengers, report accidents, reserve to company general supervision over operation, and agreed that contract should be construed as a lease.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Independent Contractor," see Words and Phrases.]

6. New trial ⇨6.

Much is committed to trial court's discretion in considering grounds for new trial.

7. Appeal and error ⇨979(2).

Granting new trial, evidence indicating directed verdict should not have been given for defendant, held not abuse of discretion.

Appeals from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; F. A. Leonard, Judge.

Action by Joseph H. Montgomery against the Globe Grain & Milling Company, Yellowway, Incorporated, and the California Highway Indemnity Exchange. From a judgment of nonsuit in favor of defendant first named, plaintiff appeals; and from an order granting a new trial as to the other defendants after judgment in their favor, they appeal.

Affirmed.

L. Kearney, of Los Angeles, for appellant plaintiff.

B. P. Gibbs, of Los Angeles, appellants defendants.

A. G. Ritter and H. P. Hibbard, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

MARKS, Acting P. J.

This is an action for damages for personal injuries alleged to have been suffered by the plaintiff in an automobile accident in San Bernardino county on the 25th day of June, 1927. The case was tried before a jury. At the close of the plaintiff's case a motion for nonsuit was granted in favor of the Globe Grain & Milling Company. A judgment was later entered in favor of this company, from which the plaintiff has appealed. At the close of the evidence, upon motion of Yellowway, Inc., and California Highway Indemnity Exchange, an instruction was given directing the jury to return a verdict in favor of these defendants, and judgment was entered in their favor. The plaintiff then moved the court for a new trial as to all defendants. The motion was denied as to the Globe Grain & Milling Company and granted as to the other defendants, who thereupon took an appeal. We therefore have before us two appeals, one by the plaintiff from the judgment of nonsuit in favor of the Globe Grain & Milling Company, and the other by the defendants from the order granting the plaintiff's motion for new trial. These appeals are prosecuted upon one record.

The accident causing the injuries to the plaintiff occurred upon the approach to a bridge over the Mohave river, between Victorville and Oro Grande in San Bernardino county. The plaintiff was employed by the highway department of the state of California and was engaged in painting the railing on the westerly side of the approach to this bridge. He was standing with his feet in the road leaning forward with his head and part of his shoulders under the rail. The bridge runs in a general northerly and southerly direction. The roadway, after leaving the northerly end of the bridge, makes a curve to the west, and at the point of the accident it was eighteen feet in width between the guard rails. A truck belonging to the Globe Grain & Milling Company crossed the bridge proceeding northerly and when its front was opposite the plaintiff it came into collision with a stage approaching the bridge from around the curve. This stage bore upon its side the names "Mohawk" and "Yellowway." As the left front fender of the stage brushed the left front fender of the truck, the stage was pulled sharply to the right and pinned the plaintiff to the guard rail, breaking his legs and otherwise seriously injuring him.

The motion for nonsuit made in behalf of the Globe Grain & Milling Company was granted upon the ground that there was no evidence of any negligence on the part of this company. Whether or not this judgment is supported by the evidence is the sole question to be decided upon plaintiff's appeal.

[1] We have examined the record carefully and can find no evidence of any negligence on the part of the Globe Grain & Milling Company or the driver of its truck. The truck was proceeding upon its own right-hand side of the road at a speed of not more than fifteen miles per hour. It was seen by plaintiff when it was at a distance of about two hundred feet from him. When it was opposite him and proceeding at a lawful speed upon its own side of the road its left front fender was brushed by the left front fender of the stage. The injury to plaintiff was apparently caused by the stage pulling sharply to the right to avoid a more serious collision with the truck. There being no evidence indicating that there was any negligence on the part of the driver of the truck of the Globe Grain & Milling Company, the judgment in its favor must be affirmed.

Hereafter in this opinion in considering the appeal of Yelloway, Inc., and California Highway Indemnity Exchange, we will refer to them as appellants, and to the plaintiff as the respondent.

Yelloway, Inc., was a corporation organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of Colorado, and California Highway Indemnity Exchange was an incorporated association organized for the purpose of insuring its members against claims for loss or damage resulting from motor vehicle accidents. It had written a policy of insurance upon the stage involved in this action under the terms of which it was made a defendant.

Yelloway, Inc., was engaged in selling transportation by motorbus to passengers between the cities of Denver and Los Angeles. It maintained an office in the city of Denver, at which tickets were sold to many of the passengers who were upon the bus at the time of the accident. The stage was registered in the name of W. C. Olson as registered owner and the Mack International Truck Corporation as the legal owner. Olson had been made a defendant in the action, but as he had not been served with summons the case against him was dismissed.

The motion for new trial was made by respondent upon the grounds of the failure of the evidence to support the verdict, and that the verdict was contrary to the evidence, and for errors of law occurring during the trial. The order granting the motion for new trial was general in its terms and did not specify that it was granted upon the grounds of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict. Appellants contend that as this order was general in its terms this court cannot now review the evidence to determine whether or not the instruction by the trial court to the jury directing it to return a verdict in favor of these appellants was contrary to or was supported by the evidence. They maintain that this instruction was a conclusion of law drawn by the trial court from the evidence and does not constitute such error of law as will furnish grounds for a reversal of the judgment..

[2, 3] It is a well-settled rule of law in California that an erroneous instruction given by the court to the jury is an error of law that is considered excepted to as a matter of law. Section 647, Code Civ. Proc. While an instruction gives the law of the case to the jury, its applicability, and oftentimes its correctness, depends upon the evidence in the case. An instruction should not be considered as merely an abstract statement of a principle of law, but it must relate to and be measured by the circumstances of the case in which it was given. To determine the question of whether there was any error in giving it frequently requires an examination of the evidence in the case. Hamlin v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 150 Cal. 776, 89 P. 1109; Shipley v. San Diego Electric Ry. Co. (Cal. App.) 289 P. 662. In the case of Sullivan v. Market Street Ry. Co., 136 Cal. 479, 69 P. 143, the question involved was similar to the one which we are considering. In the Sullivan Case it was said:

"This is an appeal from an order granting a new trial. The order reads as follows: 'In this action, the plaintiff's motion for a new trial herein having been argued and submitted, now, by the court, it is ordered that said motion be, and the same is, hereby granted, for the reason only that the court erred in giving, as modified, defendant's instruction relative to the presumption of negligence, being the instruction to which plaintiff's exception No. 7 was reserved in the statement on motion for new trial herein.' * * *

"By the above instruction, the judge in effect said to the jury that, in his opinion, there was not sufficient evidence to establish the charge of negligence against the defendant, and thus violated the provision of the constitution forbidding him to charge the jury 'with respect to matters of fact.' Upon his attention being called thereto, upon the motion for a new trial, he very properly set the verdict aside. Moreover, the instruction is practically the equivalent of a direction to the jury to find for the defendant, and evidently they so understood it; and unless the testimony in favor of the contention, on the part of the plaintiff, that it was the fault of the motorman that the accident occurred, was so slight as not to justify the case being submitted to the jury, the instruction should not have been given. The judge of the court below, therefore, in granting a new trial must have been of the opinion that there was sufficient testimony in favor of the plaintiff to justify the case being submitted to the jury. To reverse the order of that court, under the circumstances, this court would have to hold, against the opinion of the trial judge, that the testimony was insufficient to warrant the case going to the jury. This brings the case within the general rule that the appellate court will not disturb the action of the trial court based upon a substantial conflict in the evidence."

[4] To the same effect are the cases of Hampton v. Occidental, etc., Co., 139 Cal. 706, 73 P. 579; Jansson v. National Steamship Co., 189 Cal. 187, 208 P. 90; Dunne v. Hines, 50 Cal. App. 345, 195 P. 276. We therefore conclude that the giving of an erroneous instruction is an error of law and that to determine whether there was any error committed in the giving of such instruction this court may consider all of the evidence in the case.

[5-7] The sole question involved in this appeal, and the one which apparently influenced the trial court in granting the motion for new trial, is whether the stage driven by Olson and which injured the plaintiff, was under the control of the appellant Yellowway, Inc. In order to determine whether the court erred in giving its instruction to the jury to return a verdict for appellants we must consider the evidence bearing upon this question.

We find in the record a written contract executed by Yellowway, Inc., and the Western Auto Travel Agency, Inc., as the first parties and W. C. Olson as the second party. This contract particularly set forth the terms under which Olson operated, and from this contract it appears that the parties of the first part had spent large sums of money in advertising their routes of transportation and had established a sufficient volume of business to warrant the operation of additional busses between the destinations named. They agreed to maintain suitable depots, offices, and agencies in Denver and Los Angeles to handle passengers; to advertise the bus equipment used in the business, including the equipment of Olson, and to sell tickets over his run at their own expense; to give Olson his schedule of departures from the terminals upon his run and not to sell transportation for any other schedule until Olson's bus was filled to capacity, nor to operate any other busses on his run. Olson was to be paid $20 for each passenger transported between the terminals and 2 cents per mile for passengers transported between intermediate points. Olson agreed to place his bus equipment upon the run between Denver and Los Angeles and to provide bus equipment for each schedule of departure required by the first parties. He was required to operate on the schedules and over the route established by the first parties and with equipment and drivers satisfactory to them; to maintain his equipment in good mechanical condition, clean and in presentable appearance satisfactory to the first parties. Olson further agreed to have his bus equipment distinctly painted and lettered according to the directions of the first parties and to conform to any changes in this regard requested by them. He further agreed to carry no passengers except those provided by the first parties and to accept and transport all passengers provided by them and to deliver such passengers to their respective destinations upon the schedules established by them. They were also given an option to purchase Olson's equipment, and, further, they were given the right to transfer Olson and his equipment to any other run which in the opinion of their officers might prove more profitable. Olson was required to report to the first parties any accident in which his bus participated. The contract reserved to the first parties general supervision over the operation of the Olson bus and contained the following paragraph:

"This contract shall be construed as a lease on said equipment from second party (Olson) to first parties (Yellowway, Inc., and The Western Auto Travel Agency Inc.) with all rights or priority for use of the highway, and all rights of operations upon which a franchise might be applied for shall accrue to the parties of the first part."

This contract bore the signatures of Yellowway, Inc., by R. W. Taggart, president, and the Western Auto Travel Agency Inc., by R. W. Taggart, president.

On the trip in question the bus left a Yellowway station or office in Denver where the passengers had purchased their tickets and had the name "Yellowway" painted on its sides.

Appellants contend that under the terms of the contract Olson was an independent contractor, and he being such, no liability attached to Yellowway, Inc. "An independent contractor * * * is one who renders service in the course of an occupation, representing the will of his employer only as to the result of his work, and not as to the means by which it is accomplished." Luckie v. Diamond Coal Co., 41 Cal. App. 468, 183 P. 178, 183. The right or power to control the activities of one by another is the element which distinguishes the relation of employer and employee and that of independent contractor. Press Pub. Co. v. Industrial Accident Com., 190 Cal. 114, 210 P. 820.

In the case before us it appears from the contract that Yellowway, Inc., reserved such right of control over the operations of Olson that we believe he cannot be considered an independent contractor transporting passengers for hire. This is evidently the conclusion reached by the trial court in granting the motion for new trial. Much is committed to the discretion of the trial court in considering grounds for new trial. Thompson v. California Construction Co., 148 Cal. 35, 82 P. 367. Under the facts of this case we cannot say that the court below abused its discretion in granting the motion in so far as these appellants are concerned.

The judgment in favor of the Globe Grain & Milling Company is affirmed. The order granting a new trial as to the defendants Yellowway, Inc., and California Highway Indemnity Exchange is affirmed.

HERSH et al. v. GARAU et ux. (McCONNELL et al., Interveners).

Civ. 7490.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 1, California.

Dec. 4, 1930.

1. Appeal and error ⇨417(1).

Notice of appeal to confer jurisdiction need not specifically designate court to which appeal is taken.

2. Appeal and error ⇨412.

Record on defendants' appeal, in action for breach of contract, held to sufficiently establish right of named attorney to give notice of appeal.

Answer of defendant to complaint in intervention was signed by attorney who gave notice of appeal, but his name did not appear on answer to complaint. It further appeared by recitals in the findings of fact and in the judgment that the defendants were represented at the trial by a member of a certain law firm and attorney in question.

3. Appeal and error ⇨766.

Appellants' failure to give references in brief to pages of transcript from which excerpts of testimony were taken held not to warrant affirmance of judgment (Code Civ. Proc. § 953c; District Court of Appeal Rules, Rule 8).

4. Appeal and error ⇨763.

Appellants' motion to file supplemental brief, obviating objection to original that references to transcript from which excerpts of testimony were taken were omitted, was denied (Code Civ. Proc. § 953c; District Court of Appeal Rules, Rule 8).

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank Lamberson, Judge.

Action by Sara F. Hersh and husband against Aurelio Garau and wife, wherein Allen R. McConnell, as trustee in bankruptcy of Green Mill, Inc., and Ellis I. Hirschfeld separately intervened. On plaintiffs' motion to dismiss the appeal, and motion to affirm the judgment.

Motion to dismiss the appeal denied, and motion to affirm the judgment denied on condition.

Haas & Dunnigan, Walter F. Haas, and W. E. McClintock, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Meserve, Mumper, Hughes & Robertson, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J.

[1] The grounds of motion to dismiss are that in the notice of appeal there was no statement naming the court to which the appeal was taken, and that the notice of appeal is fatally defective because not signed by an attorney of record of the appealing parties. Specific designation of the court to which the appeal was taken was not necessary to vest in the proper court jurisdiction of the appeal. Rabe v. Lloyd, 187 Cal. 282, 201 P. 598.

[2] The notice of appeal was signed by the attorneys as follows: "Walter F. Haas, W. E. McClintock, by W. E. McClintock." It is contended by respondents that McClintock was not an attorney of record, and therefore was without authority to give a notice of appeal in the action. In the clerk's transcript, it appears that the answer of defendants Garau to the complaint in intervention was signed by Haas & Dunnigan, W. E. McClintock, by W. E. McClintock. It is true that the name of McClintock was not signed to the answer of the same defendants to the previously filed answer of the defendants to the plaintiffs' complaint. It further appears by recitals in the findings of fact and in the judgment of the court that the said defendants Garau were represented at the trial by the law firm of Haas & Dunnigan by Walter F. Haas and W. E. McClintock. We think that this record is sufficient to establish the right of Mr. McClintock to act in the matter of giving notice of appeal from the judgment.

[3, 4] The motion to affirm the judgment is based upon the ground that the opening brief of appellants does not comply with the provisions of section 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure, and does not comply with the requirements of rule 8 of this court in this: That included in sundry specified pages of the brief are numerous pages of excerpts of testimony where no reference is given to the line or page of the typewritten transcript. In the said brief there are a considerable number of instances wherein statements of testimony are given or quotations of testimony are given without specifying the page of the transcript where this testimony would be found. In some other instances the proper citation is made. The brief was in this respect carelessly prepared, and was not as free from objections presented against it as was the brief considered by us in Pacific States Corporation v. Rosenshine, 290 P. 609. In response to the motion to affirm, appellants have filed a counter motion that they be permitted to file a supplemental brief which they have tendered for filing in order to obviate the force of the objections made against their first brief. We find no sufficient reason for granting this motion. No good reason is offered for the filing of a supplemental brief. The record of the trial is contained in two very large volumes.

It is not reasonable for appellants to call upon opposing counsel in the preparation of their brief, or to call upon this court in its examination of appellants' brief, to examine a supplemental brief for the purpose of tracing the unidentified quotations contained in the opening brief. The method proposed by appellants would only create additional confusion and cause additional waste of time. We do not think, however, that it is in the interest of justice that we should punish appellants for the inadvertent omissions of counsel by affirming the judgment, where an inspection of the opening brief satisfies us that counsel have acted in good faith, although without due diligence in the preparation of their brief.

The motions are denied.

It is ordered that appellants be allowed fifteen days from the filing of this order, within which time they may interline in their filed opening brief all of the omitted citations of pages and lines of the portions of record referred to by them, and serve upon opposing counsel a new and complete copy of their brief as thus corrected and amended. If appellants fail to act in conformity with the permission thus given, an order will be entered affirming the judgment.

UNDERHILL v. PETERSON.

Civ. 168.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

Dec. 4, 1930.

1. Appeal and error §757(1).

Statute requiring appellant to print portions of record relied on for reversal is mandatory (Code Civ. Proc. § 953c).

2. Appeal and error §931(1).

On appeal, every substantial conflict in evidence must be resolved in favor of finding.

3. Appeal and error §1010(1).

Fact findings are conclusive upon appellate court, if supported by any evidence in record.

4. Automobiles §244(6).

Evidence, especially in view of ordinance, held to support finding driver of automobile in noncommercial section, striking pedestrian crossing street, where there was no crosswalk, was not negligent.

Evidence tended to show that pedestrian collided with rear of automobile when she was crossing at place where there was no crosswalk, in noncommercial section of city. Ordinance provided that outside business district no pedestrian should cross roadway other than at right angles to curb, and in crossing at place other than crosswalk should yield right of way to all vehicles. Violation of ordinance was declared misdemeanor.

5. Negligence §83.

Application of "last clear chance" doctrine stated.

Doctrine applies where injured party has placed himself in position of danger from which he cannot extricate himself or of which he is absolutely unconscious, and injuring party, seeing or knowing facts from which reasonable man would believe other to be in peril, and being able to avoid injury by use of ordinary care, fails to use such care and thereby causes injury.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Last Clear Chance," see Words and Phrases.]

6. Automobiles §227(3).

"Last clear chance" doctrine held not to apply where pedestrian's peril, created by her negligence, arose when it was too late for motorist to avoid collision.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; F. A. Leonard, Judge.

Action by Nannie J. Underhill against Gus A. Peterson. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Burton E. Hales, of Redlands, for appellant.

Swing & Wilson, of San Bernardino, for respondent.

WARMER, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment against her in an action to recover damages caused by plaintiff's colliding with the defendant's automobile while she was crossing a public street in the city of Redlands, county of San Bernardino, Cal. The case was tried without a jury, and the court found among other things:

"I. The court hereby finds that at the time and place referred to in plaintiff's complaint, one W. E. Holmlund was driving and operating an automobile belonging to the defendant. The court further finds that it is not true that said W. E. Holmlund was driving and operating said automobile in a careless, negligent, and illegal manner. The court further finds that said W. D. Holmlund was then and there driving and operating said automobile in a careful and prudent manner and that the plaintiff then and there ran into and collided with said automobile near the rear right wheel thereof and by reason of such collision, the said plaintiff was thrown to the roadbed of the highway, and thereby sustained the injuries set forth in Paragraph I of Plaintiff's complaint.

"II. * * * The court further finds that none of the injuries received and none of the damage sustained by plaintiff was caused by the negligence or careless operation of said automobile by said W. E. Holmlund or by the defendant. * * *

"IV. The court further finds that the said plaintiff, at the time and place referred to in said complaint, was guilty of contributory negligence and then and there failed to exercise reasonable or any care for her own safety, and did then and there negligently and carelessly proceed from a position of safety into said public highway in the pathway of said automobile therein referred to, and exposed herself to danger from said automobile and other vehicles then and there traveling upon said highway, and then and there recklessly, negligently and carelessly ran into and collided with said automobile referred to in said complaint; that any injuries alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff, as set forth in said complaint, were caused by the negligent acts of the plaintiff, aforesaid, and resulted from the contributory negligence of the plaintiff, as herein set forth."

The accident occurred on Colton avenue in said city of Redlands. Colton avenue is a public street running east and west. Berkeley drive is a public street running into the said Colton avenue. However, it does not extend south of Colton avenue. The point of impact was about 100 feet west of Berkeley drive on said Colton avenue. The defendant's employee was driving the defendant's automobile west on said Colton avenue. Plaintiff had been across the street from her home on the south side of Colton avenue visiting with some friend, and just after the time the street lights were turned on she arrived at a point on the north side of Colton avenue where she desired to cross said avenue on her way to her home. There was no crosswalk at the place. There were only two persons who saw what happened, plaintiff and defendant's employee, who was driving the car. There was a pepper tree near the north curb of said Colton avenue about the place where plaintiff started to cross said avenue, said tree having a spread of about 8 feet. East of said tree was a weir box. Plaintiff was standing a little west of said tree and nearly underneath it between the curb and the sidewalk. A number of cars passed while plaintiff waited at this point. When plaintiff thought it was safe she began to cross the street, moving in a slightly diagonal direction to the southwest. Said Colton avenue is paved and is 45 feet wide.

Plaintiff testified in part as follows:

"I was watching the car that came from the west. * * * I never saw this car coming.

"Q. After you entered you did not look, did you? A. No.

"* * * A. I didn't see it until it was right on me."

Defendant's employee testified in part as follows:

"Q. What sort of a vehicle was it? A. Dodge touring. * * *

"Q. * * * did it have any special equipment? A. Well, the side of the top is—I think they call it a California top.

"Q. What was the condition of your automobile mechanically? A. Good.

"Q. And what was the condition of the top of the automobile? A. It was good.

"* * * A. I should say she was about a hundred feet below Berkeley drive standing just off the curb.

"Q. When you say a hundred feet below, tell us the directions. A. West.

"Q. Were the street lights burning at that time? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And you saw Mrs. Underhill where was she standing? I mean the first time? A. About a yard from the curb in the street.

"Q. Did she continue to stand there or did she move? A. She stood there until I was closer to her and then she moved.

"Q. And then from that point on tell us what happened? A. Well, the car that was meeting me passed and she started to walk so I bore to the left, which is south, and blew the horn and as I did that she started to run and I was practically almost opposite her at the time and it seems as though she ran into that rear curtain.

"Q. With what results? A. It broke it.

"Q. Broke what? A. The glass in the curtain. * * *

"Q. It is up above the back seat, however, isn't it? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. In addition to breaking the glass in the curtain, what else did it break? A. It tore the fabric around this bolt.

"Q. And aside from these two things that happened to the curtain, what else was damaged on your car? A. Nothing that I know of. * * *

"Q. About how fast were you traveling when you first saw Mrs. Underhill west about a hundred feet from where you were? A. About 20 miles an hour.

"Q. Did you continue that speed or reduce it? A. I reduced it.

"Q. When did you reduce it? A. As I started to turn towards the left.

"Q. How far were you from Mrs. Underhill, approximately, when you started to turn towards the left—just before that, about how far were you traveling from the north curb as you came westerly there, approximately? A. I should say about 5 feet, maybe.

"Q. How far were you away from Mrs. Underhill when you swerved to the left? A. About 50 feet.

"Q. When did you blow your horn? A. Just as she started walking. It was while I started to turn to the left. * * *

"Q. Now then, she didn't run into the front end of your car did she? A. She ran into the back end. * * *

"Q. And about how far had Mrs. Underhill gone to cross the street when you blew your horn? A. When I first saw her she was about a yard off the curb.

"By the Court:

"Q. Moving or standing? A. No, standing when I first saw her but then she took a few steps before I blew the horn so she would be that distance away from the curb.

"By Mr. Hales:

"Q. That is, when you blew the horn, you say she was about how far from the curb when you first saw her? A. A yard.

"Q. And she took a few steps and then you blew the horn and what did she do after you blew the horn? A. Proceeded to run.

"Q. How fast were you traveling? A. At that time I would say about 15 miles an hour. * * *

"Q. Did you try to stop your automobile? A. No; I slowed up but I expected Mrs. Underhill to stand there; she was stopped there and waiting for this other car to go by.

"Q. Which way was the other car going? A. It was going east.

"Q. Where were you on Colton avenue when you commenced to turn to the left? A. I would say I was about 20 feet from Mrs. Underhill.

"Q. That is about the time you blew the horn? A. Yes. * * *

"Q. Why didn't you go behind her? A. There was not room.

"* * * A. She was not there all the time. * * *

"Q. Were there any marks or anything on the side of your car besides this glass and the curtain that was broken? A. Not that I saw.

"Q. What happened to the fabric of that curtain? A. It was torn. * * *

[1, 2] The glass broken from the rear side window was found to be somewhat to the north of the center of the said Colton avenue. Respondent moves this court for an affirm-ance of the judgment for failure of the appellant to comply with the provisions of section 933c of the Code of Civil Procedure and cites a number of authorities in support of his motion. The appellant's brief contains a very small portion of the evidence. It is questionable if it complies with said section. The attention of the bar has been directed repeatedly to the mandatory character of the provisions of said section. Jeffords v. Young, 197 Cal. 224, 239 P. 1054; Estate of Berry, 195 Cal. 354, 233 P. 330; Dahlberg v. Dahlberg, 202 Cal. 295, 260 P. 290; Bryant v. Kelly, 203 Cal. 721, 265 P. 817. We have cited the above cases to again call the attention of the bar to the mandatory character of the provisions of said section. In the instant case the motion is denied. The record being short, we have concluded to decide the case upon its merits. In Emerick v. Johnson, 64 Cal. App. 460, 221 P. 675, 676, the court, in speaking of a case where a diagram had been used by the trial court to illustrate the testimony of certain witnesses and such diagram was not before the appellate court, said: "This diagram not being before us, we must assume that it lent aid to the findings made by the court." See, also, Godeau v. Levy, 72 Cal. App. 13, 236 P. 354, and Gootar v. Levin (Cal. App.) 293 P. 706, decided November 20, 1930. On appeal every substantial conflict in the evidence must be resolved in favor of the finding. Robertson v. Finkler, 27 Cal. App. 322, 149 P. 784.

"In examining the sufficiency of the evidence to support a questioned finding, an appellate court must accept as true all evidence tending to establish the correctness of the finding as made, taking into account, as well, all inferences which might reasonably have been thought by the trial court to lead to the same conclusion." Bancroft-Whitney Co. v. McHugh, 166 Cal. 140, 134 P. 1157, 1158.

[3, 4] The above findings are conclusive on this court if they are supported by any evidence in the record. The plaintiff first urges that the evidence does not support the finding that the defendant was not negligent. The appellant has made some showing by small excerpts from the testimony, but when we read the entire record we find that the defendant was driving at about 20 miles per hour in a public street in the city of Redlands October 5, 1928, at about dark and about 100 feet from the plaintiff, who was standing near the curb on the north side of Colton avenue apparently waiting for traffic to pass; as the defendant advanced he slowed down somewhat, and when approximately 50 feet distant he noticed the plaintiff begin to walk across the street. He turned his machine to the left and gave a usual warning sound. The plaintiff was too close to the north curb at that time for the defendant to pass behind her. About the time the defendant gave the warning signal he was moving along said street bearing toward the center thereof and when but a few feet away from plaintiff the plaintiff began to run and ran into the side of the defendant's machine near the rear thereof, breaking the glass in the rear side window. Defendant stopped within 15 feet from the point of collision. Defendant's machine was proceeding at a reasonable and lawful rate of speed. He gave the usual and proper warning. Plaintiff alleges that because there might have been space enough behind plaintiff for defendant to have passed behind plaintiff at the moment of the impact that therefore defendant was guilty of negligence for not so doing. With this contention we cannot agree. Plaintiff was crossing a street at a place where there is no cross-walk. Defendant approached and gave timely warning of his approach and plaintiff immediately began to run. This the defendant could not reasonably have been expected to have anticipated. At that moment the defendant was tending to the extreme center of the street to give to plaintiff all possible chance to escape injury. However, plaintiff, without looking where she was going, ran headlong against defendant's car as it was passing. Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the findings we cannot say that the defendant's employee was guilty of any act of negligence in the operation of said automobile as a matter of law. The evidence abundantly supports the finding. This is the more true because at the time there was in force in the said city of Redlands an ordinance known as Ordinance No. 693. Section 10 thereof is as follows: "Outside of business district no pedestrian shall cross a roadway other than by a route at right angles to the curb, and in crossing at any place other than a cross-walk shall yield the right of way to all vehicles upon the roadway."

Section 43 of said ordinance is as follows:

"Any person violating any of the provisions of this ordinance or any rule or regulation of the board of trustees or city marshal pursuant thereto shall be guilty of a misdemeanor."

[5, 6] The place where the accident occurred is outside of a business district. Hence if said ordinance is to be given any meaning at all it must place upon the person crossing a street at a place where there is no crosswalk the duty to yield to the motorist the right of way and the defendant had a right to assume plaintiff would comply with the mandatory provision of said ordinance. Appellant urges that if she be held to be guilty of negligence the doctrine of last clear chance should apply. This doctrine applies where the injured party has placed himself in a position of danger from which he cannot extricate himself or of which he is absolutely unconscious, and the defendant seeing or knowing facts from which a reasonable man would believe him to be in peril, and being able by the use of ordinary care, fails to use such care and thereby causes injury. Arnold v. San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Railways, 175 Cal. 1, 164 P. 798. The facts in the instant case reveal that the driver saw the plaintiff some 100 feet away. At that time plaintiff was in no position of peril and before such doctrine can apply a position of peril must exist. The position of peril in this case came only at the moment after plaintiff began to run and that fact brought notice to the driver of the condition of peril. The defendant could not have had any notice of a position of peril until such existed. We are satisfied that the plaintiff was crossing said street in a careless and negligent manner, exercising practically no care for her own safety and that she may have been unconscious of any danger. However, we are also satisfied that due to the watchful care of the defendant's driver plaintiff was in no position of peril and there would have been no accident had plaintiff not suddenly changed her pace and ran, thus suddenly creating a position of peril; whether in a continued reckless disregard of her own safety and the rights of others or due to a sudden confusion on her part and a supposed effort to flee from danger, becomes immaterial, because at that moment, and not until then, was there a position of peril; and then the defendant's driver was too close to do anything other than he did do to avoid the tragedy. Nothing in the defendant's conduct falls short of the standard of ordinary care. Hence the doctrine known as the doctrine of last clear chance cannot and does not come to the aid of the plaintiff.

For the foregoing reasons the judgment is affirmed.

DENNIS et al. v. CITY OF ORANGE et al.

Civ. 229.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

Nov. 22, 1930.

1. Waters and water courses ⇨179(6).

Whether excavation in bed of creek proximately caused damages by erosion to plaintiff's land, originally separated from creek by defendant's land, held for jury.

2. Negligence ⇨46.

Owner must use property so as not to infringe on others' rights (Civ. Code, § 3514).

3. Landlord and tenant ⇨170(1).

Landlord, re-leasing to tenant creating conditions, amounting to nuisance, is liable for injuries resulting.

4. Landlord and tenant ⇨170(1).

Condition of leased premises causing waters of creek to be thrown against bank along plaintiff's land and undermining it constituted "nuisance," for which landlord was liable.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Nuisance," see Words and Phrases.]

5. Waters and water courses ⇨179(6).

Whether condition of defendants' premises was such as to cause waters of creek in time of flood to be thrown against bank along plaintiff's adjoining land and to undermine it was fact question.

6. Trial ⇨296(11).

In action for damages to land from flood waters, instruction considered with other instructions held not to authorize damages for future injuries.

Language of instruction objected to was that, if excavation of channel "caused, was causing, and would cause the water flowing in creek to flow upon or against plaintiffs' premises which water would not have thus flowed but for such excavating, defendants would be liable." Context of instruction showed that quoted language referred to damage already caused, and in another instruction covering measure of damages these were limited to those already suffered.

7. Trial ⇨260(6).

Refusing instruction regarding proximate cause of injury to plaintiff's land held not error, where covered by instructions given.

The refused instruction was based on claim that proximate cause of injuries to plaintiff's land was narrowing of stream bed shortly above point of injury and the consequent deflection of water by causes other than excavations by defendant's lessee in bed of stream. This was covered in at least three instructions, where some such phrase as "which water would not have thus flowed but for such excavating, dredging, lowering, and diverting" was used.

BARNARD, J.

This is an action to recover damages for the washing away of a part of plaintiffs' land by flood waters flowing down Santiago creek, near the city of Orange. The defendant city owns certain land lying in the bed of this creek, together with certain land along the west bank thereof. This bank is about twelve feet higher than the normal bed of the creek. The plaintiffs' land adjoins this land owned by the city, and prior to April, 1926, was entirely separated from the creek by a narrow strip of the city's land, although at one end it came very near the bank of the creek. Prior to February, 1927, two rows of 26 year old eucalyptus trees, 75 feet tall, stood along the bank of the creek, mostly upon the strip of land owned by the city, a few being upon the plaintiffs' land where it approached nearest to the bank of the creek. The bank of the creek with these trees upon it had thus stood uninjured for many years prior to April, 1926. On August 16, 1924, the city of Orange leased its above-described land to one George A. Simpson for the purpose of excavating sand, rock, and gravel from the bed of the creek thereon. This lease provided that no excavating should be done within 30 feet of the west bank of Santiago creek. No excavating was done by Simpson upon the property, and on August 4, 1925, with the consent of the city of Orange, he assigned this lease to Kavanagh & Twohy. The new lessees began operations immediately, and continued the same until February, 1927, during which time they excavated and removed large quantities of sand, rock, and gravel for commercial purposes, thereby creating large channels and pits on the property leased, and, in addition, excavated channels to permit the escape of water. The evidence shows that, during and following severe storms and heavy rainfalls, flood waters flow in Santiago creek with great rapidity, and in the neighborhood of the land here in question, during such flood conditions, the current of water in the creek swishes from side to side of the stream bed, striking first one bank and then the other, and that unprotected land is undermined and eaten out by the water when a deflection of the current is caused by any obstruction or unusual circumstance. Such a flood occurred in April, 1926, when a small portion of the narrow strip of bank owned by the city of Orange, at a point where the plaintiffs' land came nearest to the creek bed, was washed away, thus directly exposing a small part of plaintiffs' land to the creek. On September 21, 1926, the city of Orange brought a suit against Kavanagh & Twohy for the cancellation of their lease, alleging in their complaint that those defendants had excavated closer than 30 feet to the west bank of Santiago creek, contrary to the terms of the lease, and further alleging as follows: "That said defendants have committed waste on said premises by diverting the natural channel of said Santiago Creek and causing the same to flow with increased force against the westerly bank of said creek, causing an erosion of said bank to such an extent that large quantities of soil valuable for agricultural purposes have fallen into said creek and have been washed away, and a large number of full-grown eucalyptus trees growing upon said bank to be undermined by said waters and causing them to fall into said creek and be entirely destroyed." Thereafter this suit was settled, the old lease was canceled by mutual agreement, a new lease was entered into between the city and Kavanagh & Twohy, and the lessees continued with their excavating operations. Thereafter, in February, 1927, a heavy rainfall, lasting several days, but which, according to appellant, fell in a usual manner, caused a flood in Santiago creek, during which a portion of the plaintiffs' land with approximately 125 sixteen year old full-bearing orange trees was washed away, and considerable other damage done to plaintiffs' property.

To recover for this damage, this action was brought against the city of Orange and Kavanagh & Twohy, the complaint, among other things, alleging that Kavanagh & Twohy had carelessly and negligently excavated and dredged a channel along the foot of the west bank of Santiago creek, nearer than 30 feet to the bank, and along a portion of the plaintiffs' premises; that they had lowered the natural channel of the creek and diverted the waters thereof from their previous location and level; that this dredging caused the waters in the creek to flow with increased force and depth against the west bank thereof; that such diversion of the water in the creek had caused certain eucalyptus trees to fall into the creek, and was of such a nature as to cause further erosion of the west bank of said creek; that the city of Orange, with knowledge of all of this and of the nuisance thereby created, had canceled the lease under which Kavanagh & Twohy were operating, and entered into a new lease with the same tenants; that, before said new lease was delivered, the city of Orange neglected and refused to abate the nuisance, and failed to restore the channel to its previous condition or to otherwise protect plaintiffs' premises from the waters of Santiago creek; and that, by reason of the acts done by Kavanagh & Twohy, and the failure of the city of Orange to abate the nuisance, the land of the plaintiffs was damaged as set forth in the complaint. The answer of the city of Orange denies that the city had knowledge of any excavation by Kavanagh & Twohy within 30 feet of the west bank of the creek until after the same had been done, and alleges that any such excavating was contrary to the terms of the lease; denies that said city ever created any nuisance or authorized the creation of any nuisance, or authorized any dredging contrary to or in violation of its agreement; and denies that any injuries to plaintiffs' land was caused by the failure of the city to abate the nuisance or its failure to restore the channel to its previous condition. As a separate defense, the city alleges that the injury to plaintiffs' land was caused by the installation in the creek bed, above the city's land, of certain protection work put in by another party, and by the installation by Kavanagh & Twohy of a large rock and gravel plant near the east bank of Santiago creek, over which the city had no control or supervision. The action was tried before a jury, resulting in a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs for $8,000. From the judgment which followed, the city of Orange alone has appealed.

[1] Appellant insists that the proximate cause of the damages to respondents' land was a diversion of the flood waters in the creek caused by certain protection work installed above, and by the gravel plant installed by Kavanagh & Twohy, over which the city had no control, and not any excavating done or any act of the city; it being claimed that the injuries to respondents' land would have occurred irrespective of any excavating carried on in the bed of the stream. Reliance is placed upon the testimony of one witness, who stated that, in his opinion, in the condition the bank was in at the point where the plaintiffs' land approached the creek, the land would have washed out if no excavating had taken place. The evidence upon this phase of the case is very voluminous, and we feel it is unnecessary to summarize it all here. Not only does the record show that in so stating this witness was referring to another minor excavation, and not to those which are the basis of this action, but other witnesses testified that the flood in question did weaken and undermine the bank along respondents' property, and along the narrow strip of the city's property, which lay between it and the creek. The condition of the bed of the creek and the surrounding country for some distance up the stream, and the action of the water from the beginning to the height of the flood, were all quite fully and accurately described to the jury. A considerable section of the bank with many tall eucalyptus trees that had stood there for years fell into the creek at once, and were washed away about the third day of the flood, showing that an undermining process had been under way. As the bank was eaten away, not only further portions of the protecting strip of land owned by the city, but about an acre and a half of respondents' land, disappeared. There was evidence that, prior to the April, 1926, freshet, in order to divert water from the main workings of the lessees, a channel had been excavated to take the water over along the west bank of the creek along the plaintiffs' property. There was also expert evidence that this would endanger this bank by making it more subject to an undermining process. Without further reviewing the evidence on this point, we may say that, after reading the same, we are fully satisfied that there was ample evidence from which the jury could find that the excavations made by Kavanagh & Twohy were the proximate cause of the damages to respondents' land rather than the obstructions which are blamed by the appellant. The evidence relied upon by appellant raises no more than a conflict, which was resolved against it by the verdict of the jury.

The point most strenuously urged by appellant is that, even though the proximate cause of the injury to respondents' land was the excavations made by Kavanagh & Twohy, the city of Orange is not liable, in the absence of a showing of negligence upon the part of the city. In this connection, the court's instructions to the jury are vigorously attacked. The many points raised along this line all relate to a vital conflict between the theories of the respective parties to this controversy, and may be treated under one head. The respondents rely upon the proposition that a nuisance was created by the excavations made during the existence of the first lease in the bed of Santiago creek, and that the city of Orange, having relet the property without abating this nuisance, is liable for injuries suffered by an adjoining landowner, irrespective of the question of negligence, as apart from the nuisance. On the other hand, the appellant insists that no nuisance was shown; that it was lawful to remove the gravel; that liability could arise from such lawful removal only through negligence in doing the same; and that the city is not liable for any negligence of which the lessees may have been guilty. While the right of appellant to use its property for any legitimate purpose and its power to lease the same cannot be disputed, on the other hand, one must use his own property in such a manner as not to infringe upon the rights of another. Civ. Code, § 3514.

[2, 3] While, ordinarily, an owner of property is not liable for injuries to others arising through something done by his tenant, there is an exception in the case of conditions upon property which constitute a nuisance, in so far as the rights of others are concerned, which conditions, although not originally created by the owner, exist upon the leased premises at the time they are demised. Kalis v. Shattuck, 69 Cal. 593, 11 P. 346, 58 Am. Rep. 568; Rider v. Clark, 132 Cal. 382, 64 P. 564; Shellman v. Hershey, 31 Cal. App. 641, 161 P. 132; Runyon v. City of Los Angeles, 40 Cal. App. 383, 180 P. 837; Lucid v. Citizens' Investment Co., 49 Cal. App. 257, 193 P. 161. The principal legal question involved in this case is whether the same rule exists where the conditions are caused by a tenant, and thereafter the lease is renewed or a new lease given to the same parties, as was the case here. While no California authorities upon this point have been called to our attention, the question has been passed upon in a number of cases in other jurisdictions. The underlying reason for the rule that a landlord is not responsible for conditions created or maintained upon leased premises by a tenant is the fact that the tenant has exclusive possession of the property, and, the right of entry of the landlord being suspended during the term of the lease, his responsibility for removing objectionable conditions is likewise suspended. It naturally follows that, when a landlord renews a lease or releases the premises to the same tenant, the very making of a new lease shows that at that time the landlord has a right of entry to the premises, and logically, having a right to enter and remedy the defect, if he releases with the dangerous conditions existing, the usual rule then applies that he is liable for injuries resulting from a condition, amounting to a nuisance, which exists at the time the premises are demised. In such a case the Supreme Court of Oregon in Fleischner v. Citizens' Real Estate & Inv. Co., 25 Or. 119, 35 P. 174, 176, said as follows:

"Upon the surrender of the old lease, the company was invested with the right of entry, and, as the nuisance was in existence upon the premises, it must be presumed to have been aware of the fact, and hence it is liable for its continuance under the exception to the general rule that it had demised premises with a nuisance then in existence thereon. The law is well settled that if the tenant creates a nuisance upon the premises during the term, by an unusual or extraordinary use thereof, although the landlord cannot be made chargeable for the consequences in the first instance, yet, if he subsequently renews the lease with the nuisance thereon, he becomes chargeable for its continuance."

In McLaughlin v. Kelly, 230 Pa. 251, 79 A. 552, 554, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 305, the court said:

"If the sidewalk becomes defective while in the occupancy and control of a tenant resulting in injury to a third person, the tenant is liable, and, if the defect existed at the time of the demise, the landlord is responsible to the injured party. This is ruled in many cases. [Citing cases.] The landlord cannot relieve himself from liability by placing the tenant in possession of the property. It is his duty to remove the nuisance or defect before he delivers the premises to the tenant, and, if injury results on account of his failure to perform this duty, he is not relieved from liability by reason of the tenant's possession. To relieve a landlord from liability under such circumstances would be, as said by Barrows, J., in Campbell v. Portland Sugar Co., 62 Me. 552, 16 Am. Rep. 503, contrary to public policy and substantial justice, for it would not infrequently operate to deprive the injured party of all remedy except against an irresponsible tenant through whom a negligent landlord would reap the profits, without bearing the responsibilities of his proprietorship.

"While the defendant had been the owner of the property for 20 years or more, it seems that during all that time it had been in possession of a tenant. As noted above, the defendant let the premises until April 1, 1905, and during the preceding January he relet to the same tenant for a term of three years from April 1, 1905. The accident occurred in November, 1906. It was claimed by the plaintiff on the trial, and she submitted testimony to show, that the defect in the sidewalk existed at the time the premises were let to the tenant who was in possession when the plaintiff fell in the hole and was injured. It is contended by the defendant that by reason of the tenancy he was not in possession of the premises and therefore could not have repaired the grating. But this position is not tenable. The ground of the defendant's liability for the nuisance is that it existed at a time when he had the opportunity or power to abate or remove it and failed to do so. When the lease was executed and the term was created, the finding of the jury is that the defect existed. It was then his duty before renewing the lease to have abated the nuisance. It was within his power to do so, and his failure to exercise that power imposes liability. 'Nor do I perceive how the liability of the landlord in such cases,' says Magie, J., in Ingwersen v. Rankin, 47 N. J. Law, 18, 54 Am. Rep. 109, 'will be diminished by the fact that he renewed the tenant's lease without retaking actual possession. Such a conclusion would be opposed to the principles creating and governing his liability. If a nuisance is created during a term already existing, no liability falls on the landlord pending that term, for the reason that he has no legal means of abating the nuisance. He cannot enter upon his tenant's possession for that purpose, and would be a trespasser if he did so. But when the term expires his right of entry and power to abate at once arise, and for that reason a liability commences. If he declines to re-enter and abate the nuisance, and relets the premises, the liability which arose at the termination of the term will be neither discharged nor abated. The test of his liability in such case is his power to have remedied the wrong. If he has, but fails to exercise, such power, his liability remains. The cases seem to be uniform in this view.' The same doctrine prevails in England [citing cases]."

In Clancy v. Byrne, 56 N. Y. 129, 15 Am. Rep. 391, it was held that a landlord is not responsible for injuries caused by conditions existing upon the premises during the continuance of the lease, if the premises are in good repair when the lease is made but later become dangerous, unless he has expressly agreed to keep the premises in repair, or unless he has renewed the lease after the need of repair has shown itself. To the same effect, see Matthews v. De Groff, 13 App. Div. 356, 43 N. Y. S. 237; Lusk v. Peck, 132 App. Div. 426, 116 N. Y. S. 1051. In Timlin v. Standard Oil Co. et al., 126 N. Y. 514, 27 N. E. 786, 22 Am. St. Rep. 845, it was held that, where the owner of premises knows, or by the exercise of reasonable care can ascertain, that there is upon the premises a nuisance dangerous to the public or to an adjoining owner, it is his duty to abate the nuisance before leasing the property; and, further, that, if he leases the property without doing this, he is liable to any one injured in consequence of the nuisance, although he himself did not create the same.

[4, 5] In the case before us, if the condition of the premises in question, at the time the property was re-leased to Kavanagh & Twohy in November, 1926, was so dangerous as to constitute a menace to the property of the plaintiffs, and was such as would, inevitably, with the coming of high water in Santiago creek in times of natural floods, cause the waters of this creek to be deflected and thrown against the west bank of the creek, near and along plaintiffs' land in such a manner as to undermine the same, these conditions were such an encroachment upon the rights of plaintiffs as to constitute a nuisance. Whether or not such was the case was a question of fact. People v. Park and Ocean R. R. Co., 76 Cal. 156, 18 P. 141; Blanc v. Klumpke, 29 Cal. 156; People v. Davidson, 30 Cal. 379. It was therefore proper to submit this question to the jury, which was done. The jury was instructed that, if they found from a preponderance of the evidence that Kavanagh & Twohy excavated a channel near and along the boundary line of the property of the city and of the plaintiffs, and along the foot of the west bank of the creek, and thereby lowered the natural bed of the creek, and lowered and diverted the natural channel thereof, and such diverting and lowering caused, or would cause, the water in the creek to flow with increased depth and force against the west bank of the creek, and that this was causing, and would cause, an erosion of this bank, and would cause water to flow upon or against the plaintiffs' premises which would not have otherwise done so, then Kavanagh & Twohy are liable for having created a nuisance and for any damage resulting therefrom. The jury was further instructed that, if a nuisance was thus created during the term of the George A. Simpson lease, and if said nuisance continued and was in existence when that lease was vacated and a new lease made to Kavanagh & Twohy, then the city of Orange is also liable for the continuance of such nuisance and from any damages resulting therefrom. Further, that, if at the time of the second lease to Kavanagh & Twohy a nuisance existed upon the property, the city of Orange is liable for the continuance thereof and the injuries resulting therefrom; that, upon the vacating and setting aside of the George A. Simpson lease, the city of Orange had a right of entry to the property, with the right to enter thereon and abate any nuisance existing; and that, if it failed to exercise such right and to abate any such nuisance, it was also liable.

[6] A number of other instructions along this line were given, which, all taken together, correctly instructed the jury as to the law in this regard. The jury were definitely instructed that, if they found a nuisance had been created upon the property during the first lease, which was still there when the second lease was entered into, the city was also liable for any damages sustained by the plaintiffs by reason of such nuisance. It was thus left to the jury whether the dredging done under the first lease constituted a nuisance, and also whether this nuisance continued and still existed when the second lease was executed. Appellant contends that certain language used in instructions 7 and 8, to wit, "caused, was causing and would cause the water flowing in said creek to flow upon or against the plaintiffs' premises which water would not have thus flowed but for such excavating," indicated to the jury that they could award damages for injuries that might occur in the future. Not only does the context show that this language referred to damage already caused, but, in another instruction covering the measure of damages, these were limited to those already suffered.

While a number of objections are made by the appellant to various instructions given, it is unnecessary to treat them individually, as they all go to the proposition that it was necessary to show specific negligence on the part of the city, and that the city was not liable for conditions created by Kavanagh & Twohy. The views we have expressed upon the fundamental question involved render it unnecessary to go into detail in reference to each instruction complained of. Taking all of the instructions together, we feel that the jury were fully and fairly instructed as to the law, in view of the evidence shown by the record. See Henderson v. Los Angeles Tractor Co., 150 Cal. 689, 89 P. 976; Davis v. Button, 78 Cal. 247, 18 P. 133, 20 P. 545.

[7] Complaint is also made of the refusal of the court to give an instruction based upon the claim that the proximate cause of the injuries to plaintiffs' land was the narrowing of the stream bed shortly above the point of injury, and the consequent deflection of the water by causes other than the excavations in the bed of the stream. This was fully covered by at least three instructions, where some such phrase as "which water would not have thus flowed but for such excavating, dredging, lowering and diverting" was included. The jury were thus instructed that, unless they found that the waters of the creek were diverted and thrown against the bank in question by the excavating and dredging complained of, in a manner that would not have otherwise occurred, they should not find for the plaintiffs. It was hardly necessary to repeat that, if the injury was caused by this other independent condition, the defendants were not liable.

After an examination of the voluminous record and briefs herein, we feel that the case was fully and fairly presented to the jury, and that the only serious question of law involved, as heretofore indicated, must be decided in favor of the respondents.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BATEMAN. *

Cr. 1590.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 2, California.

Dec. 2, 1930.

Rehearing Granted Dec. 17, 1930.

1. Criminal law ⇨112(9).

Superior court of county where property was stolen or received had jurisdiction of prosecution for receiving stolen goods (Pen. Code, §§ 496, 781).

Pen. Code, § 496, provides for the punishment of every person who, for his own gain, buys or receives any personal property, knowing it to have been stolen. Section 781 provides that when public offense is committed in part in one county and in part in another, or acts or effects thereof constituting or requisite to consummation of offense occur in two or more counties, jurisdiction is in either county.

2. Criminal law ⇨422(6).

Where there was evidence of conspiracy charged, evidence on that subject was admissible, though consisting of statements of third persons out of defendant's presence.

Defendant was charged with receiving stolen goods and with conspiracy. He was acquitted on conspiracy charge, but there was no objection nor motion calling for ruling limiting use of the evidence.

3. Criminal law ⇨673(2).

Evidence admissible on conspiracy charge and admitted without request for limitation of use could be used for all relevant purposes.

4. Criminal law ⇨1036(3).

Objection that evidence admissible on conspiracy charge should not have been used in support of other charge could not be first made on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James G. Conlan, Judge.

L. L. Bateman was convicted of receiving stolen goods, and, from the judgment and an order denying a new trial, he appeals.

Affirmed.

Frank P. Doherty and H. A. I. Wolch, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

STURTEVANT, J.

The grand jury presented an indictment against L. L. Bateman, Raymond Bateman, James Arp, and W. C. Dorris. The indictment was framed in two counts. In the first count it was charged that the defendants conspired to commit the offense of receiving stolen goods. In the second count it was charged that the defendants committed the offense of receiving stolen goods. The defendants pleaded not guilty. A trial was had before the trial court sitting with a jury. The jury returned a verdict acquitting the defendant L. L. Bateman on the conspiracy charge, and it returned a verdict convicting him on the other charge. From a judgment entered on the verdict and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, that defendant has appealed.

The transcript contains upwards of 1,000 pages. During the trial 50 or 60 witnesses were called and examined. Some of the witnesses gave evidence regarding acts and declarations of the alleged conspirators. Other witnesses testified to other facts and circumstances, but the defendant does not claim that the trial court erred in ruling on the admission of evidence or in giving instructions.

[1] The defendant claims the court, from which the appeal was taken, had no jurisdiction to try the action. This claim rests on the fact that the record does not contain direct evidence that the act of "receiving" the property was committed by the defendant in said county. If it was so "received" in San Francisco, the trial court had jurisdiction. The evidence shows that the property was stolen in San Francisco, and, if the defendant "received" it in Kern county, the superior court of either county had jurisdiction to try the action. Pen. Code, § 781. The statute (section 496, Pen. Code), defining the crime, the commission of which the defendant stands convicted, provides: "Every person who for his own gain, * * * buys or receives any personal property, knowing the same to have been stolen; * * * is punishable." Manifestly, said property may be stolen in one county and "received" in another county. Section 781 of the Penal Code provides: "When a public offense is committed in part in one county and in part in another, or the acts or the effects thereof constituting or requisite to the consummation of the offense occur in two or more counties, the jurisdiction is in either county." People v. Disperati, 15 Cal. App. 120, 113 P. 889, and People v. Stakem, 40 Cal. 599, contain nothing to the contrary. Neither case rested on section 496, Penal Code.

[2] The defendant claims that, in the absence of evidence of a conspiracy, statements or conversations by third persons out of the presence of the defendant and not a part of res gestæ are inadmissible. Conceding that such is a correct statement of the law, the point is not presented by the facts in the record. Here there was some evidence of a conspiracy, and the rule contended for has no application. The issue of conspiracy was present at all times until the jury brought in a verdict of not guilty as to the count charging conspiracy. Hence, evidence on that subject was admissible. No objection or motion was made which had the effect of bringing forth a ruling by the trial court as to the admissibility of such evidence as proof of the charge of conspiracy or which limited the use which the jury might make of the evidence contained in the record. Hence there was nothing on which the defendant may predicate error on the part of the trial court in admitting the evidence.

[3, 4] In this connection the defendant claims the verdict was contrary to the evidence. The point rests on the fact that the defendant was acquitted on the count charging conspiracy, and the defendant claims that there is no evidence in the record proving the other count. This contention assumes there is no other evidence in the record. But there is a large amount of other evidence in the record. The real point is the defendant complains because perchance the jury used and acted on the declarations of conspirators. It is true there was much evidence offered by the prosecution proving or tending to prove many declarations and acts of the alleged conspirators made or done against an alleged coconspirator. Such evidence was admitted to prove the count charging a conspiracy. No objection was made, and as the case then stood, the evidence was admissible and no objection could properly have been made. As the evidence admitted was competent to prove the issue of conspiracy, but incompetent to prove the other issues on trial, the defendant should have made an application for an order limiting the use for which such evidence was admitted. But he did not do so. Therefore, the evidence went into the record unrestricted and thereafter it could be used for all relevant purposes. 23 C. J. 56, § 1798; 10 Cal. Jur. 1054, § 305; Lucy v. Davis, 163 Cal. 611, 616, 126 P. 490; Menefee v. Raisch Imp. Co., 78 Cal. App. 785, 789, 248 P. 1031. Moreover, as the evidence was in the record, it was the duty of the jury to consider it, it was the duty of the trial court to consider it at all stages of the case, and an objection may not be made for the first time in a court of review. McCloud v. O'Neill, 16 Cal. 392, 397; Curia v. Packard, 29 Cal. 194; Janson v. Brooks, 29 Cal. 214, 223; Mercantile Trust Co. of San Francisco v. Sunset Road Oil Co., 176 Cal. 461, 466, 168 P. 1037; Parsons v. Easton, 184 Cal. 764, 769, 195 P. 419; Yule v. Miller, 80 Cal. App. 609, 616, 252 P. 733; Fishel v. Ball, 83 Cal. App. 128, 133, 256 P. 493.

Much of the evidence given during the trial was given by Mrs. Wells. Some statements were made in the briefs to the effect that she was an accomplice. However, the defendant conceded that, if the defendant received the stolen property before he and Mrs. Wells made a certain trip to San Francisco and if the case made by the prosecution does not rest on the fact that defendant received said property in San Francisco after he and Mrs. Wells arrived in San Francisco, then and in that event Mrs. Wells was not an accomplice. It was the theory of the prosecution, and there was evidence showing, that he received the property several months prior to said trip. Therefore, the point need not be discussed any further.

We find no error in the record. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

BURROUGHS, Justice pro tem.

This is an action upon a contract alleged in the complaint to have been entered into between the plaintiff and the defendants. The cause was tried by the court with a jury, and a verdict in favor of the defendants was returned. Judgment was entered in accordance with the verdict. The plaintiff appeals.

The appeal is based upon the ground that the jury was not justified in finding for the defendants because the uncontradicted testimony of the plaintiff shows that he accepted the defendants' offer and that therefore the parties were bound by a contract. The offer referred to consisted of a letter written by the defendants to the plaintiff as follows:

"Petaluma Power & Water Co.

"144 Main Street,

"Petaluma, Calif.

"March 24th, 1927.

"Mr. L. F. Cowan, 155 Montgomery St., San Francisco, Calif.

"Dear Sir: In the matter of our conversation at the office of my brother on the 22nd instant, and your offer, at that time, of par for the Common Stock, the Preferred Stock and the issued bonds of the Petaluma Power and Water Company.

"I have had this matter up with Messrs. Doyle and Maclay, and they refused to accept the aforesaid offer. As a result of our deliberation I am authorized to advise you the lowest figure that will be accepted by the Company for its plant is as follows:

3000 shares of Common Stock at
$115.00	$345,000.00
100 Bonds at $100.00.....	100,000.00
860 shares of Preferred Stock at
$100	86,000.00
Total	$531,000.00

"This price will exist only and until the expiration of the option of Mr. Mellersh which expires on March 31st, 1927.

"Very truly yours,

"R. M. Hill

"Thomas Maclay

"Frank P. Doyle."

This letter was good as an offer of sale from its date until March 31, 1927. The plaintiff, in answer to a question by his counsel, said: "On March 30th, 1927, about two o'clock in the afternoon, I called Mr. Ray Hill * * * at the office of the Petaluma Power and Water Company, in Petaluma. I was informed that he was at his home at Sebastopol. I then called Mr. Hill at Sebastopol. I told him that I had his letter of March 24th, of 1927, before me, that I accepted his offer as outlined in his communication of March 24th, 1927. I then asked Mr. Hill when he could deliver his securities. Mr. Hill stated it would be necessary for him to consult his associates, which he would do, and call me back that afternoon."

Upon this subject defendant Ray Hill testified as follows:

"Q. With reference to a telephone conversation, or telephone conversations, as of March 30th, 1927, do you recall the substance of the conversation which you had on the telephone with Mr. Cowan on that day? A. No.

"Q. You do not recall what was said by him or by you? A. I have a faint recollection that he called on the phone wishing to arrange a meeting, which meeting was arranged for and which meeting was held at Petaluma on the first day of April.

"Q. That is all you remember of the conversation? A. That is all I remember.

"Q. After the first conversation, did you communicate with your associates, Messrs. Maclay and Doyle? A. I communicated with my associates to arrange a meeting."

Appellant contends that his testimony that he accepted the offer of March 24, 1927, being uncontradicted, was binding on all parties to the action, and could not be arbitrarily rejected by the jury. There can be no question that it is a general rule that uncontradicted evidence cannot be arbitrarily rejected, unless the evidence is inherently improbable. An array of authorities are cited to that effect. Tillotson v. Findley, 87 Cal. App. 654, 262 P. 438; Walker v. Clark, 80 Cal. App. 520, 252 P. 334; Caldwell v. Weiner (Cal. App.) 258 P. 125; Giannini v. Southern Pacific Co., 98 Cal. App. 126, 276 P. 618; Hayward v. Rogers, 62 Cal. 348. The foregoing cases support the general rule above cited, but Caldwell v. Weiner, 258 P. 125, was decided in the District Court of Appeal. It contains language which seems to support the views of appellant. The cause was, however, taken over by the Supreme Court, and in the opinion of that court, reported at 203 Cal. 543, 264 P. 1100, 1101, it is said: "It would seem that this case, with all the circumstances appearing in the record, comes within the rule of Blanc v. Connor, 167 Cal. 719, 141 P. 217, and Davis v. Judson, 159 Cal. 121, 113 P. 147, to the effect that while it is a general rule that the uncontradicted testimony of a witness to a particular fact may not be disregarded, but should be accepted by the court as proof of the fact, this rule has its exceptions, and the most positive testimony may be contradicted by the circumstances in evidence in connection with the matter which satisfy the court of its falsity and the manner of the witness in testifying may impress the court with a doubt as to the accuracy of his statement and influence it to disregard his positive testimony as to a particular fact."

[1, 2] In Davis v. Judson, 159 Cal. 121, at page 128, 113 P. 147, 150, it is held: "The most positive testimony of a witness may be contradicted by inherent improbabilities as to its accuracy contained in the witness' own statement of the transaction, or there may be circumstances in evidence in connection with the matter, which satisfy the court of its falsity. The manner of the witness in testifying may impress the court with a doubt as to the accuracy of his statement, and influence it to disregard his positive testimony as to a particular fact, and, as it is within the province of the trial court to determine what credit and weight shall be given to the testimony of any witness, this court cannot control its finding or conclusion denying the testimony credence, unless it appears that there are no matters or circumstances which at all impair its accuracy." Dierks v. Newsom, 49 Cal. App. 789, 194 P. 518; Quock Ting v. United States, 140 U. S. 417, 11 S. Ct. 733, 851, 35 L. Ed. 501; Pacific Coast, etc., Fruit Co. v. Sheriffs, 31 Cal. App. 136, 159 P. 986; section 1847, Code Civ. Proc. Other cases in point could be cited, but we deem the foregoing cases establish the rule that the uncontradicted testimony of a witness may not be rejected by the court, unless it is inherently improbable. The question as to what circumstances render the testimony of a witness subject to rejection rests primarily with the trial court or jury who heard the witness, noted his demeanor on the witness stand, heard all of the other testimony, and was thus in a better position to pass upon the testimony and its weight and its sufficiency. In the light of this rule, we will now examine the evidence to ascertain if the statement of plaintiff to the effect that in the conversation held on March 30, 1927, with R. M. Hill he told the latter he accepted his offer contained in the letter of March 24, 1927, is of such a nature that there are no matters or circumstances which at all impair its accuracy.

[3, 4] It is claimed by the respondents that the testimony of the plaintiff is inherently improbable, and therefore the court had the power to reject such testimony. D. B. Hill testified that he saw the plaintiff at a meeting about 10 or 10:30 a. m. April 1, 1927. There were present at said meeting Messrs. Cowan, Doyle, Maclay, R. M. Hill, Geary, and the witness. During that meeting Mr. Cowan wanted to buy the common stock of the corporation for $100 a share. Mr. Cowan and the witness had quite an argument, and he did quite a bit of figuring with Cowan to show that the common stock was worth $115 per share. Mr. Cowan further testified that he had no knowledge that the defendants did not have all the stock in the company until the meeting at Petaluma on April 1, 1927. The testimony of Dolph B. Hill is to the effect that on February 12th and 14th he told Mr. Cowan that they did not own all the stock, but that they did own the control with the interest of their friends. Mr. T. C. Mellersh testified that at the meeting of February, 1927, he was present, and that Hill told Cowan that among them they had control of the company. Thos. Maclay testified to the same effect as the last witness. There was also a letter dated February 28, 1927, written by Mr. Cowan to defendant R. M. Hill, making an offer of purchase of the stock of the company, in which it is said, "You will give notice immediately to all of your stockholders of the effect of this agreement." Mr. Cowan also testified that the first time he ever heard that he would be required to put up a cash payment of $50,000 was when it was put in the substituted contract sent to his office; that the subject was never mentioned at the meeting of April 1, 1927. That such conversation did take place at the meeting above named is testified to by Dolph B. Hill and Thomas Maclay. According to the testimony of D. B. Hill during the meeting of April 1, 1927, Cowan wanted to buy the common stock for $100. The company had on hand a surplus of some $33,000 on April 1, 1927. Cowan said the subject of this surplus was not discussed. Other witnesses say that it was the subject-matter of discussion, and that he was advised that it would not be considered in the trade. Witness D. B. Hill testified that to his knowledge Cowan had never accepted the offer of $115 for the common stock. The most he ever offered was $100. Mr. Maclay testified that at this meeting of April 1, 1927, Cowan argued that the stock was worth only $100 while Hill was trying to convince him it was worth $115. Cowan did not recall stating at the meeting of April 1, 1927, that on March 31, 1927, if he had sent a telegram that he had written on March 31, 1927, the defendants would have been bound by their letter of March 24, 1927. That he did so state is testified to by D. B. Hill and Thomas Maclay.

From the foregoing it is clear that on material matters the plaintiff has been contradicted. It is also clear that on April 1, 1927, two days after the telephone conversation in which plaintiff testified he accepted the offer to sell made on March 24, 1927, plaintiff and the defendants were engaged in a controversy over the price of the common stock, also over the disposition of the surplus funds. These points might be said to render the testimony of Cowan inherently improbable, when taken in connection with his statement that he closed the contract on March 30th, in accordance with the offer of $115 per share for the stock with no agreement as to the surplus funds on hand. We are of the opinion that it was peculiarly within the province of the jury to determine the weight to be given to all the testimony. They were instructed that: "In determining the credibility of witnesses, the weight and sufficiency of their evidence, you should observe the appearance of the witness upon the stand; the character and manner of testifying; the bias or prejudice, if any appears; their interest or absence of interest in the outcome of the case; their memory or recollection, whether good or bad, clear or indistinct; their opportunity of knowing the facts concerning which they testify; their intelligence; ability to express themselves; their frankness or absence of the same, and any other trait exhibited by the witness which will enable you to properly weigh and consider their evidence with a view of ascertaining and rendering a true and a just verdict."

We deem it unnecessary to detail the evidence any further or to cite any additional authorities.

The judgment is affirmed.

Plaintiff brought an action in the municipal court where, after issue joined, a trial was had resulting in a judgment for defendants. An appeal was taken to the Superior Court, where the judgment was affirmed.

This appeal is from the judgment last mentioned. However, the appellant's brief entirely disregards the provisions of rule VIII of the Rules of the Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal, and falls squarely within the rule as announced in Barnes v. Cocke, 99 Cal. App. 700, 279 P. 190, except that here the brief consists of nine numbered or six printed pages. We there said: "There is no pretense of a heading to show the nature of the point to be discussed. It evidences an entire disregard of the rule—probably on the theory that, since the brief is short, this court could with little labor read it in its entirety. In cases of a direct violation of the rule, where are we to draw the line, if not by requiring a substantial compliance with the rule? If four pages can be filed without incurring the penalty of dismissal, why not twice or five or ten times that number, and so on until the rule becomes a dead letter? We think we must require compliance with the rule in all cases."

IRA F. THOMPSON, J.

[1, 2] An action was commenced in the municipal court by the plaintiffs to recover from the defendants a real estate commission. Judgment went for the defendants, whereupon the plaintiffs appealed to the Superior Court. There the judgment was reversed as to the defendant Dolfin, and she has appealed to this court from that part of the judgment, and has also appealed from an order of the Superior Court denying a motion to dismiss the appeal to that court from the municipal court. No brief has been filed on behalf of this appellant, and, of course, the appeal should be dismissed for that reason. However, the Superior Court affirmed the judgment as to the defendant De Garmo, and the plaintiffs have appealed from that part of the judgment. They are in little better position. In the brief filed by these appellants, no effort is made to comply with rule VIII of the Rules of the Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal. The points are not presented separately under an appropriate heading indicating or showing the nature of the point to be discussed, and, on the authority of Fletcher v. Original Pit Barbecue (Cal. App.) 293 P. 874, this day decided, ought to be dismissed.

Contrivance to create liability on theory of attractive nuisance must be artificial and uncommon and capable of being rendered safe without destroying usefulness.

3. Negligence ⇨134(4).

Facts did not warrant recovery on theory of attractive nuisance for death of boy from injuries when struck by ice falling from loading platform.

The facts disclosed that ice used in icing refrigerators was moved along loading platform, and that frequently small pieces of ice would fall into space between car and platform, and that on two occasions a whole block of ice slipped and fell to ground, one of which caused injuries resulting in death. The evidence further established that children were accustomed to collect on right of way and attempted to secure chunks of ice, though they had been repeatedly warned and chased away from premises.

BARNARD, J.

This is an action for damages for the death of the minor son of the plaintiff. At the close of plaintiff's evidence, a motion for a nonsuit was granted by the trial court, and, from the judgment which followed, this appeal is taken. The facts are not disputed, and the only question presented is whether or not the case falls within the scope of the attractive nuisance doctrine.

Briefly stated, the facts are as follows: For more than eleven years prior to August 29, 1929, defendant had operated a plant in the city of Orange, Cal., situated along the tracks of the Santa Fe Railroad. As a part of its business, defendant iced refrigerator cars as they stood upon the railroad track. This was done by means of an ice-loading platform about 8 feet in width and 80 feet in length, and a chute leading from the platform to the top of the cars. There was a space of about 3½ feet between the platform and the side of the car, and the platform was a few inches higher than the top of the car. The defendant had built a fence around the outer edge of the platform to keep the ice from falling off. In the process of icing cars, blocks of ice weighing about 300 pounds each were moved along this loading platform to a point opposite the opening in the top of a car, where a gate in the fence was raised, and the ice taken to the car over a chute or trough about 5 feet long and 2½ or 3 feet wide, with side rails upon it. The ice was moved along this chute by means of a large pair of tongs suspended from a block and tackle. At the opening into the top of the car, the blocks of ice were broken into thirds for the purpose of compact loading. As a result of breaking the blocks of ice into thirds, small pieces of ice broken off would frequently fall into the space between the car and the loading platform, or upon the further side of the car. Quite frequently such pieces of ice would weigh 25 pounds or more. On two occasions during the eleven years, a whole block of ice slipped from control and fell to the ground. It was the second time this occurred that gave rise to this action. On August 29, 1929, a cake of ice slipped and fell to the ground between the car and the platform, striking the minor son of plaintiff, and causing injuries from which he later died. At that time the boy was 9 years 9 months and 26 days old.

It was the custom of children of all ages from 7 to 20, a number of whom lived near the plant, to collect almost daily on the railroad right of way. As to what these children did there, the record shows the following: "They would gather on the railroad right of way and would keep their distance, and the first opportunity they had they would dart in and get those little chunks of ice." "They would be standing along the track away from the cars until ice would drop down and then they would jump for it and grab for it." One witness testified that the children were not playing; that they were sitting or standing around the railroad track, and would pick up ice. Another witness, in response to a question as to what these children usually did while there, testified: "They gather right near the freight cars and watch pieces of ice fall from the top of the cars, and then when they had a chance pick it up and put it in the little cart and took it home." This same witness testified that he had seen the boy who was killed load such ice in his wagon and take it home; that he had been doing this for some time. Later he testified that he saw the boy carry the ice away from the premises, but did not know whether he used it himself or where he took it.

The defendant's employees, who were loading the cars, knew of this custom of the children in the neighborhood, and were all instructed to keep the children away. The evidence shows that children were chased away by employees on innumerable occasions; that the defendant had a standing complaint with the chief of police asking that the children be kept away from there; and that it was a usual practice for police officers to call and chase the youngsters away. One of the men who was helping to ice the car at the time the boy was hurt, testified as follows:

"Q. You had not seen the boy around there before the accident, had you? A. No, there hadn't been any children around that day.

"Q. And you had been keeping watch to see that they kept away from there? A. Well, we kind of kept watch on them all the time because we would have to if they would run up under the cars.

"Q. What? A. They would sneak under the cars and every other way to get ice.

"Q. What would you do when you would see them there? A. We would chase them away."

Another witness testified that during the summer of 1929 he saw the employees of defendant chasing the boys away on three or four occasions. There was evidence that the boy who was killed had been thus warned and driven away. The defendant's loading foreman testified that he did not see the deceased around the plant on the day he was killed, prior to the accident; that he had previously seen him around on from six to ten different occasions; that he had told him to get out of there because it was dangerous while they were working; and that some three days before the accident, he pulled the boy by the arm from between the car and the loading platform, and then went back and got his little cart and took it to him, telling him to keep out. The boy's father testified that he had not given his consent or permission to visit these premises; that every time he found he had been there he reprimanded him for it; that he scolded him because it was dangerous; that the boy would promise he would not return there; that he told him not to go to the plant because he knew there was danger of his being crushed; that he did this on at least two occasions, the last one a little more than a week before the boy was hurt; and that these warnings were in Spanish and the boy understood them. The boy's mother testified that she scolded him for going there, and that sometimes she went over and brought him back and whipped him for going.

[1] The only question involved in this appeal is whether this case comes within the attractive nuisance rule, an exception to the general rule that a defendant is not liable for injuries sustained by a trespasser upon his premises. Peters v. Bowman, 115 Cal. 345, 47 P. 113, 598, 599, 56 Am. St. Rep. 106. As was said by Chief Justice Beatty in the case just cited: "The owner of a thing dangerous and attractive to children is not always and universally liable for an injury to a child tempted by the attraction. His liability bears a relation to the character of the thing, whether natural and common, or artificial and uncommon; to the comparative ease or difficulty of preventing the danger without destroying or impairing the usefulness of the thing; and, in short, to the reasonableness and propriety of his own conduct, in view of all surrounding circumstances and conditions. As to common dangers, existing in the order of nature, it is the duty of parents to guard and warn their children, and, failing to do so, they should not expect to hold others responsible for their own want of care. But, with respect to dangers specially created by the act of the owner, novel in character, attractive and dangerous to children, easily guarded and rendered safe, the rule is, as it ought to be, different.

[2] Originally, the attractive nuisance doctrine was applied only to machinery under certain circumstances, but in this state its application has been extended to various appliances and contrivances. Certain conditions, however, are uniformly held to be essential to bring a case within the doctrine.

"The contrivance must be artificial and uncommon, as well as dangerous, and capable of being rendered safe with ease without destroying its usefulness, and of such a nature as to virtually constitute a trap into which children would be led on account of their ignorance and inexperience. The principle of the rule having been recognized and firmly established in this state, it has been applied to a variety of machines, appliances, and contrivances coming within this definition." (Citing cases.) Morse v. Douglas (Cal. App.) 290 P. 465, 457.

In Giannini v. Campodonico, 176 Cal. 548, 169 P. 80, 82, the court said: "Moreover, it is an essential ingredient of a cause of action to which the 'turnstile cases' doctrine applies that the minor should have been attracted to the premises by a childish curiosity and desire to play thereon."

[3] In the instant case, it is not contended that the instrumentality itself, the loading equipment, was dangerous or attractive, or that boys in general or this boy in particular were attracted by it. The complaint and all of the evidence shows that the boys were not attracted by any contrivance, but by the ice itself. The only danger that appears is the danger of being hit by falling ice while the loading facilities were being used. The loading of all kinds of heavy objects is common. The falling of such objects is in the regular order of nature, and danger from the same is always present wherever this process is carried on any distance above the ground. So far as we know, the attractive nuisance doctrine has never been applied to the danger incident to ordinary loading operations. Every place where such operations are carried on has some danger in it; in fact, such work cannot be carried on without some element of danger. Not only was the contrivance used here a common one, and one that did not arouse the childish curiosity and desire for play of these children, inexperienced or otherwise, but the danger involved, the danger from the falling of heavy objects, was a natural and common danger. Even young children very early realize such a danger. Not only may it be presumed that normal children of about 10 years of age would understand such a natural and common danger, but actual knowledge here appears. The evidence is uncontradicted that all of the boys who had been around these premises did not remain between the car and the loading platform, but stayed away, sitting or standing on the railroad tracks; that they watched the pieces of ice fall; and watched their chance to dart in and obtain the same, even at times sneaking under the cars for the purpose. The evidence also shows that the boys in general were frequently warned of the danger, and that this particular boy had not only been warned, even to the extent of being whipped, but had promised to stay away. As was said in Faylor v. Great Eastern Q. Min. Co., 45 Cal. App. at page 202, 187 P. 101, 104, in speaking of the danger existing in an artificial pond of water: "The danger was not a concealed danger and that children from birth are taught, generally speaking, to avoid the danger of drowning, at least when the danger is open to their eyes." In the instant case, the children were not only so taught, but the danger was both open to their eyes and frequently seen. In such cases, where the danger is so open and obvious that the children must have seen it, our courts have refused to apply the doctrine of attractive nuisance. Peters v. Bowman, supra; Loftus v. Dehail, 133 Cal. 214, 65 P. 379.

Not only did these children, including the deceased, know the danger, having watched the ice fall, but they were not attracted by the childish curiosity and desire to play which gave rise to the doctrine relied on. They were attracted by the ice, a by-product of the work carried on. This is alleged in the complaint, and conclusively shown by the evidence. They were not playing, but were getting something. All of the evidence is to the effect they carried the ice away in little wagons. Whether they took it home or otherwise disposed of it, and even though it may be said that the ice having been discarded was not being purloined, there can be no doubt that they were appropriating it, and that there was a little more to their actions than the playful sport of children. While the attractive nuisance doctrine has been rather liberally extended in this state, it has never been extended from machinery or a contrivance to such an attraction as food or fruit or ice. If the attraction, which constitutes the fundamental part of the exception, were thus extended, an intolerable burden would be added to business.

Nor can it be said that these loading operations were capable of being rendered safe with ease without destroying their usefulness. As was said in Peters v. Bowman, supra: "A turntable can be rendered absolutely safe, without destroying or materially impairing its usefulness, by simply locking it. A pond cannot be rendered inaccessible to boys by any ordinary means." These railroad tracks could not have been locked or fenced. The record shows that respondent had taken unusual precautions, far in excess of those usually taken in icing cars, to prevent ice from falling. This, with the rather unusual efforts shown to have been made by employees and police to drive the boys away, and the testimony to the effect that the boys would keep their distance along the railroad tracks and dart in suddenly, and even crawl under the cars, discloses not only a situation not easily rendered safe, but one involving a well-known tendency of young boys quite different from that mere display of childish curiosity which may, through ignorance and inexperience, lead them into a dangerous situation they do not understand. We think the evidence here fails to show that the deceased was too young and inexperienced to appreciate the danger he was running into, and fails to show that he was incapable of contributory negligence. Bradley v. Thompson, 65 Cal. App. 226, at page 232, 223 P. 572. The appellant admits that he knew of the danger in having his child around the ice-loading plant here in question. If he took sufficient steps to warn his child of that danger, the child was aware of it and the doctrine of attractive nuisance did not apply. On the other hand, if he did not sufficiently warn the child, his own negligence bars his recovery.

[4] Appellant argues that the question whether respondent exercised ordinary care in taking precautions to keep the children away from the dangerous situation existing is a question of fact to be left to the jury. However, the burden first rests upon appellant to show that his case comes within an exception to the general rule. The facts being undisputed, it is a question of law whether or not the facts shown bring the case within the exception. Nicolosi v. Clark, 169 Cal. 746, 147 P. 971, L. R. A. 1915F, 638.

The judgment is affirmed.

MARKS, J.

This is an appeal from a judgment entered in the court below, following an order sustaining respondents' general demurrers to appellant's third amended complaint without leave to amend.

The following facts are alleged in the third amended complaint. Appellant at all times material to this action was a real estate broker duly licensed under the laws of the state of California. Respondents were the owners of approximately ninety-eight acres of land in Riverside county, together with personal property, water rights, and water stock. Thomas De Vries was the owner of about eight acres of land in Santa Barbara county.

On November 16, 1921, respondent Green gave appellant the following instrument:

"Nov. 16th

"My dear Mrs. Mitchell—

"You are herewith authorized to sell my property situated in Riverside, consisting of approximately ninety-eight acres (55+acres oranges; 5+acres apricots and peaches, balance hay land but majority susceptible to planting to trees), including all water stock (Gage Canal), farm implements, tractor, tools, etc. for the sum of $110,000; for which services in the event of sale I will pay you fifteen per cent commission on above amount.

"Yours truly,

"A. M. Green."

On October 21, Green had given to appellant another listing of the same property in which he guaranteed that there was an orange crop maturing upon it that would bring a minimum price of $25,000.

Immediately after November 16, 1921, appellant procured and introduced Thomas De Vries to Green as a purchaser ready, willing, and able to purchase the Riverside properties of respondents. The negotiations culminated in a contract bearing date the 8th day of December, 1921, whereby respondents agreed to exchange their Riverside properties for the Santa Barbara property of De Vries. For the purpose of the exchange respondents' property was given a value of $110,000, and De Vries' property of $47,500. The difference in values was to be paid to respondents as follows: By the assumption by De Vries of a $25,000 incumbrance upon the Riverside property and the payment of $37,500 to be made by De Vries and wife to respondents evidenced by three promissory notes secured by deed of trust. The first note was in the principal sum of $12,500 payable on or before July 1, 1923; the second for $15,000 payable on or before July 1, 1924, and the third for $10,000 payable on or before July 1, 1925. All the notes bore interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum and payable semiannually. The agreement recited that the Santa Barbara property was incumbered by a mortgage securing a promissory note in the sum of $12,000 which De Vries agreed to pay on or before January 1, 1922. Title to the Santa Barbara property was to be free and clear of incumbrances, except the second installment of taxes for the fiscal year 1921-1922, and rights of way, easements, reservations, and building restrictions of record, and a lease of the residence on the property which was to be assigned to respondents. It appears from this contract that the exchange was to be completed by January 1, 1922.

It was further alleged that, in consideration of the execution of the exchange agreement, appellant agreed to accept payment of her commission in the sum of $16,500 from the payments made by De Vries on his promissory notes, and that she should be paid in full when 40 per cent. of the sum of $37,500 had been paid by De Vries to respondents.

It was further alleged that De Vries was unable to pay the $12,000 incumbrance on the Santa Barbara property, and that on the 6th day of January, 1922, respondents and De Vries entered into a further exchange agreement modifying the prior contract by relieving him from the payment of this obligation and by De Vries and his wife executing to respondents their promissory note in the principal sum of $12,000 payable ninety days after its date and secured by a crop mortgage on the oranges growing upon the Riverside property. The exchange of properties was then consummated and the various conveyances, notes, mortgages, and deeds of trust executed.

It was further alleged that on November 25, 1922, De Vries commenced an action in the superior court against respondents whereby he sought "to rescind and set aside said agreement of exchange upon the ground of fraud, and to recover damages for such fraud." It was further alleged that on the 27th day of March, 1924, De Vries and respondents compromised and settled their differences. The terms of the compromise are set forth in a written contract from which it appears that De Vries conveyed all of the Riverside property to respondents and quitclaimed the Santa Barbara property to them. Respondents paid to an escrow holder the sum of $2,500 for the purpose of relieving the Riverside property from certain liens and incumbrances which had been permitted to accrue during De Vries' ownership, any balance remaining to be paid to him. The fraud action was dismissed.

There is no allegation that De Vries ever paid respondents or either of them anything on any of the promissory notes. It is admitted by appellant that no part of the principal or interest on the three promissory notes in the total sum of $37,500, out of which she had agreed to accept her commission, had ever been paid.

Appellant relies upon the case of Carl v. Eade, 81 Cal. App. 356, 253 P. 750, for a reversal of the judgment. This case announces the familiar doctrine that one who voluntarily prevents the performance of an act upon which an obligation on his part depends cannot set up nonperformance of this act as a defense in a suit against him. We believe, however, that the facts of the instant case bring it within the rule laid down in the cases of Lindley v. Fay, 119 Cal. 239, 51 P. 333, 334, and Dunne v. Colomb, 192 Cal. 740, 221 P. 912, 913. In the Lindley Case it was held as follows: "Ignoring the question as to the pleading, however, the evidence shows no right of action in the plaintiff. It tends to show an agreement to pay commissions out of the first money received, and no money has ever been received. Under such a contract, the broker is not entitled to compensation when he finds a purchaser ready, willing, and able to purchase on the prescribed terms. There must be a sale and a first payment to entitle him to recover. It is so nominated in the bond."

In the Dunne Case it was said:

"To render such cancellation an act of prevention entailing the consequence claimed by respondent it must be without legal justification. Where the vendee is in default, there is no longer any legal obligation on the vendor to proceed with the performance of the contract. The law gives him the right to regard the contract as at an end. The law prescribes no penalty for the exercise of this right. The default of the vendee, with the consequent destruction of the right of the broker to his commission, was a contingency inherent in the contract, the risk of the occurrence of which was assumed by the broker. * * *

"In the case at bar, the duty of the vendors to carry out the terms of their contract in good faith was at an end upon the default of the vendee. They were under no obligation to sue upon the contract in an attempt to recover the purchase price, although such action, if successful, would have inured to the benefit of the broker. Prince v. Selby, etc., Co., 35 Cal. App. 684, 687, 170 P. 1075; Seymour v. St. Luke's Hospital, 28 App. Div. 119, 50 N. Y. S. 989; McPhail v. Buell, 87 Cal. 115, 25 P. 266."

[1] In the instant case De Vries was in default in the execution of the terms of his contract almost from the moment of its execution. He was unable to pay the incumbrances upon his Santa Barbara property. Respondents waived this obligation and extended his time to pay the indebtedness ninety days. Whether it was ever paid does not appear. De Vries did not pay any portion of the $37,500 on the purchase price of the Riverside property. On March 27, 1924, he was in default in his payments in the sum of $27,500 and the law gave the right to respondents to regard the contract as ended with no penalty attaching to them for their exercise of this right. With the default of De Vries and his failure to pay, the right of the agent to receive her commission failed. The parties are bound by their contract. If the appellant expected to demand her commission from respondents without regard to any payments made by De Vries, she should not have made its payment conditioned and contingent upon De Vries fulfilling the obligations of his contract. Cannon v. Selmser, 85 Cal. App. 783, 260 P. 332.

[2] Appellant agreed that she was to be paid from a certain fund, and it was incumbent upon her to allege the existence of this fund or a valid reason for its nonexistence. Edwards v. Baker, 39 Cal. App. 755, 180 P. 33; Lindley v. Fay, supra. As was said in the case of Vatcher v. Grier, 50 Cal. App. 41, 195 P. 75, 76: "But, as we have seen, payment was postponed by the terms of the agreement until the happening of some future event, i. e., the payment of installments of the purchase price, and therefore it must be made to appear affirmatively that such event has occurred as a condition precedent to plaintiff's right to recover. Van Buskirk v. Kuhns, 164 Cal. 472, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 932, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 710, 129 P. 587. There is here no averment that any of the installments of the trust deed note were ever paid, and it is not shown by the pleading that the fund from which plaintiff's claim should be satisfied at any time materialized; hence no sufficient cause of action is alleged in the complaint."

[3] The payment of 40 per cent. of $37,500 by De Vries to respondents was made a condition precedent to appellant's right to demand and receive her commission. The performance of a condition precedent upon which a recovery depends must be alleged. McNulty v. New Richmond Land Co., 44 Cal. App. 744, 187 P. 97. As appellant failed to allege the existence of the fund out of which she was to be paid, or any lawful reason for its nonexistence, her complaint failed to state a cause of action.

Judgment affirmed.

DEPAOLI et al. v. CLAUS.
Civ. 7324.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California.
Dec. 2, 1930.

1. Appeal and error ⇨999(3).

Jury's finding that collision between automobile and truck was not due to truck driver's failure to yield right of way held conclusive on appeal (St. 1923, p. 517, § 131, as amended by St. 1925, p. 412; Code Civ. Proc. § 1847).

2. Appeal and error ⇨930(1).

Evidence must be viewed on appeal in light most favorable to support verdict.

3. Appeal and error ⇨996.

Jury's finding on evidence from which different inferences might be drawn is conclusive on appeal.

4. Witnesses ⇨245.

Sustaining objection to question previously asked and answered by witness held not error.

5. Appeal and error ⇨1033(3).

Permitting defendant to state distance within which he could stop his automobile, over objection that there was no evidence that he attempted to do so, held not prejudicial to him.

6. Appeal and error ⇨1056(1).

Exclusion of corroborative testimony as to spot on diagram of scene of collision between truck and automobile where broken glass was found held not prejudicial to defendant automobilist.

7. Trial ⇨260(8).

Refusal of instructions on proximate cause, as to which court fully instructed jury, held not error.

8. Trial ⇨260(8).

Refusal of instruction that truck driver was negligent if he drove on highway from private drive at time which was not reasonable or prudent held not error, in view of instructions given (St. 1923, p. 517, § 113(a)).

The court charged the jury that, at time of accident, Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 517), § 113(a), provided that person should drive vehicle on public highway at careful and prudent speed, not greater than is reasonable and proper, and that no person shall drive vehicle on highway at such speed as to endanger life, limb, or property of any person.

9. Automobiles ⇨246(39).

Refusal of instruction that person driving at night is not required to see every object on his half of highway held not error, in view of defendant automobilist's testimony.

Defendant testified that he was traveling about 20 miles per hour when plaintiff's truck suddenly emerged from driveway at point within 5 feet therefrom.

10. Appeal and error ⇨1067.

Refusal of instruction that person driving at night is not required to see every object on his half of highway held not prejudicial error, in view of testimony that defendant's automobile was several hundred feet away when plaintiff's truck crossed highway.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action by J. Depaoli and others, doing business under the fictitious name and style of J.

Ross & Ross, of Redwood City, and Norman S. Meniffee, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

This action was brought to recover damages for injuries to and loss of use of an automobile truck. The defendant filed a cross-complaint for damages for personal injuries and for injuries to his automobile. The litigation grew out of a collision between the vehicles mentioned at a point on the main San Jose-San Francisco highway, which will be hereinafter referred to as the highway, near its intersection with Euclid avenue in San Bruno. It was stipulated that, if plaintiffs were entitled to recover, such recovery should be in the sum of $522.02 for repairs to the truck with whatever amount they might prove they were damaged by loss of its use; further that, if the defendant was entitled to a verdict, he should recover $400 as special damages with whatever general damages, including loss of time, he might prove. A jury found the verdict in favor of plaintiffs for $600. A motion for a new trial was denied, and defendant has appealed from the judgment entered upon the verdict. He contends that the verdict is unsupported; that the court erred in denying his motion for a new trial, in certain of its rulings on the admissibility of evidence, and in its instructions to the jury.

The truck, which was 24 feet long, weighed with its load about 8 tons. It was equipped with acetylene headlights, which were attached to the dashboard between 5 and 6 feet from the ground. The hood, the radiator, the frame, and the bumper all protruded beyond the dashboard. The truck was also equipped with two oil lights in the rear. The automobile was a model T Ford sedan, and was being driven south along the highway. The collision happened at about 1:45 a. m. on December 4, 1928, and there were no eyewitnesses except the drivers of the respective vehicles. The driver of the truck testified that he drove the same with all the lights burning, from a private driveway on the east to the west side of the highway; his intention being to proceed north to San Francisco. The highway at that point is 40 feet wide, and is divided into four traffic lanes, marked on the pavement, each 10 feet in width; the two adjoining the edges of the pavement being the slow traffic lanes and the two in the middle of the highway being used for fast traffic. The truck driver further testified that he stopped before attempting to cross the highway and looked to the north and south. There were no vehicles approaching from the south, but he saw defendant's automobile coming from the north about 600 feet away. He then crossed to the east side of the highway and proceeded north. When the automobile, which, according to this witness, was traveling between 40 and 50 miles per hour, reached a point about 100 feet north of the truck, it turned to its left across the highway and struck the front end of the truck, tearing off the bumper, bending the front portion of the frame, and injuring the motor. According to the defendant, the automobile was proceeding along the extreme westerly portion of the pavement at a speed of about 20 miles per hour, when the truck suddenly appeared, and the collision occurred before he had an opportunity to apply his brakes or change his course. According to the testimony of a traffic officer who arrived on the scene about 15 minutes after the collision, he found the truck facing north, about midway between the east line of the slow and the west line of the fast traffic lane on the east side of the highway, and the automobile off the pavement to the east and about 8 feet from the truck. The officer also testified that he found broken glass on both sides of the middle line of the pavement, and that skid marks were visible on the dividing line between the south-bound slow and fast traffic lanes immediately north of the broken glass. There was also the testimony of a witness to a conversation with the driver of the truck after the collision, from which the negligence of the latter might be inferred. The driver, however, denied the correctness of the witness' version of the conversation.

[1-3] While the driver of a vehicle entering a public highway from a private road or drive must yield the right of way to all vehicles approaching on the highway (Motor Vehicle Act, § 131, Stats. 1925, p. 412), here, according to the driver of the truck, the automobile was several hundred feet away when the truck crossed, and the collision was not due to any failure to observe the above provision. There was nothing inherently improbable in the testimony of this witness when considered in connection with the physical conditions disclosed by the evidence. The jury believed his account of the affair, and his credibility was a question for their determination exclusively. Code Civ. Proc. § 1847. The evidence must be viewed in the light most favorable to support the verdict, and, though different inferences might be drawn from the evidence, a finding by the jury either way thereon is conclusive on appeal. Aronson & Co. v. Pearson, 199 Cal. 295, 249 P. 191.

[4, 5] Objection to a question propounded on the cross-examination of the driver of the truck, but which had been previously asked and answered, was sustained, and the defendant on cross-examination was permitted to state the distance within which he could stop his car; the objection to the last question being that there was no evidence that he attempted to do so. There was no error in the first ruling, and the second, if erroneous, was not prejudicial.

[6] A witness for the defendant was asked to mark on a diagram of the physical conditions at the scene of the collision the spot where broken glass was found. The court suggested that defendant had already shown this, and that the plaintiff would probably not offer evidence in this connection. The defendant did not press the question, and plaintiff offered no evidence on the point. The testimony, although corroborative, was not such that its exclusion can reasonably be said to have prejudiced the defendant.

[7, 8] The defendant offered two instructions with reference to proximate cause which were refused. The court nevertheless fully instructed the jury on this subject, and the refusal was not error. The court charged the jury that "at the time of the accident herein subdivision (a) of section 113 of the Motor Vehicle Act of this state provided that any person driving a vehicle on the public highways of this state shall drive the same at a careful and prudent speed not greater than is reasonable and proper, having due regard to the traffic, surface, and width of the highway, and no person shall drive any vehicle upon a public highway at such a speed as to endanger the life, limb, or property of any person." This was given at defendant's request, and was part of a proposed instruction which contained the following, which the court refused: "You are instructed that this provision of the section is just as much a portion of the law as that which allowed a speed of 40 miles per hour under certain specified conditions at the time of the accident herein. Therefore if you find on a preponderance of the evidence that under the particular circumstances of this case E. Bacigalupi drove on the highway at a time which was not reasonable and proper or careful or prudent or which endangered the life, limb, or property of any person, then as a matter of law he was guilty of negligence." While the rejected portion of the proposed instruction was not improper, it added nothing material to the instruction as given, and its refusal was not erroneous; and the same is true of another similar instruction offered by the defendant.

[9, 10] Defendant also offered the following instruction, which was refused: "You are instructed that the law does not require that a person driving on the highway at night must see every object on his half of the highway." While, as impliedly held in Schurman v. Los Angeles Creamery Co., 81 Cal. App. 758, 254

P. 681, the offered instruction as an abstract statement of law was correct, here it appears that defendant could see objects in front for a distance of 40 to 50 feet, but, according to his testimony, he was traveling about 20 miles per hour when at a point within 5 feet from the driveway the truck suddenly emerged therefrom. Under these circumstances, that he was not bound to have observed the truck before is self-evident, and required no instruction, while, on the other hand, if the truck driver's account was true, the proposed instruction had no application and its refusal was not prejudicial.

The verdict was supported by the evidence, and, after an examination of the entire cause, we find no error which would justify a reversal of the judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. McDONALD et al.

Cr. 1958.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 1, California.

Dec. 4, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 17, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 29, 1930.

1. Intoxicating liquors $\S$ 236 (4).

Evidence, independently of accomplice's testimony, held to show defendants' connection with possession of still (Pen. Code, $\S$ 1111).

The evidence, independently of accomplice's testimony, showed that still was located on accomplice's premises, that one of appealing defendants attempted to throw away note book containing entries tending to connect him with operation of still, accompanied codefendant when latter negotiated lease of building wherein still was located, was on premises in vicinity of such building with lessee about a month later, and sold to accomplice large quantities of sugar delivered to such premises; that book containing entries in his handwriting, tending to connect him with operation of still, was found on codefendant's person; and that second appealing defendant drove automobile onto and away from premises several times while still was in operation.

2. Witnesses $\S$ 67.

Ruling that attorney taking stand cannot argue case held not erroneous as depriving defendant of his attorney's rebuttal testimony.

A witness for the people testified that he was asked during telephone conversation with defendant's attorney to testify falsely that he never saw defendant. Defendant's attorney, at conclusion of people's case, asked whether court knew of any rule against attorney taking stand, to which court replied that attorney who takes stand cannot argue case, but record did not disclose that attorney advised judge that it was he who desired to testify in contradiction of such witness' testimony, and he did not take stand.

3. Criminal law ☞1043(3).

Objection, first made on appeal, that question to accomplice's wife as to when she learned of operation of still on husband's premises was proper to show that she was accomplice, came too late.

Counsel stated, when asked by trial court to state purpose of question, that it was purely impeachment and went generally to witness' credibility.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Emmet H. Wilson, Judge.

Harry McDonald, Victor Pipitone, Frank Cuscio, Mario Bono, and Gabriel De Maria were charged with, and the four last named defendants convicted of, possessing a still, and defendants Pipitone and Cuscio appeal. Affirmed.

W. T. Kendrick, of Los Angeles, for appellant Pipitone.

P. R. Hornbrook, of Los Angeles, for appellant Cuscio.

Moses C. Davis, of Los Angeles, for De Maria.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and William F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HOLLZER, Justice pro tem.

Defendants Pipitone and Cuscio, together with three others named McDonald, Bono, and De Maria, were charged with the crime of possessing a still. The cause having been dismissed as to McDonald, the latter appeared as a witness on behalf of the prosecution. The remaining four defendants were convicted of the offense charged. At the trial defendant Bono admitted he had operated the still under the direction of McDonald, but exonerated all of the other defendants. This appeal is prosecuted by the defendants Pipitone and Cuscio from the judgment of conviction and the orders denying their motions for a new trial.

[1] It is conceded that McDonald was an accomplice. The principal question on this appeal is whether the evidence was sufficient to meet the requirements of section 1111 of the Penal Code with respect to corroboration of his testimony. This section reads as follows:

"A conviction cannot be had upon the testimony of an accomplice unless it be corroborated by such other evidence as shall tend to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense; and the corroboration is not sufficient if it merely shows the commission of the offense or the circumstances thereof.

"An accomplice is hereby defined as one who is liable to prosecution for the identical offense charged against the defendant on trial in the cause in which the testimony of the accomplice is given."

Independently of the testimony of the accomplice McDonald, the evidence showed that the still in question was located on certain premises belonging to McDonald. These premises consisted of two dwelling houses, one being in the rear of the other, together with a garage adjacent to the rear house. The still was in the rear building.

At the time of his arrest the defendant Pipitone attempted to throw away two notebooks which contained entries tending to connect him with the defendants in the operation of the still. It further appeared that the defendant De Maria was accompanied by Pipitone at the time the former negotiated for the lease of the rear building, the lease being taken in De Maria's name. It was also shown that about a month later Pipitone was on the premises in the vicinity of the rear building, and on said occasion he was again accompanied by De Maria. The defendant Pipitone further admitted that he had sold large quantities of sugar to McDonald, which were delivered to these same premises.

Testifying in his own behalf at the trial, Pipitone denied knowing the defendant Cuscio prior to his arrest, and, particularly, denied being present at one Sam Blum's Malt House, in company with Cuscio, De Maria, McDonald and certain other parties, a few weeks prior to said arrest. On the other hand, two witnesses, produced by the prosecution, testified that such meeting had taken place.

Likewise, at the time of De Maria's arrest, there was found on his person a book containing certain entries, shown to be in the handwriting of Pipitone, and which tended to connect him with De Maria's activities in the operation of the still.

With respect to the defendant Cuscio, who was a cousin of De Maria, the evidence given by the witnesses, in addition to the accomplice McDonald, disclosed that Cuscio, on a number of occasions during the period the still was in operation, had driven an automobile to the premises in question; that on each of these occasions he had walked to the rear of the premises, then he departed leaving the automobile for varying lengths of time, and returned later the same day and drove away the automobile.

Defendant Cuscio also denied on the witness stand that he had been acquainted with Pipitone prior to his arrest.

Without undertaking to set forth all of the evidence adduced at the trial, we deem it sufficient to say that our examination of the record convinces us that such evidence, independently of the testimony given by the accomplice McDonald, clearly showed not only a guilty knowledge on the part of the defendants Pipitone and Cuscio as to the possession and operation of the still by McDonald and Bono, but also tended to connect the appellants with such possession.

[2] At the trial a witness named Levin was interrogated by the prosecution concerning a telephone conversation he claimed to have had with either Mr. Hornbrook, attorney for defendants Pipitone and Cuscio, or Mr. Shoop, attorney for the defendant Bono. On recross-examination, this witness testified that, during said telephone conversation, he had been asked to testify that he had never seen the defendants, and that he had answered that he would not lie for anybody.

At the conclusion of the people's case, the following colloquy took place between Mr. Hornbrook and the court:

"Mr. Hornbrook: If the Court please, I don't know whether or not there is any rule against an attorney taking the stand. Does your Honor have any knowledge of it?"

"The Court: The only rule in this department is that an attorney who takes the stand cannot argue the case. He may take the stand, if he wants to, but he is precluded from making any argument to the jury."

It is contended that this ruling deprived the appellants of the testimony of Mr. Hornbrook, their attorney, thereby leaving the testimony of the witness Levin stand uncontradicted. Such ruling is therefore claimed to have been prejudicially erroneous.

An examination of the record, however, fails to disclose that Mr. Hornbrook advised the trial judge that it was he who desired to testify in contradiction of the evidence given by the witness Levin. Furthermore, counsel did not take the witness stand, and hence it cannot be said that any such rebuttal was offered or that these appellants were deprived of any of their rights.

[3] Appellants also attack the ruling of the lower court sustaining an objection to the following question propounded upon cross-examination of the witness Beatrice McDonald: "When was the first time that you did have knowledge that still was in operation there?"

When asked by the court to state the purpose of the question, counsel responded that it was "purely impeachment"; "testing the credibility of the witness"; "just going generally to her credibility as a witness, not any particular point, only her knowledge of what was going on there."

It is contended for the first time on this appeal that this question should have been allowed, because, if the witness had admitted that she had known the still was in operation, such answer would have tended to prove that she was an accomplice, and hence her testimony would not be regarded as corroborating that of her husband.

It is a sufficient answer to this point to say that, counsel having failed to disclose to the trial court that the purpose of this question was the one now advanced before this court, the objection here presented comes too late, and hence the ruling of the lower court must be sustained.

The last contention advanced by appellants is to the effect that the court erred in failing to instruct the jury that the witness Beatrice McDonald, wife of the defendant McDonald, was an accomplice as a matter of law.

It is a sufficient answer to this contention to point out that there was ample evidence tending to show that Mrs. McDonald was not an accomplice.

For the foregoing reasons the judgment of conviction and the orders denying the motions for a new trial are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. A. Smith, Judge.

Action by Henry Edmond Earle against L. S. De Besa and others. Judgment for plaintiff against defendant named, and such defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Sigmund S'Renco and Charles T. Lester, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

J. Russell Morton, of Pasadena, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J.

During the months of May and June, 1925, the defendants were licensed brokers, and as such brokers were fiscal agents for sale of stock of the Pasadena Mercantile Finance Corporation, a California corporation. On or about June 2, 1925, one Edward Sloane, claiming to be a salesman of the defendants, solicited the plaintiff to purchase units of the capital stock of said Pasadena corporation. In the complaint it is alleged that said Sloane, as agent of the defendants, represented to plaintiff that he was a duly licensed and bonded salesman employed by the defendants; that, relying upon the fact of such employment, which had been acknowledged and ratified by defendants in a previous transaction involving the purchase of a unit of capital stock of said corporation, plaintiff delivered to said defendants, through said salesman as such agent of defendants, two corporate gold bonds having a market value of $1,985; that, in consideration thereof, defendants by their said agent agreed to obtain for plaintiff five units of said stock, having a par value of $5,100; that plaintiff was not familiar with the law, and did not know, as defendants did well know at said time, that any issuance of said stock not in accordance with the terms of the permit issued therefor by the commissioner of corporations would be void; that said purported subscription was in violation of said permit, in that no cash payment was made and the value of said bonds was not sufficient to conform with the terms of said permit, and no notes or bonds were given to cover the balance of the price of said stock. Other allegations follow in the complaint, showing false and fraudulent representations by said agent that said stock could be duly and regularly issued in consideration of delivery of said bonds, and that in reliance upon said representations the plaintiff delivered said bonds by delivering the same to said agent. Upon discovery of the falsity of said representations, plaintiff demanded rescission of said purported subscription and a return to plaintiff of said bonds or the value thereof, but defendants refused to consent thereto or to return said bonds or their value.

Judgment having been entered in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant De Besa, said defendant appeals therefrom. The grounds of appeal are as hereinafter stated. Appellant contends that "the court erred for the following reasons." Here follow eight points, numbered 1 to 7, together with No. 9, all of which in some form of attack challenge the authority of Sloane to act as appellant's agent in the described transaction. Point numbered eight contains the assertion that plaintiff and Sloane, in collusion, attempted to commit a fraud upon appellant. Point ten is that the court erred in permitting the plaintiff to testify concerning an offer to compromise alleged to have been made by the defendants. Point eleven is that appellant was "a duly accredited Vice-Consul of the Republic of Peru, in Los Angeles, and that therefore the court was without jurisdiction over the person of appellant."

[1] Jurisdiction over actions against vice consuls is vested in the courts of the United States, "exclusive of the courts of the several States." Judicial Code, § 256; 28 USCA, approved June 30, 1926, § 371. It does not appear, however, that the defendant was a vice consul when the pleadings were filed, or at any time prior to the day when he testified at the trial. In the absence of any citation of any decision to the contrary, we are of the opinion that, the court having acquired jurisdiction over the defendant, such jurisdiction was not divested by the fact that, perhaps on the very day of trial of the action, the defendant was appointed to a vice consular office. If in the meantime the statute of limitations had run against the plaintiff's cause of action, the defendant, by means of this appointment, would be able to completely defeat the enforcement of the claim, without regard to its validity. We think that the principles of international comity, which are the basis of the statute, were not intended to produce any such result.

[2, 3] The evidence is sufficient to prove that the man Sloane was the ostensible agent of the defendant, and for the acts of such ostensible agent the defendant is responsible. The plaintiff delivered his property to Sloane, relying on such agency. Sloane having sold this property and misapplied the proceeds, the defendant was properly held as bound to repay to the plaintiff the value thus lost.

The evidence did not necessarily establish any participation by plaintiff in the fraudulent acts of Sloane. The error assigned in relation to the ruling upon objection to the testimony concerning an offer of compromise is of slight importance, and has no serious bearing upon the result of the action.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. RANNEY.*
Cr. 1131.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

Nov. 24, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 9, 1930.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court.
Dec. 22, 1930.

1. Jury ⇨131(6).

Refusing to permit accused to question jurors whether they would regard accused's prior convictions for felony as evidence in case creating presumption of guilt held error.

Such refusal was error because indictment, in addition to charging grand theft, charged that accused had twice previously been convicted of felony, and accused's defense was interwoven with fact of such prior convictions and that accused would probably be impeached as witness therefor, and he did not gratuitously introduce such facts to jury's attention.

2. Criminal law ⇨369(1).

Evidence of offenses other than charged, except in exceptional cases, is incompetent as proof of crime charged.

3. Jury ⇨97(1).

Accused is entitled to be tried by fair and impartial jury free from bias or prejudice.

4. Criminal law ⇨1035(6).

Accused's request for permission to examine jurors to determine whether they would indulge presumption of guilt because of previous felony convictions held sufficient to preserve question for appellate review.

After ruling refusing to permit accused's counsel to question jurors whether they would indulge in presumption of guilt by reason of two previous felony convictions against accused, accused's counsel stated that in order to protect record, if counsel decided to propound question in some variety or form, court would understand counsel was not disrespectful but desired ruling on it, to which court replied that accused was fully protected by record.

5. Larceny ⇨70(2).

Instruction twenty-one times telling jury to convict of grand theft if they found defendant "unlawfully" took money held erroneous (Pen. Code, § 511).

Instruction was erroneous because it did not define "unlawful" as requiring finding that the taking was felonious or otherwise criminal and because accused claimed money admittedly taken had been taken as commissions with authority of four or five directors of corporation, while theory of prosecution was that directors never made such promise and that it would have been unlawful transaction had they done so, so that in effect jury were permitted to convict if accused merely had no legal right to take money, though acting in good faith and without criminal or felonious intent required by Pen. Code, § 511.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Unlawful," see Words and Phrases.]

6. Larceny ⇨70(2).

"Unlawful," as used in instruction on grand theft, is not synonymous with "criminal."

7. Criminal law ⇨823(4).

Error in instruction authorizing conviction for grand theft if accused "unlawfully" took property involved held not cured by qualifying instruction (Pen. Code, § 511).

The qualifying instruction was practically in language of Pen. Code, § 511, and told jury that conversion of property does not constitute grand theft if done under bona fide claim of title and to that extent was correct and directly applicable to facts, but such statement was nullified by further instructing that such provision would not excuse the unlawful retention of property to pay accused's demands against corporate owner, since latter statement was not appropriate to any theory of case and must have been misleading.

8. Criminal law ⇨783(2).

Refusal to instruct that jury cannot presume it more probable that person previously convicted of felony will commit subsequent crime held error.

Such refusal was error because during trial it had many times been brought to jury's attention that accused had been previously convicted on two charges of felony, and jury was instructed that de-defendant as witness might be impeached by proof that he had been convicted of a felony.

On Petition for Rehearing.

9. Larceny $\S$ 40(2).

In prosecution for grand theft, people held required to establish beyond reasonable doubt that, in addition to being unlawfully taken, money was also feloniously taken (Pen. Code, $\S$ 511).

10. Criminal law $\S$ 1137(3).

Accused, whose requests to charge acquittal of grand theft if money was not unlawfully taken were refused, held not precluded from objecting to instructions to convict if he unlawfully took money on theory he requested such instructions.

This is true because instructions requested by defendant did not state law as favorably to defendant as might have been requested and trial court's statement of converse by eliminating words "do not" in beginning of defendant's requested instruction and changing words therein of "not guilty" to read "guilty" did not state factors specifying verdict of guilty of grand theft.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; C. W. Miller, Judge.

W. S. J. Ranney was convicted of grand theft, and he appeals.

Reversed.

Gumpert & Mazzer and C. H. Hogan, all of Stockton, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHIELDS, Justice pro tem.

The defendant was charged by indictment of the grand jury of San Joaquin county with the crime of grand theft. The indictment contained twenty-one counts. In addition, the defendant was charged with having been twice previously convicted of felony. Upon his arraignment defendant pleaded guilty to the charges of conviction of felony, and not guilty in all other particulars.

He was thereafter tried and convicted upon seven of the charges, the jury disagreeing as to the remaining counts. He moved for a new trial, which motion was denied, whereupon he was sentenced to imprisonment for the term prescribed by law. Defendant then prosecuted this appeal from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

Many points were made by the defendant in support of his appeal, the first one being that he was not permitted to examine the jurors, at the time the jury was being selected to conduct the trial, with reference to whether or not they would be influenced by the fact that he had been convicted of other felonies and would from that fact presume that he had been guilty of the crime for which they were about to try him, or whether or not, because of that fact, they would entertain any bias or prejudice against the defendant which might influence their verdict. The facts upon which this objection is made may be quite briefly stated.

[1] When counsel for defendant was examining one of the prospective jurors, among other questions asked was whether the juror knew that the defendant had served two prison terms, one in a reform school in New York and one in the state prison at San Quentin. The district attorney objected to this question and the court sustained his objection. Counsel for defendant thereupon outlined his purpose in asking this question. He stated that it was only preliminary; that the defendant would take the witness stand in his own behalf and that he presumed that the district attorney would ask this question of the defendant for purposes of impeachment. He declared that he reserved the right "to question this jury * * * as to whether or not they would regard an admission of those felonies as evidence in the case, and indulge in the presumption of guilt. We submit that this is one of the most vital questions that has been propounded to the jury. * * * It is only to show the extent of his bias and prejudice." After interruption, counsel for defendant continued that he assumed that the district attorney would ask as to previous conviction of a felony for the purpose of impeaching the defendant's credibility, and that what we "want to determine now (is) whether any juror will be biased or prejudiced in listening to the evidence by reason of the fact that the defendant had been twice previously convicted of felony."

After a question by the court, defendant's attorney continued: "We are seeking to ascertain whether or not the jury, by reason of an admission on the part of the defendant of serving these two prior terms, would indulge in the presumption of guilt by reason of that fact alone. We can readily understand that the outside layman might be influenced, might be induced even to the extent of arriving at a verdict in this case on the basis of a past, or past convictions, and we are entitled to go into that fact in order to determine whether or not they would." The court thereupon announced that the objection would be sustained. Counsel then asked if the court's ruling went "to the extent of prohibiting the defendant from questioning any or all of the jurors as to whether or not they would be influenced in their deliberations at all, by a statement of admission of prior conviction of a felony"? To this the court answered: "That is correct." We think that this action of the court and this ruling was clearly erroneous. "Nothing is better settled or more rational than that an indictment for one crime cannot be supported by proof of another." People v. Carpenter, 136 Cal. 391, 68 P. 1027, 1028. It is not proper to show the defendant "to have been guilty of some other offense, for the purpose of raising a presumption, either of law or fact, of his guilt in the case under consideration." People v. Sears, 119 Cal. 267, 51 P. 325, 327. "When a person is accused of crime, and placed upon trial, he cannot be required to defend himself against anything but the specific charge, and he cannot be compelled, under the rules of law, to maintain the honesty and integrity of his entire life." People v. Arlington, 123 Cal. 356, 55 P. 1003; 8 Cal. Jur. 58.

[2] Evidence of other offenses than the one charged, except in exceptional cases not involved here, is incompetent as proof of the charge upon which an accused is on trial. If it gets before the jury by suggestion, or in connection with evidence otherwise competent, it must be disregarded by the jury, and the court, upon request, should definitely so instruct them. Whether or not a prospective juror will be influenced by knowledge of any such previous offense, whether he will be governed by the rule of law which rigidly excludes such a consideration, and whether or not if chosen as a juror, he will obey an instruction by the court to dismiss from his mind all consideration of any separate and different offense of which he may have obtained knowledge in any way, except for purposes of impeachment, is a question of vital importance to an accused person in the circumstances of the defendant here.

[3] He is entitled to be tried by a fair and impartial jury, wholly free from bias or prejudice. Defendant knew that the fact of his previous convictions would be brought to the attention of the jury if they did not already know of it. He intended to be, and later was, a witness in his own behalf. He had a right to expect that the prosecution would bring out the fact that he had been twice convicted of a felony for the purpose of impeaching him. The defense which he had planned, and later presented, was interwoven with this fact, and required its disclosure. He did not gratuitously introduce this fact to the jury's attention. There was no fact more fundamental to his defense than that he should select a jury which would not be biased by this fact, and regard it as evidence in the case from which they might find or presume his guilt of the charges upon which he was being tried. He had a right to inquire of the panel fully as to the existence of any such bias to enable him to secure his constitutional right of trial before a legally qualified jury.

The denial of that right seems so clearly erroneous as to require no citation of authorities to establish it. But the question has been definitely adjudicated. In a recent California case the defendant was charged with the crime of murder. Upon his first trial the jury disagreed, standing ten to two for conviction. Upon a retrial the attorney for the defendant sought to question the jury relative to their knowledge of the failure of the former jury to agree upon a verdict, and what influence, if any, the action of the former jury would have upon their verdict. The court sustained an objection to such questions and forbade counsel from further mentioning the former jury to the present jury. The defendant was convicted of manslaughter and upon appeal the Supreme Court said: "It is not clear from the record upon just what theory the court sustained the objection of the prosecution. We think the questions were proper, as the answers thereto would tend to show the existence or nonexistence of actual bias on the part of the jurors with reference to the case then on trial. If any of the jurors had heard the result of the former trial, and that the jury therein had stood ten for conviction and two for acquittal, we do not think it unreasonable to conclude that such a juror might be influenced by such knowledge, and that he might well conclude that, if ten out of twelve of the former members of the jury believed the appellant guilty, there was a strong probability of his guilt. Persons entertaining such opinions, we think it must be conceded, are not, and cannot be, fair and impartial jurors such as one accused of crime is entitled to have pass upon the accusations against him." People v. Carmichael, 198 Cal. 534, 246 P. 62, 66. Other reasoning in this case is peculiarly appropriate to the question before us. In concluding its discussion, the court say: "No authority has been called to our attention which can be construed as holding that section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution can be relied upon to sustain the judgment herein. As we have already said, in our opinion it was prejudicial error for the court to refuse the appellant the right to examine the jurors as to the effect on their minds of the standing of the former jury." Holding that the ruling of the court deprived the defendant of a fundamental right, the court conclude by saying that: "It was never intended by this provision of the Constitution to take from the defendant in a criminal action his fundamental right to a jury trial or in any substantial manner to abridge this right." The judgment was reversed. People v. Carmichael, supra.

In a New York case there was an almost complete identity with the case before us. In that case the defendant was indicted upon a charge of grand larceny, the indictment also containing a charge of a prior conviction. At the trial counsel for defendant asked one of the prospective jurors if it should develop that the defendant had previously been convicted upon a charge of grand larceny "would that influence you in arriving at a verdict of guilt or innocence"? The district attorney objected to this question and, as in this case before us, his objection was sustained. It was stipulated that the record might show that the same question had been asked of each of the jurors, and that the objection to the same had been sustained.

After conviction an appeal was taken and the Supreme Court held this ruling of the trial court to have been erroneous, and for that reason reversed the judgment. In announcing its decision the court said:

"I cannot escape the conviction that this question was competent, and that the defendant should have been allowed to ask of each juror whether or not the fact that he had been convicted of a former crime would influence him in determining the question as to his guilt or innocence of the particular crime with which he was charged. It is quite true that the jurors were bound in determining the grade of crime to consider whether or not the defendant had been convicted of a felony; and it is also quite true that, if the defendant offered himself as a witness upon the trial, the jury was justified in considering his former conviction in determining the weight to be given to his testimony. It is, however, a fundamental principle of the English common law that a former conviction is not properly to be considered by a jury in determining whether or not a defendant is guilty of the crime charged. If a juror was so constituted that in determining the question of the guilt or innocence of a defendant of the crime charged he would not be able to eliminate the impression of guilt produced upon his mind by the fact of a former conviction so that it would influence his determination of the guilt of the defendant of the crime charged, he could not try that issue impartially and without prejudice to the substantial rights of the defendant; and that that is not an impossible mental condition is shown in this case by the fact that other of the jurors voluntarily stated upon their examination as to their competency as jurors that the prior conviction would probably affect them in making up their minds as to his guilt or innocence, and, when that appeared, the juror was excluded. The right of a defendant to a fair and impartial jury who will determine the question as to his guilt or innocence solely upon the testimony, and without prejudice or bias, is one that the courts are bound to uphold, and which the court below was bound to protect.

"The defendant had the right to have the question as to whether or not each particular juror was an impartial juror determined by the court, and was entitled to a reasonable examination of each proposed juror so that that fact could be intelligently determined. It was an important element in determining the question as to the competency of a juror to ascertain whether the former conviction of the defendant would influence him when he came to determine the guilt or innocence of the defendant; and, if it appeared that a juror would not or could not weigh the evidence in regard to the commission of the crime charged without being influenced by the fact that the defendant had been convicted of a former crime, he was not an impartial juror, and the challenge should have been sustained, and that fact could only be ascertained by an examination of the juror as to the effect upon his mind of the former conviction."

People v. Hosier, 132 App. Div. 146, 116 N. Y. S. 911, 914, affirmed by the Court of Appeals, 196 N. Y. 506, 89 N. E. 1107.

We have quoted extensively from this case, as its reasoning renders further discussion of this question unnecessary. We might add the cases of People v. Estorga, 206 Cal. 81, 273 P. 575, and People v. Barrett, 207 Cal. 47, 276 P. 1003, 1004, as illustrating the emphasis which our courts put upon the right of an accused person to sift the minds of proposed jurors in an effort to develop possible grounds of challenge for cause.

[4] It was suggested in the case before us that defendant had not protected his rights in this matter, as the question asked did not necessarily involve a decision of the question now raised. But counsel repeatedly stated that the question was only preliminary, and continued: "We are seeking to ascertain whether or not the jury, by reason of an admission on the part of the defendant of serving these two prior terms, would indulge in the presumption of guilt by reason of that fact alone." This was an appeal to the court to be allowed to exercise a clear legal right. It was without question specific enough to inform the court, and to raise the question here involved. But if there was anything lacking in the scope of the question asked and the request made, it was completely supplied near the conclusion of the examination of the juror in whose case the question was first raised. Counsel for defendant then said: "In order to protect the record, if counsel decide to propound this other question in some variety or form, I hope the court will understand that counsel is not endeavoring to be disrespectful at all, but I desire a ruling on it." The court thereupon interrupted counsel and stated: "You are fully protected by the record in that matter." Counsel seemed not to have failed in any degree to present his point to the court, and to maintain his objection to the court's ruling. But if he had the court's attitude here would be as it was in People v. Barrett, supra, where they say: "We are not prepared to say that the prejudicial character of the error was in any way lessened or destroyed by defense counsel's rather passive acceptance of, and virtual acquiescence in, the course dictated by the lower court." Here there is nothing to excuse in counsel. He definitely asked to be permitted to conduct an examination of prospective jurors to which he was entitled, and his request was definitely denied.

[5, 6] Other questions raised on this appeal relate to instructions given and refused. One instruction given by the court was erroneous, particularly so in the circumstances of this case. In it the jury was told: "If the jury find to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant W. S. J. Ranney did, at and in the County of San Joaquin, State of California, and on or about the 20th day of July, 1926, unlawfully take the property of the Harris Manufacturing Company * * * it will be your duty to bring in a verdict of guilty of grand theft, a felony, as charged and set out in the first count of the indictment on file herein; otherwise you should acquit him on said first count." A like instruction was read in reference to each of the remaining twenty counts of the indictment. This instruction did not define unlawful; it did not instruct the jury that before they could convict the defendant they must also have found that the "taking" was felonious, or otherwise criminal. It made no reference to any distinction between what was criminally unlawful and civilly unlawful. Under the instruction they were to convict the defendant in either case.

The jury were told twenty-one times by this instruction that if they found that the defendant unlawfully took the property involved that they should find him guilty of the crime charged. But there are many acts of "taking" of property which are unlawful but are not criminal, and which would not justify a conviction of felony. Section 511 of the Penal Code illustrates this, wherein it provides that a certain appropriation of property is not criminal if made under a claim of title "even though such claim is untenable," in other words, "unlawful." The law is so stated in People v. Lapique, 120 Cal. 25, 52 P. 40. So in People v. Ephraim, 77 Cal. App. 29, 245 P. 769, 772, in a prosecution for embezzlement, the court say that "it was incumbent upon the appellant to prove that she had appropriated the money openly and avowedly and under a claim made in good faith, but it was not necessary for her to prove that her claim was a valid one upon which she might recover in law."

Countless decisions might be cited to show that an act may be unlawful and not be penal. Words and Phrases, First, Second, and Third Series, Unlawful; 39 Cyc. 829. The word unlawful in connection with a contract for the use of a machine, does not mean a criminal use, but any use in violation of the contract. Cortelyou v. Charles Eneu Johnson Co. (C. C.) 138 F. 110. Unlawful in relation to the acts of a corporation may mean acts only ultra vires. Dunbar v. Am. Tel. & Tel. Co., 238 Ill. 456, 87 N. E. 521. Unlawful is not synonymous with criminal, "To speak of an act as unlawful is not equivalent to saying it has been denounced as a crime. 'Every criminal act is illegal or unlawful, but illegal or unlawful acts may not be criminal.'" State v. Tinkler, 72 Kan. 262, 83 P. 830. So the use of the word "unlawfully" in an instruction relative to embezzlement will not supply the place of the word feloniously or fraudulently. "Many things are unlawfully done which are not crimes, because the criminal intent is wanting." State v. Cunningham, 154 Mo. 161, 55 S. W. 282, 287. When the broad meaning of the word "unlawful" is thus understood, the error of an instruction which directs the jury to convict upon the mere finding that the defendant had committed an unlawful act, is very apparent.

The instruction complained of here was particularly inappropriate to the facts of this case, which in the briefest way and according to the testimony of the defendant were these. Defendant was acting as manager of the Harris Manufacturing Company. He sold some $83,500 worth of preferred stock which at the time stood in the name of four of the directors of the company, the sale being made in the interest of and for the benefit of the company. These four directors individually promised and agreed to pay him for his services in selling the stock a commission of 15 per cent. which was to be paid out of the funds of the company, from time to time, as the finances of the company might permit. The four directors required, however, that the money was to be taken without the knowledge of the remaining director, a Mr. Henry. The sums taken as specified in each of the seven counts upon which he was convicted, as defendant testified, were part of this 15 per cent. commission which he had been so authorized to withdraw. Defendant relied upon this authority, as he claimed it to exist, to justify his admitted taking of the money. It was the theory of the prosecution that the four directors never made any such promise, and that it would have been an unlawful transaction had they done so. The real question before the jury in such a state of the evidence and in finding upon each of the counts in the indictment was as to whether or not the defendant fraudulently and with a felonious intent appropriated the money as charged in the respective counts. It will be readily seen that if the four directors promised the defendant the 15 per cent. commission and told him to take it as he did, even if they had no legal right to make such promise or to authorize such taking, if the defendant believed that they had, and acting upon such claimed authority, he took the money in good faith, he would clearly be committing no crime. But his taking would have just as clearly been "unlawful"; and the jury were instructed to convict him if the taking were unlawful.

[7] So stated, the error in the instruction is obvious. It is contended, however, that other instructions given in connection with the one now in question, supplied the deficiencies, and together with it, completed a fair presentation of the law. It is doubtful if any separate or detached instruction could be held to have cured the error in this instruction, given at the end of the charge, and twenty-one times repeated. It contains a definite direction, upon the finding of a certain fact, to find the defendant guilty. It is the rule that in the case of instructions which so direct a conviction, the instruction must state all of the conditions necessary to a legal conviction, which this instruction admittedly did not. But waiving these considerations, the qualifying instruction relied upon by the respondent is insufficient for that purpose. The greater portion of this latter instruction (page 1652, vol. 5, Reporter's transcript) is practically in the terms of section 511, Penal Code. By it the jury was told that if a person in converting property to his own use does so under a bona fide claim of title thereto, he is not guilty of the crime of grand theft, although his claim of title was not good. Continuing, the court further instructed: "If you find * * * that the defendant appropriated property owned by the Harris Manufacturing Company and by said company entrusted to said defendant, and the defendant laid claim to the property so appropriated, such claim of title, if preferred in good faith, is a sufficient defense, even though the claim is untenable."

So far this instruction is a correct statement of the law, and directly applicable to the facts of this case. It so far differs from the instruction in which the jury were told that if they found that the defendant "unlawfully" took the sums mentioned in the various counts of the indictment, that they should convict him, as to tell them that even if his claim of title to the property "was not good" or "untenable," if made in good faith, that they should not convict him. Whether or not this instruction so far supplied the deficiencies of the first instruction, and limited the forces of the specific direction to convict the defendant, if the jury found that he had "unlawfully" taken the sums withheld, we do not have to decide, for reasons which we will briefly discuss. At the end of and concluding this instruction the court said: "But this provision would not excuse the unlawful retention of the property of the Harris Manufacturing Company to offset or pay demands held against it by defendant." This concluding part of the instruction should not have been given; there is no theory of the case to which it is appropriate. The prosecution contended that the defendant took the sums mentioned in the different counts of the indictment without any right or authority whatever. Defendant contended, not that he retained the money appropriated by him to pay any debt or claim which he had against the company, but that he took it as provided in the first portion of the above instruction, and as provided in section 511 of the Penal Code, under a claim of title to it, and in pursuance of a definite direction of four of the directors of the company, instructing him to do so.

Ordinarily the giving of an irrelevant instruction is of no consequence in a case, and the giving of this portion of the instruction given here would not constitute error in itself. But in this case it could not fail to have misled the jury. There having been no theory of the case to which it was appropriate, the jury might quite properly have taken it as having been given as applicable to the facts of the case they were considering. So understood the jury were told, substantially, by the first portion of the instruction that if the defendant took the property under claim of right, and in good faith although unlawfully he should be excused, and in the second and concluding portion, that if he retained the property unlawfully, he should not be excused. Such an instruction so confused and apparently contradictory cannot be held to have explained and properly qualified the direct instruction first above mentioned, to convict the defendant if the jury found that he took the property in question unlawfully. Other instructions relied upon to supplement and qualify the instruction first above mentioned need not here be referred to. It is enough to say that in no portion of the charge was the jury told that the taking, or retention of the money mentioned in the indictment, must, in any aspect of the case, have been fraudulent or felonious before the defendant could have been convicted. State v. Cunningham, 154 Mo. 161, 55 S. W. 282.

[8] Another assignment of error was based upon the refusal of the court to give the following instruction requested by the defendant: "You are instructed that the law indulges no presumption, nor is a jury permitted to indulge in any presumption that it is more probable that a person previously convicted of felony will commit a subsequent one. The fact that the defendant W. S. J. Ranney was previously convicted of a felony raises absolutely no presumption against him that he committed any offense as charged in the indictment." This instruction should have been given. During the course of the trial it had many times been brought to the attention of the jury that the defendant had been previously convicted upon two charges of felony. The jury was instructed that the defendant as a witness might "be impeached by proof that he had been convicted of a felony or felonies." He was entitled to have the jury instructed that that was as far as they could go in considering such evidence, and that the fact of these convictions could not in any way be used by them as evidence of his guilt of the charges upon which he was on trial. This was a substantial right of the defendant which he was improperly denied. As the case will have to be retried for the reasons above stated, other contentions advanced by the defendant to that end need not be considered.

The order and judgment are reversed.

On Petition For Rehearing.

PER CURIAM.

[9, 10] By some oversight in examining the record in this cause the petition for rehearing with reference to the instruction given to the jury by the trial court, heretofore held prejudicially erroneous, contains the following language: "But in considering the propriety of the giving of that instruction, this court has unconsciously stepped into error and wholly overlooked the fact that the twenty-one instructions were given at the request of the defendant." An examination of the clerk's record discloses that this statement is not in accordance with what is there disclosed.

A comparison between the twenty-one instructions given by the court at the request of the prosecution, and the twenty-one instructions requested by the defendant and refused by the court, is all that is necessary to clearly exhibit the difference between the instructions given and the instructions asked by the defendant and refused by the court. The instructions requested by the defendant should have been given. They did not state the law as favorably to the defendant as might have been requested. On the other hand, the instructions given by the trial court did not state the factors justifying a verdict of guilty. The respondent's petition for rehearing demonstrates the vice of the instruction under consideration. The instruction referred to as requested by the defendant's counsel clearly stated an elementary principle of law, to-wit, that if the money was not unlawfully taken, the defendant was entitled to an acquittal. By the instruction requested by the people and given to the jury, the elimination of the words "do not" in the beginning of the instruction as worded by the people, and the changing of the words "not guilty" to read "guilty," in the concluding portion of the instruction as requested by the people, the jury was incorrectly advised that if the money was simply unlawfully taken, defendant should be convicted. Such is not the law. If not unlawfully taken, the defendant was certainly entitled to a verdict of not guilty. But before finding the defendant guilty the jury must not only be satisfied that the money was unlawfully taken, but also that it was feloniously taken. By the formula instruction as requested by the people, the jury was advised that if the people established that the money was unlawfully taken, a verdict of guilty should be returned. The people were not entitled to any such instruction. It was necessary for the people to establish beyond a reasonable doubt that in addition to being unlawfully taken, the money must also have been feloniously taken. The petition for rehearing overlooks the fact that the instruction as requested by the people and given by the court, is neither a full nor a correct statement of the law. By placing the given instruction as requested by the people, in contrast with the refused instruction as requested by the defendant, the error in the instruction is luminously disclosed. The given instruction reads: "If the jury find, to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt, that defendant W. S. J. Ranney did, at and in the County of San Joaquin, etc., * * * unlawfully take the property of the Harris Manufacturing Company * * * then I charge you it will be your duty to bring in a verdict of guilty of grand theft." The refused instruction requested by the people is worded as follows: "If the jury do not find, to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant W. S. J. Ranney did, at the County of San Joaquin, etc., * * * unlawfully take the property of Harris Manufacturing Company * * * then I charge you it will be your duty to bring in a verdict of not guilty of grand theft." The elimination of the words "do not" thus stand out in bold relief, telling the jury that all the prosecution had to do was to prove that the money was unlawfully taken. As we have said, such is not the law.

The petition for rehearing is denied.

YALE et al. v. BRIGGS et al.
 Civ. 7185.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
 Division 1, California.
 Nov. 26, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 26, 1930. Hearing
 Granted by Supreme Court Jan. 22, 1931.

1. Wills ☞337.

Evidence held insufficient to sustain verdict finding testator was mentally incompetent; hence granting new trial was not error.

2. Judgment ☞199(3).

In absence of evidence overcoming presumption of testator's sanity, proponents' motion for judgment notwithstanding verdict for contestants should have been granted.

3. Wills ☞55(1).

Contestants must overcome presumption of testator's sanity at time of execution of will by affirmative showing and preponderance of evidence.

Appeals from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Harry R. Archbald, Judge.

Proceeding by William E. Briggs as executor, and others, to probate the will of Charles Yale, deceased, opposed by Harold L. Yale and others. From a judgment and order in proceedings by contestants to revoke an order admitting the will to probate, contestants and proponents appeal.

Affirmed in part, and reversed in part, with directions.

Woodruff, Musick & Hartke, of Los Angeles, for contestants.

Harry A. Chamberlin, of Los Angeles, for proponents William E. Briggs, Claude F. Peters, and William E. Briggs.

YORK, J.

The proceedings included in these appeals arose out of a petition for revocation of an order admitting to probate a certain instrument purporting to be the last will and testament of Charles Yale, deceased. The contest was tried before a jury.

The Supreme Court has heretofore dismissed the appeals from the several minute orders referred to in its opinion in the Matter of the Estate of Charles Yale, Deceased, etc., reported in 208 Cal. 102, 280 P. 358. It has, therefore, simplified the consideration by this court of the appeals to that extent.

The appeals now pending are: (1) By the contestants, from that part of the judgment granting certain motions for nonsuit and dismissing the contest with respect to the grounds of contest therein specified; and from that part of the judgment dismissing the contest as to two of the contestants because they were not parties interested therein; and from an order granting the motion of the proponents of the will for a new trial of the contest. (2) By the proponents, from an order denying their motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict.

The verdict of the jury was in favor of the contestants on the issue of mental incompetency, the court on the trial having ordered nonsuits against the contestants on the issues of undue influence, fraud, conspiracy, and lack of proper execution of the will. After judgment was entered, a motion for a new trial of the contest was made by the proponents which motion was granted.

The very voluminous transcript discloses a vast amount of evidence as to the mental condition of the decedent, which the proponents contend fails to show any mental incompetency, or at least any incompetency to make a will, and which evidence, it is contended by the contestants, shows undue influence, fraud, conspiracy, and lack of proper execution of the will, and a total lack of testamentary capacity.

[1] A careful analysis of all of the evidence does not justify the statement of the contestants contained in their summary as to their proof of Mr. Yale's mental condition. A condensed statement, as the court views it, is that he was a man well along in years suffering from a great many ailments, and that he suffered "a slight stroke" prior to the making of the will. But the record does disclose that he knew the extent of his property; that he knew who were the objects of his bounty, and that he had decided ideas as to the persons to whom he desired to leave his property, apparently uninfluenced by any delusions or improper suggestion of any person. It is true, however, that the conclusion (from facts not stated) of one witness is in the record showing that, about the time the will and codicil were executed, the deceased (in the words of the witness Wellman) was not "in a condition mentally to really make a will in the first place, and in the second place I thought his physical condition was such that it would tax his physical condition to attempt to do so, assuming that it would take some time, which I believed it would take to get down what he would want to do."

The trial judge, however, who heard all of the evidence, granted the motion for a new trial of the contest and this, we think, was justified by reason of the condition of the case after due consideration of all of the evidence introduced before the jury. There were apparently no material errors in the introduction of the evidence, nor in the giving of the instructions to the jury, and the motion evidently was granted solely because the trial judge concluded that the verdict was not satisfactorily sustained by the evidence.

[2. 3] The motion for a judgment in favor of the proponents and appellants William E. Briggs, Ralph B. Hardacre, Claude F. Peters, and William E. Briggs, as executor, notwithstanding the verdict of the jury, on the evidence as disclosed by the cold record before us, should have been granted by the trial court, as there was no evidence other than the conclusion given in evidence, as above stated, to overcome the presumption of the sanity of the decedent at the time the will was executed, which presumption the contestants must overcome by a showing affirmatively and by a preponderance of the evidence. Estate of Smith, 200 Cal. 152 at page 158, 252 P. 325, 328; Estate of Fleming, 199 Cal. 750, 251 P. 637, 638.

In Estate of Smith, supra, a quotation from the Estate of Perkins, 195 Cal. 699, 235 P. 45, is pertinent here as to both motions made: "Mental derangement sufficient to invalidate a will must be insanity in one of two forms: (1) Insanity of such broad character as to establish mental incompetency generally; or (2) some specific and narrower form of insanity under which the testator is the victim of some hallucination or delusion." And, as stated by our Supreme Court in the Estate of Smith, supra, following this quotation: "* * * And, even in this latter class of cases, the evidence 'must establish that the will itself was the creature or product of such hallucination or delusion.'" However, the court, who heard all the evidence, concluded that it was best in the interest of justice to order a retrial of the contest.

The Supreme Court in the Estate of Sexton, 199 Cal. 759 at page 762, 251 P. 778, 779, says: "A motion for a new trial on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict or other decision is addressed to the sound legal discretion of the trial court, and its action in granting the motion will not be disturbed on appeal unless it appear that there was a clear abuse of such discretion. [Citing cases.] The precise test whereby to determine when a trial court abuses its discretion in granting a new trial after the verdict of a jury upholding a will appears not to have been determined by any previous decision of this court. This much, however, seems certain. If the entire evidence upon the issue of mental competency is of such a character that it would not have supported a verdict for the contestant had the jury brought in such a verdict, then it should be held that the trial court abused its discretion in granting the new trial. Indeed, this seems to be the view taken by counsel on both sides of this appeal. The question then is this: If the jury had found for contestant, would its verdict have totally lacked the support of substantial evidence? If it would, then the order granting the new trial must be reversed."

Quoting from the same case on page 763 of 199 Cal., 251 P. 778, 780: "A testator is of sound and disposing mind and memory if, at the time of making his will, he has sufficient mental capacity to be able to understand the nature of the act he is doing, to understand and recollect the nature and situation of his property, and to remember and understand his relations to the persons who have claims upon his bounty and whose interests are affected by the provisions of the instrument. [Citing cases.] The actual mental condition of the testator at the time of the execution of the will is the question to be determined. Estate of Perkins, 195 Cal. 699, 235 P. 45."

Quoting again from the Estate of Sexton, supra, at page 766 of 199 Cal., 251 P. 778, 781: "Testamentary capacity is always presumed to exist until the contrary is established. That is to say, the presumption is always that a person is sane, and the burden is always upon the contestant to show affirmatively and by a preponderance of evidence that the testator, at the time of executing the will, was of unsound mind." Therefore, the court did not err in granting the motion for a new trial.

On the authority of the cases hereinbefore cited, and after a scrutiny of the entire evidence introduced in the trial of the contest in the lower court, the order of the trial court denying the motion for judgment in favor of the respondents, notwithstanding the verdict rendered by the jury, should be reversed. See, also, Estate of Redfield, 116 Cal. 637, 48 P. 794; Estate of Casarotti, 184 Cal. 73, 192 P. 1085. As was held in the Estate of Fleming, supra: "When a motion for a directed verdict, which should have been granted, has been denied, and a verdict rendered against the moving party, it is the duty of the court, at any time before the entry of judgment, either of its own motion or on motion of the aggrieved party, to render judgment in favor of the party aggrieved, notwithstanding the verdict. Code Civ. Proc. § 629. Appellant is here contending that the power of the trial court in these matters is limited, by the provision of the section, supra, to granting a motion for judgment notwithstanding a verdict in those cases in which the antecedent motion for a directed verdict 'should have been granted,' and that, therefore, if for any reason the motion for a direction by the court was properly denied, the court is without power to grant the motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict. * * * Assuming, but not deciding, that the motion for a directed verdict was properly denied for the reasons stated, it does not follow that such denial was a bar to the granting of the motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict. Appellant was not injured. * * * The motion was denied, and the case was submitted to the jury, carrying with it the benefit of the court's ruling in the contestant's favor. We are of the view that section 629 of the Code of Civil Procedure relates to the granting of a motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict in a case in which the motion for a directed verdict 'should have been granted' on the evidence, and does not lend itself to the narrow construction appellant attempts to put upon it. * * * The trial court had power to direct the jury to render a verdict in favor of the respondents, unless there was substantial evidence tending to prove all the controverted facts necessary to establish the contestant's case. It was not necessary that there should have been an utter absence of conflict in the evidence. To deprive the court of the right to exercise its power, if there was a conflict, it must have been a substantial one. Estate of Sharon, supra [179 Cal.] p. 459, 177 P. 283; Estate of Baldwin, 162 Cal. 471, 123 P. 267."

There is no evidence in the record which shows or tends to show any undue influence, conspiracy, fraud, or lack of proper execution of the will and codicil in question, and there is no proof in the record to sustain the contention of Jennie Ethelyn Miller Grisier or Richard Miller that they are parties entitled to contest said will or codicil. They are the children of Mr. Yale's sister, who was living at the time of the contest.

Therefore, that portion of the trial court's judgment is affirmed wherein it finds that said children of the sister of the decedent are not interested in said contest and are not proper parties to said contest. That part of the judgment is also affirmed which granted certain motions of nonsuit and dismissed the contest with respect to the grounds of contest therein specified. The order of the trial court granting the motion for a new trial is affirmed. The order denying the motion of appellants William E. Briggs, Ralph B. Hardacre, Claude F. Peters, and William E. Briggs, as executor, for a judgment in their favor notwithstanding the verdict of the jury in favor of respondents, is reversed.

We concur: CONREY, P. J., and HOLLZER, Justice pro tem.

On Rehearing.

PER CURIAM.

The petition of contestants for a rehearing of this cause is denied.

By reason of inadvertence, in rendering the judgment of this court, we omitted to give direction for entry of judgment notwithstanding the verdict. In view of the conclusions stated in the opinion, such direction should be given. For this reason alone, the petition of proponents for a rehearing is granted and the cause is resubmitted. Upon such resubmission, and for the reasons set forth in the opinion now on file, that portion of the trial court's judgment is affirmed wherein it finds that said children of the sister of the decedent are not interested in said contest and are not proper parties to said contest. That part of the judgment is also affirmed which granted certain motions of nonsuit and dismissed the contest with respect to the grounds of contest therein specified. The order of the trial court granting the motion for a new trial is affirmed. The order denying the motion of appellants William E. Briggs, Ralph B. Hardacre, Claude F. Peters, and William E. Briggs, as executor, for a judgment in their favor, notwithstanding the verdict of the jury in favor of respondents, is reversed; and the superior court is directed to grant said motion of said appellants Briggs, Hardacre, Peters, and Briggs, as executor, and enter judgment in their favor. C. C. P., § 629.

110 Cal. App. 65

LEVY v. BERNER et al. (two cases).

Civ. 7349.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California.

Nov. 25, 1930.

1. Automobiles ⇨245(13).

In personal injury action, weight of testimony tending to impeach plaintiff's version of automobile accident held for jury.

2. Automobiles ⇨244(36).

In personal injury action, evidence held to establish that automobile accident was due to defendant's driving on wrong side of street.

3. Automobiles ⇨246(47).

Evidence in personal injury action warranted instruction that automobile might be driven on left side of highway when overtaking other vehicle, if highway was clear and unobstructed for at least 100 yards ahead.

The evidence disclosed that when defendant attempted to pass the automobile in front of him, the plaintiff's automobile was about two hundred feet away.

4. Automobiles ⇨246(8).

Instruction held not to inform jury that occurrence of automobile accident at defendant's left-hand side of street was conclusive evidence of defendant's negligence.

The instruction was to the effect that the law required vehicles to be driven on the right-hand side of the highway, except when overtaking and passing other vehicles, in which case they might be driven on the left side if the same was clear and unobstructed for at least one hundred yards ahead.

5. Trial ⇨296(3).

Error, if any, in instruction regarding defendant motorist's negligence in passing automobile in face of approaching automobile held corrected by further instructions.

Instruction was to the effect that, if defendant was attempting to pass automobile when there was another automobile approaching in opposite direction within three hundred feet of defendant, there was negligence under statute. The court further instructed the jury that the violation of a statute or ordinance constituted negligence as a matter of law, but that, unless such negligence was the proximate cause of injury, it becomes immaterial, and that there must appear to be a causal connection between the violation of the law and the injury before defendant could be held to have violated it.

6. Trial ⇨127.

Cross-examination disclosing defendant's witness was employed by insurance company to examine injured plaintiff held proper.

The cross-examination question to which witness replied that he was requested to act by a person associated with a certain insurance company was proper, as the jury had the right to consider the witness' interest in case as tending to impeach his credibility.

7. Appeal and error ⇨1060(1).

Testimony disclosing insurance company was involved in automobile accident case, if improper, held not prejudicial under circumstances.

The circumstances disclosed that the defendant had testified that after the accident he stated to plaintiff he was insured in certain company and directed plaintiffs to explain occurrence to company.

8. Appeal and error ⇨1046(5).

In personal injury action, defendant suffered no prejudice because court questioned police officer testifying plaintiff presented cigars to him and offered to make it worth while to change report of automobile accident.

9. Damages ⇨130(3).

$3,000 for sprained joints between vertebra and pelvis and sprains of joints of femur and contused chest held not excessive.

10. Damages ⇨130(2).

$1,000 for lacerations of both legs and strained ligaments of knee joints held not excessive.

11. Appeal and error ⇨1004(3).

In personal injury action, damages is committed first to discretion of jury and then to trial court.

12. Appeal and error ⇨1004(1).

Personal injury judgment cannot be set aside unless verdict is so excessive as to suggest passion or prejudice of jury.

Appeals from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter E. Herzinger, Judge.

Separate actions by Joseph Levy and Albert Levy against L. Rothenberg. The causes were tried together and presented on appeal on the same transcript and brief. Since the appeals were taken, the defendant has died, and Saul Berner and another, executors of the last will and testament of the defendant, have been substituted as the appellants.

Affirmed.

J. Hampton Hoge, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Franklyn M. O'Brien and Horace A. Diibert, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

The above actions were brought to recover damages for personal injuries growing out of the same automobile accident. The causes were tried together and are presented here upon the same transcript and briefs.

The accident occurred on March 27, 1929, at 9:55 o'clock a. m. The plaintiffs, who were riding in a Chevrolet automobile, were proceeding northerly along Nineteenth avenue between Judah and Kirkham streets in San Francisco, and the defendant was operating a Buick automobile in the opposite direction along the same street. Plaintiff Albert Levy owned and was driving the Chevrolet car, and plaintiff Joseph Levy was a passenger therein. There was a collision between the two automobiles, as the result of which each plaintiff suffered physical injuries and the Chevrolet automobile was damaged.

The complaint in each action averred negligence on the part of the defendant, which he denied; and contributory negligence was pleaded as a defense in both cases. Verdicts were returned as follows: For Joseph Levy, $1,000, and for Albert Levy, $3,000. New trials were denied, and defendant has appealed from each judgment.

Since the appeals were taken defendant has died, and his executors have been substituted as the appellants herein.

As grounds for the appeals it is claimed that the court erred in its instructions to the jury and in admitting certain facts in evidence; that the conduct of the court in the examination of a certain witness was prejudicially erroneous, and that the damages awarded were excessive and the result of passion or prejudice.

[1, 2] According to the plaintiffs the course of their automobile was north along Nineteenth avenue, east of the center line of the avenue and about four feet from the easterly curb. They testified that the defendant swerved from his course, which was south along the same avenue, and a collision occurred. The defendant testified that he turned to his left in an attempt to overtake and pass a car traveling ahead of him, but that the collision occurred west of the center line of the avenue. Other testimony, however, tended to show that defendant's car immediately before the collision was moving in a southeasterly direction on the east side of the avenue, and that the collision occurred at a point five or six feet from the easterly curb. While testimony tending to impeach plaintiffs' version of the affair was produced, the weight to be given thereto was a question for the jury, and we are satisfied that they were justified in concluding from all the evidence that the accident happened as described by the plaintiffs and was due to the fact that the defendant was driving on the wrong side of the avenue.

[3] The jury was instructed, in substance, that at the time of the accident the law required vehicles to be driven on the right-hand side of the highway except when overtaking and passing other vehicles, in which case they might be driven on the left side if the same was clear and unobstructed for at least one hundred yards ahead. Defendant claims that there was no evidence that the highway on his left was not clear and unobstructed for one hundred yards ahead, and that the instruction was therefore improper. It appears, however, from defendant's testimony that when he attempted to pass the car in front plaintiffs were about two hundred feet away. This was sufficient to warrant the giving of the instruction.

[4] Nor did the instruction inform the jury, as claimed, that the occurrence of the accident at defendant's left-hand side of the street was conclusive evidence of negligence on his part. The instruction was a correct statement of the law in the abstract which, in view of the evidence, was proper.

[5] The jury was further instructed as follows: "If you find from the evidence that defendant was attempting to pass an automobile at the time when there was another automobile approaching in the opposite direction within three hundred feet of the defendant I instruct you that this constitutes a violation of section 122 of the Motor Vehicle Act, and is therefore negligence." While, as claimed by the defendant, a violation of the statute, if such violation was the proximate cause of the damage alleged, would constitute negligence (19 Cal. Jur., Neg., § 67, p. 636), and this element should properly be included in such an instruction, nevertheless the jury was also instructed that "the violation of a statute or ordinance constitutes negligence as a matter of law. Unless, however, such negligence is the proximate cause of injury to another it becomes immaterial. There must appear to be a causal connection between the violation of the law and the injury before the defendant can be held to have violated it." This, with other instructions, wherein the court carefully defined negligence and proximate cause, was sufficient to correct any error in the instruction complained of.

[6] The testimony of a physician called by defendant, and who had examined plaintiffs after the accident, tended to show that their injuries were less serious than they claimed. On cross-examination the witness was asked who employed him to make the examinations, and he replied that he was requested to act by a person associated with a certain insurance company. The question was objected to by defendant, and the jury was instructed by the court to disregard the answer. The question was, we think, proper cross-examination, as the jury had the right to consider the witness' interest in the case as tending to impeach his credibility. 27 Cal. Jur., Witnesses, § 96, p. 122.

[7] The defendant also testified that after the accident he stated to plaintiff Albert Levy that he was insured by a certain company, and directed plaintiffs to explain the occurrence to them.

Plaintiff Albert Levy, in response to the question whether he consulted a physician after the accident, said: "I went to the—to Mr. Rothenberg's insurance company and asked them whether it was their duty to send a doctor out to attend to patients that were injured in an accident." The court, on motion, struck out this answer.

Defendant complains that both answers were prejudicial to him, as they improperly called the jury's attention to the fact that he was insured. In view of defendant's testimony the last answer, if improper, cannot reasonably be said to have been prejudicial; and, as stated, the first question and answer were competent on cross-examination.

[8] A police officer who made an investigation of the accident testified that the plaintiff Albert Levy made him a present of cigars and also offered to make it worth his while if he would change his report. In this connection the trial court asked certain questions of the officer, and defendant claims that these questions showed partiality on the court's part. We have carefully reviewed them, and fail to understand how they could have been injurious to the defendant. On the contrary, it appears to us that plaintiff, rather than the defendant, had grounds for complaint. It is certain that the latter suffered no prejudice therefrom.

[9-12] The testimony shows that the plaintiff Albert Levy received a sprain of the joint between the lower lumbar vertebra and the top of the pelvis. There were also sprains of the joints of the femur with the pelvis on each side, and his chest was contused. He continued to receive treatment from a physician up to the time of the trial. He also suffered pain from the injuries, which he testified had continued; and a physician who examined him shortly before the trial was unable to state whether his injuries, particularly that to the junction of the lower lumbar and sacrum, would be permanent. It was also testified that injuries of this character are frequently chronic. This plaintiff had also incurred an indebtedness for medical services amounting to about $150, and in addition lost considerable time from his business as a dealer in motion picture films.

Plaintiff Joseph Levy, according to a physician, suffered contusions and lacerations of both legs, and the ligaments of his knee joints were strained. He was confined to his bed for some days, and incurred an expense for medical treatment and X-ray examinations amounting to $125. In addition he suffered considerable pain, and lost seven weeks from his business as a salesman from which he had previously derived an income of about $50 a week.

The amount of damages in actions of this character is committed first to the sound discretion of the jury and then to the trial court, which, in ruling upon a motion for a new trial, may consider the evidence and set aside the verdict, if unjust. Upon appeal the judgment cannot be set aside unless the amount of the verdict is so plainly excessive as to suggest at first blush passion or prejudice on the part of the jury. Reneau v. Hirsch, 88 Cal. App. 1, 262 P. 1100; Johnson v. Pearson, 100 Cal. App. 503, 280 P. 394. In view of the evidence, we cannot say that the verdicts are excessive, and no error is shown which would warrant the conclusion that the same resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

The judgments are, accordingly, affirmed.

BANDINI PETROLEUM CO. et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al.

Civ. 7292.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California.

Nov. 29, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 27, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 26, 1931.

1. Mines and minerals ⇨47.

Owner of surface has absolute title to oil and gas only when they are reduced to possession.

2. Constitutional law ⇨50.

Legislative power of state may be exercised for purpose of adjusting coexisting rights.

3. Constitutional law ⇨278(1).

Eminent domain ⇨2(7).

Mines and minerals ⇨91.

Statute relating to protection of natural resources of petroleum and gas from waste does not deprive oil well owners of property without just compensation or due process of law (St. 1929, p. 923, §§ 8b, 14b; Const. Cal. art. 1, §§ 13, 14; Const. U. S. Amend. 14).

4. Constitutional law ⇨70(3).

Courts cannot be concerned with wisdom of legislation.

5. Statutes ⇨47.

Statute prohibiting "unreasonable" waste of natural gas held not void for uncertainty for failure to define standard of conduct (St. 1929, p. 923, §§ 8b, 14b).

The word "unreasonable" was used in St. 1929, p. 923, §§ 8b, 14b, for purpose of providing that operators of well might utilize reasonable proportion of gas for purpose of lifting oil to surface, and when viewed in this light the word "unreasonable" is not so uncertain as to render enactment void and inoperative.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Unreasonable," see Words and Phrases.]

6. Prohibition ⇨5(3).

Trial court having jurisdiction to determine whether there is unreasonable waste of natural gas, Court of Appeal cannot interfere by writ of prohibition to deprive its judgment of effect (St. 1929, p. 923, §§ 8b, 14b).

Petitioners sought to prevent trial court from enforcing preliminary injunction and order modifying same, and also to check any further order or proceeding in an action pending against them for the purpose of enjoining them from unreasonably wasting natural gas from their wells in certain oil fields.

7. Mines and minerals 91.

Statute prohibiting unreasonable waste of natural gas confines authority within limits of enjoining production of gas when in excess of reasonable proportion to oil for particular field involved when not conveniently necessary for other than lifting purposes (St. 1929, p. 923, §§ 8b, 14b).

Application for a writ of prohibition by the Bandini Petroleum Company and others against the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Los Angeles and Honorable William Hazlett, one of the judges thereof.

Writ denied.

Call & Murphey, Robert B. Murphey, and Wm. L. Murphey, all of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and James S. Bennett, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

Charles A. Son, Arthur R. Smiley, Roland Rich Woolley, Rush M. Blodget, George W. Nilsson, Robt. M. Pease, and Roy P. Dolley, all of Los Angeles, amici curiæ.

IRA F. THOMPSON, J.

This is an original prohibition proceeding. The petitioners seek to prevent the respondent court from enforcing a preliminary injunction and order modifying the same and also to check any further order or proceeding against them in an action pending in the respondent court entitled People of the State of California on Relation of Fred G. Stevenot, Director of Natural Resources of the State of California v. Associated Oil Company et al., which action was brought for the purpose of enjoining all of the defendants therein named from unreasonably wasting natural gas from their wells in the Santa Fé Springs oil field. On March 19, 1930, after hearing the parties to the action, the court granted a temporary injunction limiting and defining the amount of gas which the defendants would be allowed to permit to escape into the air from their wells in the field mentioned. On March 28, 1930, the court made another order somewhat relaxing the terms of the injunction pendente lite. It is asserted by petitioners that they have been irreparably injured and damaged by attempting to curtail the production of natural gas; that there is no market for a large part thereof and that if they are to be allowed as they claim it is their right, to employ the gas as a lifting power to raise the oil from below the surface they must of necessity permit a portion thereof to escape into the air; that prior to the temporary injunction they were producing 19,534 barrels of oil per day but that operating most efficiently under the amount of gas allowed to be used by the modified order they cannot possibly produce more than 10,211 barrels per day.

The action was instituted in the respondent court pursuant to the provisions of "An act to protect the natural resources of petroleum and gas from waste and destruction, etc." (Stats. 1929, p. 923), the sections of which pertinent at this point in our discussion read as follows:

"Sec. 8b. The unreasonable waste of natural gas by the act, omission, sufferance or insistence of the lessor, lessee or operator of any land containing oil or gas, or both, whether before or after the removal of gasoline from such natural gas, is hereby declared to be opposed to the public interest and is hereby prohibited and declared to be unlawful. The blowing, release or escape of natural gas into the air shall be prima facie evidence of unreasonable waste."

"Sec. 14b. Whenever it appears to the director of the department of natural resources that the owners, lessors, lessees or operators of any well or wells producing oil and gas or oil or gas are causing or permitting an unreasonable waste of gas, he may institute, or have proceedings instituted, in the name of the people of the State of California, to enjoin such unreasonable waste of gas regardless of whether proceedings have or have not been instituted under section 8 [a section authorizing the oil and gas supervisor to issue certain orders] hereof, and regardless of whether an order has or has not been made therein. Such proceedings shall be instituted in the superior court for the county in which the well or wells from which the unreasonable waste of gas is occurring or any thereof are situated. The owners, lessors, lessees or operators causing or permitting an unreasonable waste of gas in the same oil or gas field, although their properties and interests may be separately owned and their unreasonable waste separate and distinct, may be made parties to said action. In such suits no restraining order shall be issued ex parte, but otherwise the procedure shall be governed by the provisions of chapter three, title seven, part two of the Code of Civil Procedure of the State of California [a chapter relating to injunctions] and no temporary or permanent injunction issued in such proceedings shall be refused or dissolved or stayed pending appeal upon the giving of any bond or undertaking, or otherwise."

The arguments of the petitioners may be grouped into the following propositions: First, the act deprives petitioners of property without just compensation and without due process of law. Second, the statute is void for uncertainty and for failure of the legislature to define a standard of conduct. Third, the enactment permits the use of gas for lifting purposes in a reasonable proportion to the amount of oil produced and that the uncontroverted evidence shows no other or greater use and for that reason the court was without jurisdiction to grant the temporary injunction.

[1] Turning then to the first contention, it is asserted that the act is violative of the Fourteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution and sections 13 and 14 of article 1 of the state Constitution. To put the argument most favorably for the petitioners, it is asserted that they have the same vested right to make use of the gas under their property for the purpose of lifting the oil thereunder that a riparian owner has to make use of the underflow of a stream passing through his property to lift the waters to levels of entry upon his land. It is therefore insisted by counsel that it is of prime importance to examine the nature of petitioners' rights. While this is true in a degree, yet we do not attach the same weight as do petitioners to the pure legal question whether the owner of the surface is the owner of the gas in place under his soil subject to the right of an adjoining owner to appropriate to himself the title thereto by capture and possession, or whether the owner of the surface is vested only with the right to bore for gas and reduce it to possession. In either event he is the owner of a valuable right. Every owner of the surface has a like interest and right of property, whatever it may be. We think, however, that the better reasoning, on account of the self-propelling or migratory character of natural gas, as well as oil, dictates the conclusion that while in general we may speak of the owner of the surface as being the owner of the gas and oil in place, what we really mean is that he and he alone has the right through his own property to endeavor to reduce the substances to possession; that when they are reduced to possession and then only does he have an absolute and unqualified title thereto. It is argued by petitioners and by some of those who have appeared as amici curiæ that the law of California is settled to the effect that the owner of the surface is the owner of the gas and oil in situ. There are some general expressions in the authorities to this effect, particularly in tax cases where assessments have been levied upon a lease giving and granting to the lessee the right to bore for and extract the hydrocarbon substances. But they are not controlling or helpful here. On the other hand, in distinguishing between oil and other minerals in the case of Acme Oil Co. v. Williams, 140 Cal. 681, 74 P. 296, 297, the Supreme Court said: "Oil, on the contrary, is of a fluctuating, uncertain, fugitive nature, lies at unknown depths, and the quantity, extent, and trend of its flow are uncertain. It requires but a small surface area, in what is known as an oil district, upon which to commence operations for its discovery. But when a well is developed the oil may be tributary to it for a long distance through the strata which holds it. This flow is not inexhaustible, no certain control over it can be exercised, and its actual possession can only be obtained, as against others in the same field, engaged in the same enterprise, by diligent and continuous pumping. It is anybody's property who can acquire the surface right to bore for it, and when the flow is penetrated, he who operates his well most diligently obtains the greatest benefit, and this advantage is increased in proportion as his neighbor similarly situated neglects his opportunity." (Italics ours.) It is the co-existence of these rights which authorizes the state to make use of its legislative power. When the rights of one impinge upon the rights of others the state may interpose for the purpose of adjusting and regulating the enjoyment of those rights. This is, in a large part at least, the foundation of all the authorities which support the power of the state to regulate the production of oil and gas. In Ohio Oil Co. v. Indiana, 177 U. S. 190, 20 S. Ct. 576, 581, 44 L. Ed. 729, it is said: "No one owner of the surface of the earth, within the area beneath which the gas and oil move, can exercise his right to extract from the common reservoir, in which the supply is held, without, to an extent, diminishing the source of supply as to which all other owners of the surface must exercise their rights. The waste by one owner, caused by a reckless enjoyment of his right of striking the reservoir, at once, therefore, operates upon the other surface owners" and " * * * the surface proprietors within the gas field all have the right to reduce to possession the gas and oil beneath. They could not be absolutely deprived of this right which belongs to them without a taking of private property. But there is a coequal right in them all to take from a common source of supply the two substances which in the nature of things are united, though separate. It follows from the essence of their right and from the situation of the things as to which it can be exerted, that the use by one of his power to seek to convert a part of the common fund to actual possession may result in an undue proportion being attributed to one of the possessors of the right to the detriment of the others, or by waste by one or more to the annihilation of the rights of the remainder. Hence it is that the legislative power, from the peculiar nature of the right and the objects upon which it is to be exerted, can be manifested for the purpose of protecting all the collective owners, by securing a just distribution, to arise from the enjoyment, by them, of their privilege to reduce to possession, and to reach the like end by preventing waste." (Italics ours.) In Lindsley v. Natural Carbonic Gas Co., 220 U. S. 61, 31 S. Ct. 337, 339, 55 L. Ed. 369, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 160, where the court was considering a statute designed to prevent the waste of natural mineral water by pumping for the purpose of extracting the gas therefrom; after reference to and a discussion of the Ohio Oil Company case just mentioned, it is said: "The mineral waters and carbonic acid gas exist in a commingled state in the underlying rock, and neither can be drawn out without the other. They are of value in their commingled form and also when separated, but the greater demand is for the gas alone. Influenced by this demand, some surface owners, having wells bored or drilled into the rock, engage in extensive pumping operations for the purpose of collecting the gas and vending it as a separate commodity. Usually where this is done an undue proportion of the commingled waters and gas is taken from the common supply, and a large, if not the larger, portion of the waters from which the gas is collected is permitted to run to waste. Thus these pumping operations generally result in an unreasonable and wasteful depletion of the common supply and in a corresponding injury to others equally entitled to resort to it. It is to correct this evil that the statute was adopted, and the remedy which it applies is an enforced discontinuance of the excessive and wasteful features of the pumping. It does not take from any surface owner the right to tap the underlying rock and to draw from the common supply, but, consistently with the continued existence of that right, so regulates its exercise as reasonably to conserve the interests of all who possess it. That the state, consistently with due process of law, may do this, is a necessary conclusion from the decision in the case cited. But were the question an open one, we still should solve it in the same way." We ought to pause long enough to direct attention to this last sentence on account of its bearing upon the argument presented here that the rule established by Ohio Oil Co. v. Indiana, supra, has become obsolete.

In Commonwealth v. Trent, 117 Ky. 34, 77 S. W. 390, 392, 4 Ann. Cas. 209, the court places the source of the regulatory power upon both grounds in the following language: "It is well known that the supply of gas is limited, and may be exhausted. The act is intended to protect the supply from waste. Under the act, it is conceded, a person, to exhaust the supply of his neighbor, cannot put down wells on his own land, and allow the gas to escape at the well. * * * The Legislature may protect from waste the natural resources of the state, which are the common heritage of all. The right of the owner of property to do with it as he pleases is subject to the limitation that he must have due regard for the rights of others. To allow the storehouse of nature to be exhausted by the waste of the gas would be to deprive the state and its citizens of the many advantages incident to its use. That the Legislature may prevent this is well settled." (Citing cases.) In Oklahoma the statute not only prevented the escape of gas into the air, "the intentional drowning with water of a gas stratum," the "underground waste" of gas, but also the "wasteful utilization of such gas." The Supreme Court of that state in the case of Quinton Relief Oil & Gas Co. v. Corporation Commission, 101 Okl. 164, 224 P. 156, 157, after referring to Walls v. Midland Carbon Co., 254 U. S. 300, 41 S. Ct. 118, 65 L. Ed. 276, where a somewhat similar statute of Wyoming was under scrutiny, said: "A careful examination of the authorities show that there is almost unanimity in holding that the burning of natural gas for carbon purposes in high pressure fields, having sufficient rock pressure to force gas through a pipe line to domestic consumers, and where the same may be used for such purpose, constitutes a wasteful utilization thereof. Natural gas has twice the heating units as [sic] artificial gas, and, taking into consideration the convenience of natural gas, it is intrinsically worth more than artificial gas; its market value being from $2.00 to $3.00 per thousand cubic feet. The amount of carbon black produced from 1,000 cubic feet of natural gas has a market value of about 10 cents. It therefore is obvious that the state, in the proper exercise of its police power and in conservation of so valuable a natural resource as natural gas, may prohibit the wasteful utilization of the same in the interest of the public welfare." In State v. Carson Carbon Co., 162 La. 781, 111 So. 162, the Supreme Court of Louisiana sustained an enactment by which the owners of gas wells were prohibited from taking and using for the manufacture of carbon black more than 20 per cent. of the potential capacity of a gas well. In Oxford Oil Co. v. Atlantic Oil Producing Co. (C. C. A.) 22 F. (2d) 597, 598, the court says: "The right of a state to so regulate the drilling of wells for oil and gas as to conserve the rights of adjoining owners is too well settled to admit of serious controversy. Ohio Oil Co. v. Indiana, 177 U. S. 190, 20 S. Ct. 576, 44 L. Ed. 729; Lindsley v. Natural Carbonic Gas Co., 220 U. S. 61, 31 S. Ct. 337, 55 L. Ed. 369, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 160. It was within the power of the Legislature to lay down a general rule for the protection of the mineral rights of the owners of adjoining lands, and to leave the details of enforcing that rule to an administrative agency or board. Plymouth Coal Co. v. Pennsylvania, 232 U. S. 531, 34 S. Ct. 359, 58 L. Ed. 713." By a divided court in the case of Walls v. Midland Carbon Co., 254 U. S. 300, 41 S. Ct. 118, 65 L. Ed. 276, a statute of Wyoming declaring the use of natural gas from a well within 10 miles of an incorporated city "without the heat therein contained being fully and actually applied and utilized for other manufacturing * * * or domestic purposes" to be a "wasteful and extravagant use" and unlawful, was held valid and constitutional. The court reasserted the doctrine that "a state may consider the relation of rights and accommodate their coexistence, and, in the interest of the community, limit one that others may be enjoyed." It also says: "The determining consideration is the power of the state over, and its regulation of, a property in which others besides the companies may have rights, and in which the state has an interest to adjust and preserve; natural gas being one of the resources of the state. And in this consideration it is more important to consider, not for what a particular owner uses the gas, but the proportion of his use to that of others, or, it may be, the prevention of use by others. * * *

[2] It is apparent from the quotations that the legislative power of the state may be exercised for the purpose of adjusting co-existing rights. They also tend to indicate that the state may restrict or regulate the production of oil or gas on the theory of the public's interest in their natural resources. Whether this latter may be done we think it unnecessary to a decision of the present application. But as indicating that there is grave doubt concerning this power we here make reference to the case of West v. Kansas Natural Gas Co., 221 U. S. 229, 31 S. Ct. 564, 570, 55 L. Ed. 716, 35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1193. The state of Oklahoma attempted to prohibit the construction of pipe lines for natural gas or the transportation of the same except by domestic corporations, the charters of which were to provide that it should only be transported between points in the state and not outside. The court in declaring the statute void said with reference to the power of the state to "preserve the common property" as distinguished from the right of the state to prevent waste: "The extent of power which the second question implies a state possesses challenges serious inquiry. The natural resources of a state may be other than natural gas; for example, may be timber and coal and iron and other metals; but it is contended that the right of conservation extends to these, and the broad statement of the first question [the right of the state to preserve its resources] is qualified in the argument by the properties of natural gas and the limitation of its supply. This, it is contended, gives a range to the police power of the state which otherwise it would not possess. And such power, as we understand the further contention to be, may determine not only the conservation of the resources of the state, but as to what class of persons may use them, as dependent upon their transportation in state, rather than in interstate, commerce. * * *

The statute of Indiana [considered in Ohio Oil Co. v. Indiana, supra] was directed against waste of the gas, and was sustained because it protected the use of all the surface owners against the waste of any. The statute was one of true conservation, securing the rights of property, not impairing them. Its purpose was to secure to the common owners of the gas a proportionate acquisition of it—a reduction to possession and property—not to take away any right of use or disposition after it had thus become property. It was sustained because such was its purpose; and we said that the surface owners of the soil, owners of the gas as well, could not be deprived of the right to reduce it to possession without the taking of private property. It surely cannot need argument to show that if they could not be deprived of the right to reduce the gas to possession, they could not be deprived of any right which attached to it when in possession. The Oklahoma statute far transcends the Indiana statute. It does what this court took pains to show that the Indiana statute did not do. It does not protect the rights of all surface owners against the abuses of any. It does not alone regulate the right of the reduction to possession of the gas, but, when the right is exercised, when the gas becomes property, takes from it the attributes of property—the right to dispose of it; indeed, selects its market, to reserve it for future purchasers and use within the state, on the ground that the welfare of the state will thereby be subserved. The results of the contention repel its acceptance. Gas, when reduced to possession, is a commodity; it belongs to the owner of the land; and, when reduced to possession, is his individual property, subject to sale by him, and may be a subject of intrastate commerce and interstate commerce. The statute of Oklahoma recognizes it to be a subject of intrastate commerce, but seeks to prohibit it from being the subject of interstate commerce, and this is the purpose of its conservation. In other words, the purpose of its conservation is in a sense commercial—the business welfare of the state, as coal might be, or timber. Both of those products may be limited in amount, and the same consideration of the public welfare which would confine gas to the use of the inhabitants of a state would confine them to the inhabitants of the state. If the states have such power, a singular situation might result. Pennsylvania might keep its coal, the Northwest its timber, the mining states their minerals. And why may not the products of the field be brought within the principle? Thus enlarged, or without that enlargement, its influence on interstate commerce need not be pointed out. To what consequences does such power tend? If one state has it, all states have it; embargo may be retaliated by embargo, and commerce will be halted at state lines. And yet we have said that 'in matters of foreign and interstate commerce there are no state lines.' In such commerce, instead of the states, a new power appears and a new welfare—a welfare which transcends that of any state. But rather let us say it is constituted of the welfare of all of the states, and that of each state is made the greater by a division of its resources, natural and created, with every other state, and those of every other state with it. This was the purpose, as it is the result, of the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States. If there is to be a turning backward, it must be done by the authority of another instrumentality than a court." (Italics ours.)

It is argued, however, that the statute involved herein does not proceed upon the theory of correlative rights, but only upon the policy of conserving or preserving the common supply. We cannot assent to this statement or construction of the enactment. It is true that section 8b of the act declares the "unreasonable waste of natural gas * * * to be opposed to the public interest" and "to be unlawful," but it is also apparent from a reading of the entire act that unreasonable waste of gas is considered to be the production of an undue proportion of gas to the amount of oil, in the particular field involved, by one surface owner as against others, in those instances where the gas is not conveniently necessary for the "generation of light, heat, power or other industrial purpose." That this is the intent and purpose of the law is made manifest from the following quotation from section 8d: "If it shall appear that gas is being produced from any oil well or wells in quantities exceeding a reasonable proportion to the amount of oil produced from the same well or wells, even though it is shown that such excess gas is being used in the generation of light, heat, power or other industrial purpose and that there is sufficient other gas available for such uses from other wells in the same or other fields in which the gas produced is not in excess of the amount which bears a reasonable proportion to the amount of oil produced from such other wells and that there are adequate gas-pipe-line connections between such other wells and the place of utilization of such gas the state oil and gas supervisor shall hold that such excess production of gas is unreasonable waste thereof if such holding will not cause an unreasonable waste of gas in any other field." (Italics ours.) The legislation was evidently adopted upon the theory that in every oil field there is what we may term (at least for illustrative purposes) a normal proportion of gas to oil; that when an unreasonable disproportion of gas to oil exists in a given well there is a corresponding loss of recoverable oil by other owners who would otherwise employ the lifting power of the excessive gas to good purpose; and that this disproportionate production of gas should not be permitted unless the gas as a separate thing be conveniently necessary for domestic or industrial purposes. We have not overlooked the fact that the act makes the blowing or release of gas into the air prima facie proof of unreasonable waste. It is to be observed, however, that such waste is not absolutely prohibited as it was in Ohio Oil Co. v. Indiana, supra, but is only made a rule of evidence. But even if such were the results of the act the authorities from which we have quoted would dispose of the arguments of the petitioners.

[3, 4] We are therefore irresistibly led to conclude that the statute here involved is not as stringent in its restrictions as those in other jurisdictions, and further that it does not deprive the petitioners of property without just compensation or due process of law but rather falls within the legislative authority of the state with the wisdom of which we cannot be concerned.

We also find authority of a persuasive character in our own state. In Ex parte Elam, 6 Cal. App. 233, 91 P. 811, 812, the court was considering a statute to prevent the waste and flow of artesian wells and making it a misdemeanor to waste the flow thereof. On account of the pertinency of the discussion relative to a similar argument we deem it expedient to set forth in full the first question raised therein and the response of the court thereto. We quote as follows:

"The first point made by petitioner—which is that the act is violative of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, which provides that no state shall 'deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the law,' and of article 1, § 1, of the Constitution of this state, which provides that 'all men are by nature free and independent, and have certain inalienable rights, among which are those of enjoying and defending life and liberty, acquiring, possessing, and protecting property,' and of section 13, article 1, which provides that no person shall be 'deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law'—seems to have been met and demonstrated to be untenable by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Ohio Oil Co. v. Indiana, 177 U. S. 190, 20 S. Ct. 576, 44 L. Ed. 729. By that case it is established that water, oil, gas, and all fugitive substances held in their natural subterranean reservoirs are exceptions to the general rule establishing absolute ownership in the proprietor of the surface of all that lies underneath; that these minerals, being migratory in their nature, having no fixed situs, are a part of the soil only so long as they are on or in it, but after they escape and go to other lands the title of the former owner is gone; that it follows therefore that no one owner of the surface of the earth within the area beneath which these minerals move can exercise his right to extract from the common reservoir in which the supply is held without diminishing the source of supply as to which all other owners of the surface must exercise their rights; that, in consequence of the nature of the deposits, of their transmissibility, of their interdependence, of the rights of all, and of the public at large, the state could lawfully exercise the power to regulate the right of the surface owners among themselves to seek to obtain possession, and to prevent the waste of the products in which all the surface owners within the area wherein they were deposited, as well as the public, had an interest. 'No divesting of private property under such a condition can be conceived, because the public are the owners, and the enactment by the state of a law as to the public ownership is but the discharge of the governmental trust resting in the state as to property of that character.' This water, the ownership of which until actual possession is acquired being in the public, or at least that portion of the public who may own the surface of the soil within the artesian belt, is subject to a reasonable use only by those interested therein. This reasonable use is determined in Katz v. Walkinshaw, 141 Cal. 134, 70 P. 663, 74 P. 766, 64 L. R. A. 236, 99 Am. St. Rep. 35, to be the use of such amount of the subterranean water as may be necessary for some useful purpose in connection with the land from which it is taken.' The conditions existing in this state with reference to the necessity for the conservation of irrigating waters are most clearly set out in the case last cited, and the reasons for the rule restricting the use clearly shown. Whenever a land owner exceeds this reasonable use, he is appropriating to himself that which belongs to others who are entitled to a like use, and to that extent is obstructing the free use of property so as to interfere with its comfortable enjoyment, and which, by sections 3479 and 3480, Civil Code, is declared to be a public nuisance. Whatever right one has, even in his own, is subject to that established principle that his use shall not be injurious to the rights of others, or of the general public. This act therefore relates to waters, the right to the use of which is common to a large portion of the community, and affects the general public right. Legislation in relation thereto affects the public welfare, and the right to legislate in regard to its use and conservation is referable to the police power of the state, which is declared in Ex parte Whitwell, 98 Cal. 78, 32 P. 870, 19 L. R. A. 727, 35 Am. St. Rep. 152, to be 'the power to make laws to secure the comfort, convenience, peace and health of the community.' 'The police power, deriving its existence from the rule that the safety of the people is the supreme law, justifies legislation upon matters pertaining to the public welfare, the public health, or the public morals.' Ex parte Drexel, 147 Cal. 766, 82 P. 429, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 588 [3 Ann. Cas. 878]. It is settled law that all property is held subject to the exercise of police power, and that provisions of the Constitution declaring that property shall not be taken without due process of law have no application in such cases. Odd Fellows' Cem. Ass'n v. San Francisco, 140 Cal. 230, 73 P. 987." (Italics ours.)

It is to be observed that the case of Ohio Oil Co. v. Indiana, supra, is approved and legislation of a character very much akin to the enactment now under scrutiny has been found not to invade the constitutional provisions against deprivation of property without compensation and without due process of law.

In the discussion of the problem to this point we think the essential difference from the question involved in Herminghaus v. Southern California Edison Co., 200 Cal. 81, 252 P. 607, is made apparent. It is to be noted that the contest in that case was between a riparian owner, whose rights have long been established in our jurisdiction, and an appropriator of water who cannot divest a private existing right by his act of appropriation. This is quite a different thing from the adjustment and regulation of the coexisting rights of several persons. The rights here involved are more nearly analogous to those discussed in Ex parte Elam, supra, and in Eckel v. Springfield Tunnel, etc., 87 Cal. App. 617, 262 P. 425, in the latter of which cases the rule was reannounced that as between riparian owners one can only take his reasonable share thereof. It is there determined that he cannot take all that is reasonably required to develop his land, but only that amount that will not unreasonably deprive the owners of coequal rights of a proper proportion.

[5] We therefore turn to the second angle of our problem: Is the statute void for uncertainty and the failure of the Legislature to define a standard of conduct? The objection thus urged against the enactment arises from the use of the word "unreasonable." Were it not for the argument that it is not waste to permit the use of the gas to lift the oil to the surface, it would be obvious that without the qualifying word the enactment could not be subjected to attack on the ground of uncertainty. As we have heretofore observed, the Indiana statutes prohibited all waste, and the United States Supreme Court concluded it to be a proper exercise of the legislative authority despite the argument that the owners of the surface were entitled to make use of its force to raise the oil from beneath the ground. Undoubtedly the Legislature had in mind the Indiana statute and its construction, as well as others from other oil producing states. It would seem to logically follow that they made use of the word unreasonable for the very purpose of providing that the operators of a well might utilize a reasonable proportion of gas for the purpose of lifting the oil to the surface. This thought coincides with that indicated by the language we have already quoted to the effect that it shall be held to be an unreasonable waste of gas for one to produce gas in excess of "a reasonable proportion to the amount of oil produced," when such gas is not conveniently necessary for other than lifting purposes. When viewed in this light we think the word unreasonable is not so uncertain as to render the enactment void and inoperative. In fact, our courts have frequently applied the rule of reasonable use between riparian owners where similar correlative rights are involved. We have already cited the case of Eckel v. Springfield Tunnel, etc., Co., and Ex parte Elam, and to these we may add the following: Fall River Valley Irrigation Dist. v. Mt. Shasta P. Corp., 202 Cal. 56, 259 P. 444, 56 A. L. R. 264; Turner v. James Canal Co., 155 Cal. 82, 99 P. 520, 522, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 401, 132 Am. St. Rep. 59, 17 Ann. Cas. 823. In the latter of these two cases the words are so pertinent that they should be quoted. They are: "Out of regard to the equal rights of others whose lands may abut upon the same water, the law has declared, as will hereafter be more fully shown, that the use of the water for irrigation, so far as it affects the right of others similarly situated, must be reasonable, and must be confined to a reasonable share thereof; but, with this common limitation, the right to use water upon adjoining land applies as well to the water of a lake, pond, slough or any natural body of water, by whatever name it may be called, as to a running stream." (Italics ours.) In a slightly different situation, but still for the purpose of adjusting coequal rights, the Supreme Court applied the same doctrine in Katz v. Walkinshaw, 141 Cal. 128, 70 P. 663, 74 P. 766, 771, 64 L. R. A. 236, 99 Am. St. Rep. 35, and San Bernardino v. Riverside, 186 Cal. 25, 198 P. 784, 788. In the former it said: "The doctrine of reasonable use, on the other hand, affords some measure of protection to property now existing, and greater justification for the attempt to make new developments. It limits the right of others to such amount of water as may be necessary for some useful purpose in connection with the land from which it is taken. * * * The objection that this rule of correlative rights will throw upon the court a duty impossible of performance, that of apportioning an insufficient supply of water among a large number of users, is largely conjectural." In the latter we find these words: "With regard to such land owners, these cases hold that each owner of land overlying the same general underground supply of water may take such water on his own land for any beneficial use thereon, so long as such taking works no unreasonable injury to other land overlying such waters; that, if the natural supply is not sufficient for all such owners, each is entitled only to his reasonable proportion of the whole, and that each may apply to the courts to restrain an injurious and unreasonable taking by another, and to have the respective rights adjudicated and the use regulated so as to prevent unnecessary injury and restrict each to his reasonable share." (Italics ours.)

These authorities set at rest the contention that the enactment is uncertain as well as the incidental assertion that the Legislature has by the language of the act and its failure to define a standard of conduct with greater rigidity, attempted to confer upon the court a legislative function. From them, as well as those cases such as Standard Oil Co. v. U. S., 221 U. S. 1, 31 S. Ct. 502, 55 L. Ed. 619, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 834, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 734, wherein the court announced and adopted the "rule of reason" holding that it was only those unreasonable restraints of trade which were intended to be curbed by the Sherman Anti-Trust Act (15 USCA § 1 et seq.), we find that the courts have for a considerable period of time been accustomed in circumstances such as are concerned in the present enactment to apply the standard and guide of reason for the adjustment of those rights the unrestricted exercise of which would injuriously affect the rights of others. In fact, it is not a new rule in the domain of jurisprudence but a new adaptation of the old maxim: "Sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas." (Italics ours.)

[6, 7] Sufficient has been said to effectually dispose of the remaining argument of the petitioners and demonstrate that it is founded on a misconception of the legislative intent. Their argument is in effect that they are not producing an undue proportion of gas when the gas production is measured by the oil from one specific well. But this is obviously not the purpose of the law, as may clearly be indicated by a single illustration. Suppose a well is drilled and comes in, as what is commonly termed "a gasser"; that is, a well which produces an insignificant quantity of oil. Conceivably such a well might drain the field of its supply of gas, leaving the oil therein unrecoverable, to the great and irreparable injury of the other surface owners. We have instanced an extreme possibility, but our interpretation of the act is that it was intended to remedy a lesser, but nevertheless unreasonable, degree of waste of the same character.

Another answer to this argument of petitioners is that having determined that the court has the jurisdiction to determine what is an unreasonable waste, we cannot interfere by the writ of prohibition to deprive its judgment of effect. And we here direct attention to the determination of the respondent court that "there appears to be an unreasonable waste of natural gas in the Santa Fe Oil Field," and "that the evidence available * * * shows that the unreasonable waste of natural gas in said field may be substantially reduced and that the equities of all parties may be fairly conserved by a preliminary injunction which will limit the waste of gas by restricting the production thereof to a quantity reasonably in excess of the present outlets for beneficial use above ground, etc." It does not appear from the facts presented to us that in so far as the particular case before us is concerned the court exceeded its jurisdiction in finding as we have already quoted.

It is suggested in the briefs that the Legislature is without authority to restrict the production of oil, and lest we be misunderstood we deem it expedient to add that the record does not indicate that the temporary injunction was founded upon such a theory. Nor are we determining that the act attempts to confer upon the court any such power. Rather we are convinced that a proper construction of the enactment confines the authority within the limits of enjoining the production of gas when in excess of the reasonable proportion to the oil for the particular field involved, when not conveniently necessary for other than lifting purposes.

Writ of prohibition denied.

PEOPLE v. STINE et al.
Cr. 2013.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 1, California.
Dec. 2, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 16, 1930.

1. Criminal law $\S$ 1159(2).

To sustain judgment on appeal by one of three defendants accused conjunctively, verdict need rest only on facts indicating appellant's guilt.

2. Intoxicating liquors $\S$ 224.

To warrant presumption of ownership or personal operation of still, defendant's possession thereof must be proved (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1963, subd. 11; St. 1927, p. 497, $\S$ 1).

Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1963, subd. 11, declares that disputable presumption of ownership of thing follows from possession thereof, and "Still Act" (St. 1927, p. 497) $\S$ 1, provides that "any person * * * who shall be the owner of or have any interest in or who shall operate * * * or knowingly have in his possession or control, any still * * * shall be guilty of a felony."

3. Criminal law $\S$ 323.

Possession, from which presumption of ownership arises, must be such that claimant may honestly exercise exclusive power over thing (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1963, subd. 11).

4. Criminal law $\S$ 736(1).

Whether acts of person in possession of thing amount to exercise of such dominion over it as to entitle him thereto exclusively, so as to warrant presumption of ownership, is ordinarily for jury (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1963, subd. 11).

5. Criminal law $\S$ 1159(2).

To bind appellate tribunal, verdict must rest on such substantial evidence as to stand test of applicable legal principles.

6. Criminal law $\S$ 561(2).

Prosecution in trial for possessing still was bound to prove defendant's possession thereof beyond reasonable doubt (St. 1927, p. 497, $\S$ 1).

7. Criminal law $\S$ 552(3).

Where defendant's conduct was equally consistent with innocence, verdict of guilty should not be returned.

8. Criminal law $\S$ 1159(2).

Appellate court cannot disturb jury's verdict for insufficiency of evidence, unless there is no evidence supporting it, state's evidence is incredible, or evidence so clearly preponderates against verdict as to show passion or prejudice.

9. Criminal law $\S$ 561(1).

To acquit, law demands only that reasonable doubt of guilt be established by competent evidence.

10. Intoxicating liquors $\S$ 236(19).

Evidence held to preponderate so clearly in favor of innocence as to show that verdict of guilty of possessing still was result of great excitement, passion, or prejudice (St. 1927, p. 497, $\S$ 1).

There was evidence that defendant owned and operated extensive legitimate business and constructed pit under shed near his office for parties leasing it to refine oil; that lessee moved tank and drums on premises; that defendant was never inside shed until after codefendants' arrest; that he had steam disconnected and ordered codefendant to investigate on day of arrest; that such codefendant, with another employee of defendant, went to see what was going on in shed; and that they were arrested while so engaged.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Emmet H. Wilson, Judge.

Walter L. Stine, David R. Duke, and Karl Sworfford were convicted of possessing a still, and defendant Stine appeals.

Reversed.

Willard J. Laney and Arthur C. Webb, both of Los Angeles (James MacIntosh, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Alberta Bedford, of Los Angeles, for the People.

HOUSER, J.

Appellant Stine and three others, named respectively Anderson, Duke, and Sworfford, were charged with the crime of "possession of a still," a felony. Several days after the trial of the defendants had commenced and in the course thereof, defendant Anderson "disappeared." Thereupon, by order of the trial court, a mistrial was directed as to defendant Anderson only. The trial proceeded as to the remaining defendants, with the result that a verdict of "guilty" was returned against each of them. Other than defendant Stine, each of the convicted defendants was admitted to probation. It is from the judgment and the order by which his motion for a new trial was denied that defendant Stine has appealed to this court.

As disclosed by the evidence adduced on the trial of the action, the pertinent facts which related to the guilt of defendant Stine appear to be as follows:

Stine was the owner of a 20-acre tract of land on which he was producing sand and gravel for commercial purposes. Among other things, the equipment used by Stine in the prosecution of his business were an office building, a bunkhouse, sand bunkers, galvanized iron sheds, scales, two steam shovels, a toolhouse, and a blacksmith shop. In one corner of an inclosure of the size approximately 70 by 75 feet was located a shed which, in part, covered a pit of about 16 by 18 feet. The distance between the office occupied by defendant Stine and the shed was 396 feet. The larger inclosure was used by defendant Stine and his employees for the purpose of parking their automobiles during the daytime when the sand and gravel plant was being operated; also by truck drivers, numbering between 50 and 70 per day, who called at the plant for the purpose of procuring and hauling away sand and gravel, which in the aggregate averaged between ten and fifteen thousand tons per month. Connected at one end with a pipe which led from one of the steam shovels used by defendant Stine in loading sand and gravel into trucks was a steam hose which at its other end connected with another pipe which led to a still which was located in the shed. A raid on the still occurred at night, at about 7:30 p. m. At the time the raid was made all the defendants other than Stine were in the pit where, in addition to the still, were found several gallons of alcohol which had been redistilled from other alcohol unfit for beverage purposes, of which five barrels were also found in the shed. The still was slightly warm and, according to the testimony of the arresting officers, the steam gauge on the still showed from 10 to 15 pounds pressure; which latter fact, however, was accounted for by the production in court of the gauge and testimony to the effect that it was defective and always registered 10 or 15 pounds pressure even when not in use. No fire was found under the boiler of the steam shovel; nor was the steam hose connected either with the steam shovel or with the still, but was stored in the blacksmith shop.

In explanation of the circumstances hereinbefore set forth, defendant Stine testified that for a period of more than six months next preceding his arrest he had not for any purpose used the shed where the pit was located; that approximately two weeks next preceding his arrest he had leased the shed to the Bay Cities Oil Company and a man named Walter Wilson, who said that "he wanted a place to blend oil; * * * he went around and picked up the crankcase drainage and refined it, and took the dirt out and added a Western oil and he sold it." The lease between the parties was identified by defendant Stine and filed as an exhibit in the case. Also, a letter, of which the following is a copy, was introduced in evidence:

"Burbank, Cal., Feb. 10, 1930.

"Bay Cities Oil Company,

"Mr. Walter Wilson,

"San Pedro, Calif.

"Dear Sir:

"Confirming our conversation of a few days ago, it is my understanding in connection with your lease of a part of my garage that I am to dig a pit 12x16x16 feet for use for your oil vats, etc.; this pit to be lined with concrete. For this work I am to receive five hundred dollars cash; this in addition to your rent of one hundred dollars per month.

"It is also my understanding that I am to furnish you a certain amount of steam for heating, etc., during my working hours. In event you would require me to furnish steam other than my regular working hours, you will pay me at the rate of $1.50 per hour. You are to keep your building clean and free from fire hazard at all times and open to inspection by myself when I feel it is necessary.

"Yours truly,

Walter L. Stine,

"By (Signed) 'Stine.'"

Defendant Stine also testified that within a week following the execution of the lease he bought a new steam shovel and that, in accordance with the understanding between him and the Bay Cities Oil Company, he constructed the pit mentioned in his communication to that company; that immediately thereafter the lessee paid him the $500 agreed upon, together with $100 for the first month's rent, and went into possession of the leased premises; that thereafter Stine saw Wilson deliver at the shed a tank "about four feet in diameter by about eight feet high"; also that he saw Wilson move into the shed, "I would say two days before the arrest I seen a flat rack truck load of oil drums, supposedly oil drums, black drums * * * about 45 or 50-gallon oil drums * * * I would say about 12."

Stine gave further testimony that, after the pit was constructed, he never was inside either the pit or the shed; that on the day of the arrest of the defendants other than himself, on driving his automobile in the street on which the shed faced, he had noticed the odor of alcohol and had become somewhat suspicious of the business which was being conducted in the shed or pit; but that it was not until later in the day, that is, between 3:30 and 4 o'clock p. m., at which time his suspicions were again aroused, that he ordered his foreman, Sworfford, to extinguish the fire under the boiler of the steam shovel and to detach the steam hose; and it was at that time that the steam hose was disconnected and placed in the blacksmithshop. At the same time defendant Stine directed his employee Sworfford "to go in there and see what was going on."

Defendant Sworfford testified that in the capacity of foreman of the sand and gravel business he had been in the employ of defendant Stine for several years next preceding the date of his arrest; that at about 3:30 o'clock p. m. on the day of his arrest defendant Stine said to him: "There is something wrong over there. Go over there and cut that fire out of that shovel and take that hose off of there and take it over to the blacksmith shop, and then, when you are through at 6 o'clock, go in there and see what is going on. He said, 'Get in there if you have to tear in there.'"

At about 7 o'clock p. m. Sworfford and defendant Duke—the latter of whom for several years next preceding the date in question had been a truck driver in the employ of defendant Stine—went into the shed in which the still was located. It was dark; the shed and pit were unlighted, but Duke used a flashlight. A few minutes after Sworfford and Duke entered the shed, defendant Anderson, who was a stranger to them, came into the shed. He said he was looking for Wilson who had employed Anderson to work for him. It was at about that time that the officers arrived and placed Sworfford, Duke, and Anderson under arrest. Defendant Stine was not arrested until the following day. Defendant Duke corroborated the testimony of defendant Sworfford.

Defendant Anderson testified that in the morning of the day on which he was arrested he was introduced to Wilson, who employed him "to watch steam gauges and pressure gauges"; that on arriving at the place where he was supposed to work, which was at about 7 o'clock p. m., after some delay, he heard voices in the shed or pit, and on entering the shed he saw defendants Sworfford and Duke, who were strangers to him, of whom he inquired for Wilson. After he had been there "probably fifteen minutes * * * just looking around * * * heard some one say, 'police officers, open the doors.'" He was then placed under arrest.

A truck driver named Norstrom testified that he was employed by the Tec-Art Studio; that he was acquainted with Wilson, who told him about his having leased the shed and pit for the purpose of blending oil therein.

The first point made by appellant is that the evidence adduced on the trial of the action was insufficient to support the verdict.

As far as concerns the guilt of defendant Stine, the effect of the evidence is that, in the nighttime, a still was found by police officers on a part of certain premises owned by said defendant, at which time two persons, each of whom was then and for several years theretofore had been, during regular daytime working hours, in the employ of said defendant in his business of producing sand and gravel, were in the room where the still was located; also that the still had been operated by means of steam which was generated in a boiler used by defendant Stine in his sand and gravel business.

Section 1 of the "Still Act" (Stats. 1927, p. 497) provides that "any person * * * who shall be the owner of or have any interest in or who shall operate or cause to be operated or knowingly have in his possession or control, any still * * * shall be guilty of a felony. * * *"

By the information herein, in substance the defendants were accused of the crime of "possession of a still," in that they "did wilfully, unlawfully and feloniously have an interest in, own, operate and caused to be operated, and knowingly have in their possession and under their control a certain complete still. * * *"

The question, then, presented to this court is whether the bare facts that, in the nighttime, in the presence of one's daytime employees, a still is found on one's property which is capable of being operated by power furnished by the owner of the property, supply sufficient evidence to legally prove that such an owner "did wilfully, unlawfully, and feloniously have an interest in, own, operate and cause to be operated, and knowingly have in his possession and under his control" such still.

[1] It will be noted that the accusation is conjunctive in form, in that it charges the defendants with the ownership, the operation, and the possession and control of a still. But in order that the judgment herein be sustained, a verdict by the jury need rest only upon facts from which it may follow that the defendant Stine owned, or operated, or was in possession and control of the inhibited property. People v. Thompson, 111 Cal. 242, 43 P. 748; and authorities cited in 14 Cal. Jur. 61 et seq.

[2] Subdivision 11 of section 1963 of the Code of Civil Procedure is to the effect that a disputable presumption of ownership of a thing follows from the possession of it; and (without so deciding) it may be that where the question at issue is as to who is the operator of a still, the person in possession of it may be subject to a like presumption. But it will at once appear that, in order that the presumption of ownership, or that of the personal operation of a still, may become effective, the pre-existing element of possession must be present; and it is obvious that in establishing the charge that a defendant "knowingly had in his possession" a still, the question of whether the condition of physical possession by the defendant was present constitutes a vital issue to be determined by the jury. So in the instant case, in any aspect in which the evidence assumed to be in support of the verdict be viewed, in the first instance, its validity must depend upon its sufficiency in the proof of possession.

At once, it is plain that the inquiry affects not only the liberty of the appellant in this proceeding, but as well may affect the possible interest of many individuals. As an illustration: Take the situation of the owner of an apartment house who has let to a stranger a suite of rooms at a certain price, which includes the cost of water, light, and gas to be furnished by the owner. If, unknown to the owner of the property, the tenant should install a still in his apartment and use the gas furnished by the owner of the property as the means of distilling intoxicating liquor therein, and on a raid being made by the police of the premises, the still should be discovered in the presence of the janitor of the apartment house—a state of facts analogous to the condition obtaining in the instant case would be presented.

[3-5] Relating to that kind of possession from which the presumption of ownership may be inferred, it is manifest that to become effective the "possession" must be something more than a mere fleeting, physical, retention of the thing in question. The condition must be such that the claimant may honestly exercise his power over the thing to the exclusion of all others; and is denoted by acts of dominion over it. Rice v. Frayser (C. C.) 24 F. 460; Gilkerson-Sloss Commission Co. v. London, 53 Ark. 88, 13 S. W. 513, 7 L. R. A. 403; Staton v. Mullis, 92 N. C. 623. It may be said that the precise acts which will or may indicate a dominion over a thing to the exclusion of all others are incapable of being either accurately specified or described. The determination of whether the acts or conduct of a person in whose physical possession a thing may be held or retained amount to such right of dominion over it as to legally entitle him to it to the exclusion of all others, ordinarily would rest with a conclusion thereon by the jury to which the question might be submitted. In order to be binding upon an appellate tribunal, the verdict of the jury must rest upon such substantial evidence that it will stand the test of legal principles applicable to the situation. In the instant case it is apparent that the liberty and the good name of the defendant may depend upon the disputable presumption that "possession" of a thing by the defendant indicates its ownership by him; and that a determination of the question of whether the defendant was "possessed" of the thing may depend upon such slight, ambiguous, incriminatory conduct that, established as a judicial precedent, will or may threaten the liberty and the good reputation of many innocent and law-abiding citizens.

[6, 7] It was incumbent upon the prosecution to prove "possession" beyond a reasonable doubt. As far as indicating the guilt of defendant Stine was concerned, his acts or conduct, whether actual, or only imputed to him, were altogether ambiguous. Without other incriminatory evidence, such acts and conduct were as consistent with the innocence of defendant Stine as they were with his guilt; and in such circumstances the rule of law is that a verdict of "guilty" should not be returned. Nevertheless, as a matter of law, this court cannot declare that, in concluding that the evidence to which reference has been had was sufficient to show beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant was the owner, the operator, or in possession and control of the still in question, the jury was transcending its legal powers. However, there remains a question as to whether the verdict was the result of passion and prejudice.

[8] Where the appeal involves the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict of the jury, the power of the court in the premises is succinctly stated in the case of People v. Willard, 150 Cal. 543, 553, 89 P. 124, 128, and repeated in People v. Niino, 183 Cal. 126, 128, 190 P. 626, as follows: "This court cannot disturb a verdict unless there is no evidence to support it, or where the evidence relied on by the prosecution is apparently so improbable or false as to be incredible, or where it so clearly and unquestionably preponderates against the verdict as to convince this court that its return was the result of passion or prejudice on the part of the jury."

The case of People v. Wong Chong Sney, 110 Cal. 117, 121, 42 P. 420, 421, contains a statement to the effect that the finding of the jury will not be disturbed "unless the evidence preponderates so greatly against the verdict as to make it manifest that the verdict is the result of passion or prejudice."

And in the case of People v. Acosta, 10 Cal. 195, the syllabus is that: "Where it is manifest, from the testimony stated in the record, that the verdict of the jury must have been given under a state of great excitement, preventing a fair and just trial, * * * this Court will reverse the judgment. * * *"

See, also, People v. Sullivan, 129 Cal. 557, 560, 62 P. 101; People v. Manning, 48 Cal. 335; People v. Hamilton, 46 Cal. 540; People v. Vance, 21 Cal. 400; People v. Benson, 6 Cal. 221, 65 Am. Dec. 506; People v. Harden, 24 Cal. App. 522, 141 P. 1075; also authorities cited in 8 Cal. Jur. 591.

[9, 10] Remembering the substance of the evidence which tended to establish the guilt of defendant Stine, for the purpose of considering the probable "state of mind" of the jury at and preceding the time when the verdict was returned, it becomes necessary to again briefly review the evidence offered by defendant Stine in his defense.

Stine was the owner of and engaged in operating an extensive business. At the solicitation of Bay Cities Oil Company and Wilson, for the consideration of $500 paid to Stine, he constructed a pit under an unused shed located approximately 400 feet from his business office, and thereupon leased the shed and pit to Bay Cities Oil Company and Wilson for the purpose of refining and blending oil therein, at a rental of $100 per month, including steam to be furnished during daytime working hours—extra time at $1.50 per hour. The first month's rent of the premises was also paid. The lessee (Wilson), who was identified by a disinterested person, took possession of the premises and moved thereon a large tank and several iron drums. The lease, also a letter written by Stine to the Bay Cities Oil Company and Wilson, which letter amplified the terms of the lease, were introduced in evidence. After the pit was constructed, Stine never was inside the shed or pit until after the night when his codefendants were arrested. Steam had been connected with the still but two days when the arrest occurred. On that day, owing to the fact that the suspicions of defendant Stine had been aroused regarding the legitimacy of the business conducted in the shed, he had the steam disconnected and ordered defendant Sworfford to "investigate." Unknown to Stine, after his usual daytime labors had been finished, Sworfford took Duke with him to "see what was going on" in the shed, which at that time was dark and unlighted. While so engaged, defendant Anderson, who was a total stranger to all the other defendants, and who on that day had been employed by Wilson to "watch steam gauges," came into the shed, and the arrest of the three defendants occurred within ten or fifteen minutes thereafter.

Other than by cross-examination of the several witnesses who testified to the foregoing facts, no attempt was made by the prosecution to rebut such facts or to challenge their correctness in any way. As far as the record discloses, the testimony given by each of the witnesses for the defense was entitled to full credit. Stine was a reputable business man engaged in conducting a legitimate business. In his employ were defendants Sworfford, as foreman, and Duke, as a truck driver, each of whom had been regularly so employed for several years next preceding the date of the arrest. Anderson was a total stranger to either of his codefendants. The good reputation of none of the witnesses was in any way questioned.

Considering such evidence, it is difficult, if possible, to appreciate either the attitude or the reasoning of the jury in the premises. The evidence adduced by the prosecution was barely sufficient to establish even a prima facie case of guilt of the defendants. To a very considerable extent it depended upon a disputable presumption of ownership, which presumption was based upon ambiguous facts which were just as consistent with the innocence of the defendant as they were with his guilt. In any criminal case, in order to acquit the defendant, all that the law demands is that a reasonable doubt of his guilt be established by competent evidence. In the instant case, not only was trustworthy evidence introduced which was sufficient to raise such a doubt, but it clearly preponderated in favor of the innocence of the defendant. To assume that through some untoward influence the jury was prejudiced against the defendant would appear to be the only way by which to account for its verdict. It would seem certain either that the verdict of the jury was given "under a state of great excitement" (People v. Acosta, 10 Cal. 195), or that "its return was the result of passion or prejudice on the part of the jury" (People v. Willard, 150 Cal. 543, 553, 89 P. 124; People v. Niino, 183 Cal. 126, 128, 190 P. 626).

It becomes unnecessary to consider other points urged by appellant for reversal.

It is ordered that the judgment and the order by which defendant's motion for a new trial was denied be, and they are, reversed.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; YORK, J.

DONEGAN v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES.DORSEY v. SAME.

Civ. 4211, 4212.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

Nov. 19, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 19, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 12, 1931.

1. Eminent domain ☞38.

In 1910, city of Los Angeles could not acquire land for warehouses by eminent domain proceedings (Code Civ. Proc. § 1238 [St. 1909, p. 1032]).

Prior to the amendment of Code Civ. Proc. § 1238 by St. 1913, p. 544, the word "warehouses" did not appear in subdivision 4 thereof, and city of Los Angeles had no power to condemn land for warehouses.

2. Eminent domain ☞172.

Superior court, having jurisdiction in eminent domain proceedings generally, had jurisdiction of such proceedings by city of Los Angeles for warehouse purposes, though judgment of condemnation in such case was unauthorized (Code Civ. Proc. § 1238 [St. 1909, p. 1032]; Const. art. 6, § 5).

At time of entry of judgment in 1912, city of Los Angeles was without power to condemn land for warehouse purposes, but, by virtue of Const. art. 6, § 5, superior court had jurisdiction over the class of cases to which particular case involved belonged, and hence, though law did not authorize judgment of condemnation, superior court was not without "jurisdiction," for "jurisdiction" of court to hear and determine is not absent simply because law does not authorize entry of particular judgment which court in particular case may enter.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Jurisdiction," see Words and Phrases.]

3. Eminent domain ☞268.

Landowners, who, knowing condemnation was unauthorized, acquiesced therein by retaining award for thirteen years, waived right to reclaim land.

Plaintiffs, in quiet title action, were some of defendants in condemnation proceeding by city of Los Angeles for warehouse purposes, which, at that time, were unauthorized by statute, though superior court had general jurisdiction over condemnation proceedings. Record disclosed that, at time of accepting award for many thousands of dollars, they had knowledge of all grounds now advanced against validity of judgment entered in that proceeding, but, notwithstanding, they prosecuted no appeal, acquiesced in judgment, and accepted award.

4. Eminent domain ☞268.

In quiet title action, plaintiffs could not reclaim illegally condemned property without first returning to city amounts accepted, with interest, less profits to city from occupancy or rental value of premises.

5. Equity ☞66.

To obtain benefit of alleged equities by appealing to equity court, parties must do equity.

Appeals from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fletcher Bowron, Judge.

Actions by William P. Donegan, as administrator of the estate of D. F. Donegan, deceased, and by Rebecca Lee Dorsey, against the City of Los Angeles. From judgments in favor of plaintiffs, defendant appeals.

Reversed.

Jess E. Stephens, Clyde M. Leach, Lucius P. Green, Joseph T. Watson, and Jerrell Babb, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Robert Young, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

Mr. Justice PLUMMER delivered the opinion of the court.

The above cases were, by stipulation, consolidated for trial, and are, upon this appeal, presented to us upon one set of briefs, and, for convenience, will be hereafter referred to as the Dorsey case and the Donegan case, respectively.

In the respective cases the plaintiffs had judgment quieting title to the lots hereafter mentioned, and the defendant appeals from the judgment in each case.

On the 27th day of April, 1925, the plaintiff Dorsey began an action in the superior court of Los Angeles county to quiet title to lots 6, 12, and 13, in block 93, of the town of San Pedro, Los Angeles county. The first cause of action is in the common form of an action to quiet title. The second and third causes of action set out in the complaint do not require mention. In the fourth cause of action it is alleged that on the 26th day of November, 1912, the said Rebecca Lee Dorsey owned the title to the premises herein mentioned; that on or about said date there was entered in the superior court of Los Angeles county, in a certain action wherein the city of Los Angeles was plaintiff and Arthur S. Koyer et al. were defendants, a judgment and decree condemning said land and appropriating the same to the city of Los Angeles for the purpose of constructing thereupon public warehouses. The complaint then alleges that the city of Los Angeles had no right or power under the law to condemn said land for such purposes. It is then set forth that in the judgment just referred to there was awarded to the said Rebecca Lee Dorsey, as compensation for the lands so condemned, the sum of $53,338.10, which was paid to her. It is further set forth in the complaint in this action that, although twelve years and upwards have elapsed since the judgment of condemnation, the city of Los Angeles has not used said land, or any part thereof, for the construction of a public warehouse, and that the same is still vacant and unoccupied. The complaint then alleges that the city has abandoned said land, and the title thereto has reverted to the said Rebecca Lee Dorsey; that on or about the 27th day of March, 1925, plaintiff tendered and offered, in writing, to repay the city of Los Angeles the sum of $53,338.10, and in connection with said tender demanded that the city release and quitclaim to the plaintiff all interest in said land; that the defendant has not accepted said tender, and has refused the same, and neglected and refused to release and quitclaim said property to the plaintiff.

The answer of the defendant denies the allegations of the complaint, and then sets forth, among other defenses, the following: That in the action of The City of Los Angeles v. Arthur S. Koyer et al., 48 Cal. App. 720, 192 P. 301, mentioned in the plaintiff's complaint, an interlocutory judgment and decree was entered on the 4th of September, 1912, awarding to Rebecca Lee Dorsey the sum of $53,338.10, as the full amount payable to her as compensation for the lots set forth in plaintiff's complaint, and specifically described as lots 6, 12, and 13, in block 93, town of San Pedro, as per map recorded in book 84, pages 81 to 84, Miscellaneous Records of Los Angeles county; that the amount so awarded was paid to the said Rebecca Lee Dorsey on October 10, 1912, and accepted by her pursuant to said judgment and decree; that thereafter a final order and judgment of condemnation was filed and entered, and the title to said property thereupon became vested in the defendant, and the defendant took possession thereof, and has continuously held possession of the same.

It is further set forth in the answer that the plaintiff received said amount awarded to her as compensation, without objection, and satisfied the said decree; that no appeal was taken by her therefrom, and that by reason of the acts herein stated said Rebecca Lee Dorsey waived any right or claim that she had, or might have had, to assert that the said condemnation proceedings were irregular or invalid, and that the said Rebecca Lee Dorsey was and is estopped to assert the irregularity or invalidity of said proceedings, or that the title to said property was not thereby vested in the city of Los Angeles, or that the same is not now vested in the city of Los Angeles, or that the city of Los Angeles is not possessed of the title in fee simple, and entitled to the right of possession of the said premises. The answer further sets forth that the cause of action is barred by the provisions of sections 335 to 340, inclusive, of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The complaint in the Donegan case sets forth the death of D. F. Donegan and the appointment of William P. Donegan as the administrator of the estate of said deceased. The complaint then alleges that at the time of the death of D. F. Donegan, which took place on the 30th day of May, 1918, the said Donegan was the owner of lot 10 in block 93 of the town of San Pedro, as per map recorded in book 84, pages 81 to 84, Miscellaneous Records of the county of Los Angeles. The complaint further sets forth an allegation similar to that found in the Dorsey case; the entry of judgment in the action wherein the city of Los Angeles was plaintiff, and Arthur S. Koyer et al., defendants, being a condemnation proceeding. A judgment and decree was entered condemning the premises herein described and awarding the same to the city of Los Angeles; that in said award compensation was allowed D. F. Donegan in the sum of $18,892.60, which was paid to the said Donegan. The complaint further alleges that, although more than twelve years have elapsed since the entry of said judgment in said condemnation proceeding, the city of Los Angeles has not constructed any warehouse thereon, and that the premises have remained vacant and unoccupied, and that the title thereto has reverted to the heirs of the said D. F. Donegan. The complaint further alleges that on or about the 27th day of March, 1925, the plaintiff tendered and offered, in writing, to repay to the city of Los Angeles the sum of $18,892.60, and that, in connection with said tender, demanded that the city release and quitclaim said property to the plaintiff.

The answer of the defendant denies the allegations of the complaint, and, among other things, set forth the entry of the judgment and decree of condemnation heretofore referred to, and then alleges that the amount of the decree, to wit, the sum of $18,892.60, was paid to the said D. F. Donegan October 7, 1912, and accepted by him pursuant to said judgment and decree, as compensation for said property; that thereafter, a final order and judgment of condemnation was filed and entered in said cause, and that the defendant took possession of the property mentioned, and has ever since held possession thereof.

It is further alleged that no appeal was taken from said judgment by the said D. F. Donegan, and that the said D. F. Donegan, by the acceptance and retention of the award just mentioned, waived all right to assert that said condemnation proceedings were irregular or invalid, and likewise is estopped to assert the irregularity or invalidity of said proceedings. It is further set forth that the plaintiff, by reason of said Donegan having accepted said award and acquiesced in the judgment without appealing therefrom, is now estopped, and that the heirs of said Donegan are estopped from questioning the title of the city to said premises, and that the city is entitled to hold said premises in fee simple, free from any claim of the plaintiff as the administrator of the estate of D. F. Donegan, deceased, etc.

It is further set forth in the answer that this action is barred by the provisions of sections 335 to 340, inclusive, of the Code of Civil Procedure. The findings of the court in the Dorsey case were and are to the effect that on the 6th day of September, 1910, the said Dorsey was, and continuously has been, and now is, the owner of the lots described in the plaintiff's complaint, to wit, lots 6, 12, and 13, in block 93 in the town of San Pedro, as per map recorded in book 84, pages 81 to 84, Miscellaneous Records of the county of Los Angeles; that on the said 6th day of September, 1910, the defendant in this action, as plaintiff, began a suit against Arthur S. Koyer et al. in Los Angeles county, in which action the plaintiff was made a defendant; that said complaint was filed by the city of Los Angeles for the purpose of condemning certain lands located in blocks 92 and 93 of the town of San Pedro, for the purpose of erecting warehouses thereon; that when said cause came on for trial, the plaintiff Dorsey objected to the introduction of testimony therein, on the ground that the city had no right to maintain an action to condemn property for warehouse purposes; that thereafter, judgment was entered in said action awarding to said Dorsey, as a defendant in the condemnation proceedings, damages in the sum of $53,338.10, which sum was accepted by the said Dorsey. The court further found that on or about the 27th day of March, 1925, the plaintiff tendered and offered, in writing, to repay to the city of Los Angeles the sum of $53,338.10, and, in connection with said tender, demanded that the city release and quitclaim to the plaintiff all interest in said lots. The court further found that the city of Los Angeles has never used said lots, or any part thereof, for the construction of any warehouse thereon, and has not made any plans or preparation for the construction of any such warehouse, and that the lots have remained vacant and unoccupied since the entry of said judgment.

The judgment entered in pursuance of the findings and the conclusions of law based thereon quieted the title of the plaintiff thereto, subject to a lien declared in favor of the city for the amount herein referred to as having been paid to, and accepted by the plaintiff as the value of said premises ascertained in said condemnation proceedings, and further provided for the payment of said sum by the plaintiff to the city within sixty days after the judgment in this action becomes final, and, if not so paid, the defendant should be entitled to the issuance of an execution directing the sheriff to sell the lots in question for the repayment to the city of the sum of $53,338.10.

The findings in the Donegan case are similar in form and effect to the findings in the Dorsey case, save and except the property described is set forth as lot No. 10 in block 93 in the town of San Pedro, as heretofore stated, and that the amount offered in writing to be repaid to the city by the plaintiff in the Donegan case is the sum of $18,892.60.

While the record and the findings of the court show that no warehouses had been erected upon any of the lots involved in this action, it does appear that the city has removed a building from lot 10, claimed in the Donegan case, and also constructed a viaduct across a part of lots 12 and 13, claimed by the plaintiff Dorsey.

The right of the plaintiffs to maintain these actions is based upon the contention that, at the time of the institution thereof, the city of Los Angeles had no right to maintain eminent domain proceedings for the purpose of securing lands upon which to erect warehouses, as prior to the amendment of section 1238 of the Code of Civil Procedure in 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 544) the word "warehouses" did not appear in subdivision 4 of said section, nor did said section, in any other of its provisions, authorize condemnation proceedings for such purposes.

While neither of the plaintiffs in the actions before us upon these appeals—who were defendants in the action entitled "City of Los Angeles v. Koyer et als."—took appeals from the judgments entered in said action, the defendant Koyer did appeal. City of Los Angeles v. Koyer, 48 Cal. App. 720, 192 P. 301. Upon this appeal it was held that a city has no inherent right to maintain eminent domain proceedings, and that such right can only be exercised when expressly authorized by the Legislature, and that at the time of the beginning of the action, to wit, in 1910, municipalities were not authorized to maintain eminent domain proceedings to obtain land on which to erect warehouses. It was further held that, while section 262 of the Charter of the City of Los Angeles authorized the city to incur indebtedness and issue bonds for the purpose of constructing docks, wharves, and warehouses, and acquiring the necessary land therefor by purchase or condemnation, such charter was ineffective to authorize the city to condemn land for warehouse purposes, unless such power was granted by the general laws of the state, the power of eminent domain not being classed as a municipal affair.

[1] Upon the coming down of the remittitur involving the lots belonging to Koyer, only a portion of whose lots were involved in the appeal, dismissal was entered as to the condemnation proceedings, concerning which Koyer had not withdrawn his appeal. It would thus appear that, at the time of the institution of the action to condemn the lots involved in the appeals now before us, the city of Los Angeles had the right to acquire land for the purpose of erecting warehouses thereon, and had a right, as shown by the cases cited involving the question, to issue bonds for the purpose of obtaining money to build such warehouses, but it possessed no power to acquire sites for such purpose by eminent domain proceedings, and that an action prosecuted for such purpose stated objects and purposes not within the provisions of section 1238 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and, therefore, that the invalidity of the proceedings appeared upon the face thereof. Under these circumstances it is strongly contended on the part of the respondents that the following excerpt taken from Freeman on Judgments (5th Ed.) volume 1, page 643, is determinative of this appeal. It is there said: "A judgment, upon its face requiring only an inspection of the record to demonstrate its invalidity, is a mere nullity, in legal effect, no judgment, conferring no right and affording no justification; nothing can be acquired or lost by it; it neither bestows nor extinguishes any right, and may be successfully assailed whenever it is offered as the foundation for the assertion of any claim or title; it neither binds nor bars anyone; all acts performed under it, and all claims flowing out of it are void. The parties attempting to enforce it may be responsible as trespassers. The purchaser at any sale by virtue of its authority finds himself without title and without redress. No actions upon the part of the plaintiff, no inaction upon the part of the defendant, no resulting equity in the hands of third persons, no power residing in any legislature or other department of the government, can invest it with any of the elements of power or of vitality. * * * Such a judgment has been characterized as 'a dead limb upon the judicial tree which may be chopped off at any time capable of bearing no fruit to plaintiff, but constituting a constant menace to defendants.'"

[2] Section 1917 of the Code of Civil Procedure reads: "The jurisdiction sufficient to sustain a record is jurisdiction over the cause, over the parties, and over the thing, when a specific thing is the subject of the judgment." It is so well settled that, when jurisdiction over the subject-matter or over the parties is lacking, any judgment rendered in such an action is void, as to require no citation of authorities. In fact, this statement of the law as urged upon our attention by the respondent is unquestioned by the appellant. The appellant, however, insists that the trial court had jurisdiction to pronounce judgment in the case of The City of Los Angeles v. Koyer et al., although it was not authorized by law to enter the judgment which it did enter, to wit, the condemnation of the lands involved for the purpose of building warehouses thereon. It is insisted on the part of the appellant that jurisdiction to hear and determine the cause, vested in the trial court by reason of the provisions of section 5 of article 6 of the Constitution, and that authority to enter judgment of condemnation in particular cases or instances, or for particular purposes, is controlled by section 1238 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and, of course, controlled the action of the trial court as the section read in 1910 (St. 1909, p. 1032) when the action was begun, and that as the court had jurisdiction to try and enter judgment in the cause, if it entered judgment not authorized by the section of the Code, and the defendants in that action acquiesced in the entry of said judgment and accepted the fruits thereof, to wit, the damages awarded for the taking of the property, and prosecuted no appeal from the judgment, and retained the fruits of the judgment for the intervening years shown to have elapsed between the entry of the judgment and the date of the beginning of these actions, then and in that case all irregularities and errors of the trial court in the entry of the judgment, conceding that the trial court had no authority to enter judgment of condemnation for the specific purpose for which it did, have been waived by the plaintiffs in these actions, and the right to question the judgment no longer exists.

In 15 C. J., page 844, § 164, the rule as to waiver is thus stated: "An absolute want of jurisdiction of the subject matter or cause of action cannot be waived; nor can the doctrine of equitable estoppel be invoked to confer a jurisdiction on a tribunal which has no jurisdiction of the subject matter. But where the court has general jurisdiction of the subject matter, a lack of jurisdiction of the particular case may be waived by failure to take timely and specific objections, or an indication of, or submission to the jurisdiction may raise an estoppel to deny such jurisdiction. So, also, the parties may, either expressly or by their conduct, waive objections to remedies pursued in courts having jurisdiction of the subject matter." Thus it is argued that the trial court had general jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and, even though it lacked jurisdiction of the particular case, the plaintiffs, by accepting the fruits of the judgment, have waived all rights to question the same.

In 7 California Jurisprudence, page 584, the text on the subject of jurisdiction, reads:

"Jurisdiction is the power to hear and determine; and jurisdiction of a particular case is the power to hear and determine that case." That the trial court had jurisdiction to hear and determine the cause before it in the action against Koyer et al., being an eminent domain proceeding, can scarcely be questioned. That it had no authority to enter the judgment, which it did, clearly appears from an inspection of section 1238, Code of Civil Procedure, as it then read.

In Ruling Case Law, volume 7, page 1029, we find the following text peculiarly applicable to this case: "Jurisdiction of the subject matter does not mean simply jurisdiction of the particular case then occupying the attention of the court, but jurisdiction of the class of cases to which that particular case belongs. As applied to the subject-matter of the suit, jurisdiction is likewise conferred by law, and it is incorrect to suppose that the power to decide in any case rests solely on the averments of a pleading, but on the contrary the jurisdiction of a court in no way depends on the sufficiency or insufficiency of the pleadings, and if the pleadings state a cause of action belonging to a general class, and over which the authority of the court extends, then jurisdiction attaches and the court has jurisdiction to hear and determine the issues involved."

As we have seen, the Constitution gives the superior court jurisdiction over the class of cases to which the particular case involved belongs, and the jurisdiction of the court to hear and determine is not absent simply because the law does not authorize the entry of the particular judgment which the court in a particular case may enter.

No contention is made that the court, in the case of The City of Los Angeles v. Koyer et al., did not have jurisdiction over the persons of Rebecca Lee Dorsey and D. F. Donegan.

If what we have said is correct, then the argument of respondent, based upon the text set forth in 15 California Jurisprudence, page 57, has no application. It is there said: "Neither the doctrine of laches nor the statute of limitations has any application to an attack upon a judgment void for lack of jurisdiction, the rule in this respect being different from that governing relief from a judgment which is merely voidable for fraud or similar grounds. The court's power to vacate a judgment or order void on its face is not extinguished by lapse of time, but may be exercised whenever the matter is brought to its attention." Nor do we need to question the rule set forth in the same volume of California Jurisprudence, page 49, reading: "Generally speaking, if a judgment is void it is subject to collateral attack. It has been said that 'A judgment absolutely void may be attacked anywhere, directly or collaterally whenever it presents itself, either by parties or strangers. It is simply a nullity, and can be neither a basis nor evidence of any right whatever,' " etc.

It may be further noted that, while it was held in the case of The City of Los Angeles v. Koyer, 48 Cal. App. 720, 192 P. 301, that the court was without authority to enter the judgment which it did enter, the case does not hold, and there is nothing in the opinion indicating, that it was intended to hold that the trial court did not have jurisdiction over the general class of cases to which the specific case belonged. The ruling of the court is simply to the effect that the law, at the time the action was begun, did not authorize condemnation for the specific purpose involved in that action, and, for that reason, the judgment of the trial court was reversed. The appellate court did not direct the dismissal of the action for want of general jurisdiction over eminent domain proceedings.

[3] Are the respondents in this action estopped by reason of the fact that as defendants in the action of The City of Los Angeles v. Koyer, Rebecca Lee Dorsey and D. F. Donegan acquiesced in the judgment and accepted the fruits thereof?

In 15 California Jurisprudence, page 55, the right to attack a judgment is thus stated: "Ordinarily, no question is raised as to the right of a party to a judgment to attack it upon any proper grounds. Such a person may, however, be estopped to do so where he has enjoyed the fruits of the judgment." We do not need to consider how far this doctrine has been extended to divorce proceedings, but will confine ourselves simply to actions involving eminent domain proceedings and money judgments, as the question of public policy enters into judgments in divorce proceedings.

In 2 Ruling Case Law, page 61, the right of a party to attack a judgment after having received the fruits thereof, is thus spoken of by the text-writer: "It is quite generally conceded that one cannot ordinarily accept or secure a benefit under a judgment or decree, and then appeal from it or sue out a writ of error, when the effect of his appeal or writ of error may be to annul the judgment."

In 10 Ruling Case Law, page 209, we find the rule as to accepting awards in eminent domain proceedings worded as follows: "Where, however, a land owner accepts a sum awarded to him as damages in condemnation proceedings, he is estopped from taking and prosecuting an appeal from the award." This rule is a little more fully stated in 20 C. J., page 1054: "An owner who accepts a compensation awarded, cannot object to the amount of the award, or claim that the taking was unauthorized or that the condemnation proceedings were irregular, in the absence of fraud, collusion or prejudice, nor can he claim the land condemned, even by a return of the compensation paid."

The foregoing statements of the rule are supported by a long list of citations found in the volume referred to, and especially the rule that acceptance of the award and acquiescence in the judgment, as appears to characterize the circumstances in the instant cases, estops the parties from further questioning the proceedings, even though the taking is unauthorized by the statutes.

In the notes appended to the case of McKain v. Mullen, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1, beginning on page 21, may be found a number of cases showing when a landowner is estopped. We quote from a few of them: "A landowner who accepts payment of damages awarded him for the taking of a portion of his land for a public highway cannot be heard afterwards to declare the proceedings for opening such way void. Town v. Blackberry, 29 Ill. 137; Kile v. Yellowhead, 80 Ill. 208; Hartshorn v. Potroff, 89 Ill. 509." Likewise: "A landowner who accepts the damages awarded him for land taken in the laying out of a public highway virtually dedicates his land as a public highway, and is estopped from testing the validity of the proceedings to take it, however defective they may be. Karber v. Nellis, 22 Wis. 215; State v. Langer, 29 Wis. 68; Schatz v. Pfeil, 56 Wis. 429, 14 N. W. 628; Moore v. Roberts, 64 Wis. 538, 25 N. W. 564." Again: "The acceptance by a landowner of a sum awarded to him as damages for opening a highway across his land estops him from prosecuting an appeal to reverse the judgment establishing the highway. Glassburn v. Deer, 143 Ind. 174, 41 N. E. 376." To the same effect are the cases of Mississippi & M. R. Co. v. Byington, 14 Iowa, 572; Baltimore, O. & C. R. Co. v. Johnson, 84 Ind. 420; Parks v. Dallas Terminal R. & Union Depot Co., 34 Tex. Civ. App. 341, 78 S. W. 533. A parallel case is that of Sherman v. McKeon, 38 N. Y. 266, where it is held: "A land owner whose land has been condemned by right of eminent domain waives his right to appeal from the judgment in the condemnation proceedings, by accepting and retaining the damages awarded to him for his property; and this, notwithstanding the law under which the condemnation was had may be unconstitutional because it authorizes the taking of private property for other than public purposes."

In Hensley v. Rich, 191 Ind. 294, 132 N. E. 632, 636, 18 A. L. R. 1118, the rule relative to a waiver of the right to further proceeding after accepting the fruits of a judgment reads as follows: "By electing to follow the specific funds paid into court by Rich & Rich in satisfaction of the judgment and decree, and obtaining an order of court which necessarily operated to prevent Rich & Rich from receiving their money back, and prevented the money from earning interest for their benefit in the hands of Ryan, appellant has estopped himself to challenge the judgment as against the appellees Rich & Rich. A party cannot seize upon and hold for his own benefit the amount of a judgment paid in by the party against whom the judgment was recovered, and at the same time successfully maintain an appeal on the ground that there was no valid judgment. Williams v. Richards, 152 Ind. 528, 53 N. E. 765; Western Constr. Co. v. Carroll County, 178 Ind. 684, 688, 98 N. E. 347." In the instant case, the money paid in by the city has been retained for a period now exceeding eighteen years, and at the time of the beginning of these actions had been retained for a period of about thirteen years, during all of which time the city has been deprived of the use of said moneys and the landowners have had the use and benefit thereof, and the opportunity to earn interest thereon.

That the doctrine of waiver and estoppel, by reason of accepting the fruits of the award in condemnation proceedings is applicable, even though there may be a want of jurisdiction, is further supported by the case of Denver City Irrigation & Water Co. v. Middaugh, 12 Colo. 434, 21 P. 565, 566, 13 Am. St. Rep. 234, a case decided by the Supreme Court of Colorado. It is there said: "It is a familiar principle of the law that a party accepting and retaining the fruits of a void judgment is estopped from assailing the judgment itself. [Citing some of the cases heretofore referred to.] In none of the cases, however, did it become necessary to determine the effect of receiving the benefits of a judgment void for the want of jurisdiction in the court over the subject-matter of the suit, although the language used in some of the opinions is broad enough to cover such cases. In the case at bar the court below, in some of the instructions given to the jury, seems to have drawn a distinction between the case of a party accepting the fruits of a judgment rendered by a court without jurisdiction of the subject-matter and a case in which the party has received the fruits of a judgment voidable for the want of jurisdiction over the person, or on account of some informality occurring in the proceedings, antecedent to judgment, but this theory is expressly waived by counsel for appellee in their argument filed in this court, and, after diligent search, I have been unable to find any authority in support of the theory of the trial court. * * * And as appellee, after the notice of the invalidity of such proceeding, continued to retain the money so paid, I am of the opinion that he is estopped from denying the validity of such judgment, and that he should be held bound by that adjudication the same as he would have been had the court had complete jurisdiction, and that for the purposes of this action the same should be treated in all respects as a valid judgment."

In the instant case the record shows that the respondents had knowledge, in 1910 and 1912, at the time of accepting the awards, of all the grounds now advanced against the validity of the judgments entered in the case of the City of Los Angeles v. Koyer et al., notwithstanding they prosecuted no appeals, acquiesced in the judgments, and accepted the awards. The Colorado case from which we have just quoted is reaffirmed in Handy Ditch Co. v. South Side Ditch Co., 26 Colo. 333, 58 P. 30. To the same effect is the case of Field v. Kincaid, 67 Colo. 20, 184 P. 832.

In Tyler v. Shea, 4 N. D. 377, 61 N. W. 468, 469, 50 Am. St. Rep. 660, a number of cases are cited supporting the text on the subject which we are considering, reading as follows: "The rule is well settled that one cannot accept or secure a benefit under a judgment, and then appeal from it, when the effect of his appeal may be to annul the judgment, unless his right to the benefit is absolute, and cannot possibly be affected by the reversal of the judgment." In the Koyer Case, in which Dorsey and Donegan were defendants, a reversal of the judgment on the grounds presented upon these appeals would have absolutely barred their right to any portion of the awards. Thus, it is shown that the plaintiff's right to the benefits is not absolute, but does not and did not exist, save and except upon their acquiescence in the validity of the judgment and their tacit agreement that the judgment entered was sufficient to transfer title to the property to the city of Los Angeles, whose money they received and appropriated to their own uses and benefit.

In the case of Brooks v. Yell County, 76 Ark. 67, 88 S. W. 590, it was held: "That a land owner, after condemnation proceedings had been had, who received the amount of the award, was estopped from claiming the land appropriated and could not, without the consent of the county, restore his rights by a return of the money."

That the acceptance of the award is an affirmation of the proceedings and cannot afterwards be questioned is affirmed in the case of Cape Girardeau & T. B. T. R. Co. v. Southern Ill. & Mo. Bridge Co., 215 Mo. 286, 114 S. W. 1084, where a number of authorities are cited.

Though the facts involved on these appeals are distinguishable in some particulars from the circumstances involved in the cases of Young v. City of Los Angeles (City of Los Angeles v. Morris) 86 Cal. App. 13, 260 P. 798, 802, the principles of law enunciated in the elaborate and well-considered opinion prepared by Presiding Justice Works are applicable here, and, we think, controlling. The authorities there cited are directly in point. The opinion is too lengthy to be quoted in full, but a few excerpts taken therefrom will illustrate its applicability: "The receipt of the money operates as an estoppel, and the damages paid have the same effect as a conveyance, and vest the title in the corporation. The consent of the plaintiff is apparent from his conduct in the matter. He evidently appeared and interposed objections to the first report made by the commissioners, and probably induced them to make the award of $1,500. He had a right to object to the confirmation of the report, upon the ground that the land was taken without his consent, and, had he done so, the report would have been set aside. * * * This he failed to do, and consented to receive the money without objection. The corporation was not bound to pay the money, except upon a waiver of all objections as to the title conferred, and his receipt of the money was a waiver of the objection, and a sufficient consideration for his affirmation of the title in the corporation"—citing Matter of John & Cherry Streets, 19 Wend. (N. Y.) 659; Sherman v. McKeon, 38 N. Y. 266. "The voluntary acceptance by the defendant of the damages assessed and awarded to him by the judgment, with a knowledge of all the facts precludes him from afterwards controverting the rights of the plaintiff as establishing by the judgment. Nor is it material in such case that the judgment may have been erroneous, or even void"—citing Kile v. Town of Yellowhead, 80 Ill. 208. Again, a number of cases are cited to the point that the acceptance of the award estops the parties from claiming that the proceedings are void. Hearing in the Supreme Court was denied in both the Young and the Morris Cases. It must be further borne in mind that the respondents in the cases now before us delayed some five years after the decision in the Koyer Case before beginning these actions, the Koyer Case being the principal one relied upon by the respondents as establishing their rights to reclaim the lands.

In view of what the record discloses, as set forth in the foregoing, and the authorities cited, the conclusion seems to us unavoidable that Rebecca Lee Dorsey and D. F. Donegan, in 1912, by the acceptance of the award, under the conditions attendant upon this case, waived all rights to reclaim the property involved, and especially is this true where said parties remained silent for some thirteen years without questioning the title of the city, and, likewise, have retained possession of many thousands of dollars, and had the use thereof for a period now exceeding eighteen years.

[4, 5] It is further contended on the part of the appellant that, even though this court should hold that respondents are not estopped to question the title of the city of Los Angeles to the property involved, the judgment as rendered is erroneous; that the tenders made by the respondents were insufficient. While the judgments must be reversed for the reasons set forth in this opinion, we think the contention of the appellant, in relation to the form of the judgment, well taken. Under any view of the case we cannot very well see how the plaintiffs would be entitled to reclaim the property without first returning to the city the amount of the awards accepted by them, together with interest thereon at the legal rate from the date of acceptance until the date of payment, less any profits accruing to the city by reason of any possession or occupancy, or rental value of the premises involved. The plaintiffs have appealed to a court of equity, and it is a well-settled rule of law that, in order to obtain the benefit of any alleged equities, the parties so claiming must do equity.

The judgment and decree in the case of Rebecca Lee Dorsey against the city of Los Angeles is reversed.

The judgment and decree in the case of William P. Donegan, as administrator of the estate of D. F. Donegan, deceased, against the city of Los Angeles, is reversed.

111 Cal. App. (Supp.) 779

PEOPLE v. RADICH.

Cr. A. 513.

Appellate Department, Superior Court, Los Angeles County, California.

Dec. 8, 1930.

1. Statutes ☞158.

Repeals by implication are not favored.

2. Statutes ☞162.

Later general statute does not repeal earlier special statute dealing with same subject, unless statutes are irreconcilably inconsistent.

3. Criminal law ☞116.

Later general statute relating to change of venue for bias or prejudice held not inconsistent with, hence did not impliedly repeal, earlier penal statute relating to same procedure in justice's court (Code Civ. Proc. § 170, as amended by St. 1929, p. 958; Pen. Code, § 1431).

Code Civ. Proc. § 170, as amended by St. 1929, p. 958, provides that no justice, judge, or justice of peace shall act as such when it is made to appear probable that, by reason of his bias or prejudice, a fair and impartial trial cannot be had. Pen. Code, § 1431, provides that if proceeding is in justice's court, change of place of trial may be had before commencement of trial, when it appears from defendant's affidavit he has reason to and does believe he cannot have fair and impartial trial before justice because of prejudice or bias of such justice.

4. Criminal law ☞115.

Mere filing petition for change of venue and supporting affidavit on ground of justice's bias and prejudice held not to oust court of jurisdiction or require transfer of case (Pen. Code, § 1431).

5. Criminal law ☞134(2).

Affidavit supporting accused's petition for change of venue because justice was prejudiced held insufficient for not stating supporting facts (Pen. Code, § 1431).

6. Criminal law ☞134(4).

Accused's verified petition for change of venue stating facts showing bias and prejudice of justice was sufficient, and, in absence of opposing affidavit, denial of petition was error (Pen. Code, § 1431).

The verified petition alleged that justice called accused, who was charged with theft, a thief, and thereby alleged sufficient facts showing bias and prejudice.

7. False pretenses ☞20.

In prosecution for theft, instruction that passing or writing checks without sufficient funds in bank was theft held error (Pen. Code, §§ 476a, 484).

Instruction was that "passing or writing checks without sufficient funds in the bank to cover said checks, unless an agreement is proved with the bank to honor overdraft checks, is theft." This was error because crime of theft defined by Pen. Code, § 484, does not include the offense which court attempted to define, and which is a separate offense defined by section 476a.

8. False pretenses ☞6.

To constitute drawing check with intent to defraud, there must be intent to defraud and knowledge drawer has not sufficient funds or credit to meet check (Pen. Code, § 476a).

Appeal from Justice's Court, Belevedere Township; John Zaring, Justice.

R. P. Radich was convicted of theft, and he appeals.

Reversed, and new trial ordered.

D. Joseph Coyne, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Buron Fitts, Dist. Atty., and Thomas F. O'Brien, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Los Angeles, for the People.

SHAW, J.

Defendant was convicted in a justice's court on a charge of theft. Before the trial began he filed and presented to the court a petition for change of venue and an affidavit in support thereof. One of the grounds for change of venue, as stated in the petition, was that the justice was so biased and prejudiced against defendant that he could not have a fair and impartial trial before said justice. Without the filing of any counter affidavits the petition was denied.

One of the questions presented by this appeal is whether the case made by the petition is governed by section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure or by section 1431 of the Penal Code, respondent contending that Code of Civil Procedure, section 170, which is the later enactment, has effected a repeal of Penal Code, section 1431, by implication. Code of Civil Procedure, section 170, as amended in 1929 (St. 1929, p. 958), provides that:

"No justice, judge or justice of the peace shall sit or act as such in any action or proceeding: * * *

"5. When it is made to appear probable that, by reason of bias or prejudice of such justice, judge, or justice of the peace a fair and impartial trial cannot be had before him."

Penal Code, section 1431, which has not been amended since it was originally enacted in 1872, is directed by its context to criminal cases, and provides that: "If the action or proceeding is in a justice's court, a change of the place of trial may be had at any time before the trial commences: 1. When it appears from the affidavit of the defendant that he has reason to believe, and does believe, that he cannot have a fair and impartial trial before the justice about to try the case, by reason of the prejudice or bias of such justice, the cause must be transferred to another justice of the same or an adjoining township."

[1-3] The rule is well settled that repeals by implication are not favored. Also applicable here, since Code of Civil Procedure, section 170, as amended, is the more general provision, is the rule that: "Where two statutes treat of the same subject, one being special and the other general, unless they are irreconcilably inconsistent, the latter, although later in date, will not be held to have repealed the former, but the special act will prevail in its application to the subject-matter, so far as coming within its particular provisions." Riley v. Forbes, 193 Cal. 740, 745, 227 P. 768, 770. So far as concerns the right of appellant to a change of judges on the ground stated, the two Code sections cited are entirely consistent. Moreover, Code of Civil Procedure, § 170, makes no provision for any procedure for claiming, in a criminal case in a justice's court, the right conferred by it, its procedural provisions being limited to courts of record, whereas Penal Code, § 1431, does provide a mode of proceeding. There being no inconsistency between the two sections, it is clear that Code of Civil Procedure, § 170, has not repealed Penal Code, § 1431, and the latter section is the one to be followed in all cases coming within its terms, of which this is one.

[4-6] The mere filing of the papers above mentioned did not oust the court of jurisdiction or require the case to be transferred to another court. Miles v. Justice's Court, 13 Cal. App. 454, 110 P. 349; Lowrey v. Hogue, 85 Cal. 600, 24 P. 995; Ex parte Wright, 119 Cal. 401, 51 P. 639. The affidavit alone was insufficient, for while it stated defendant's belief that he could not have a fair and impartial trial, yet as a reason for this belief it merely stated the conclusion that the justice was prejudiced—a conclusion which the court must be able to draw from facts stated in support of it. Lowrey v. Hogue, supra. The petition itself, however, was verified, and is therefore to be regarded as an affidavit. 1 Cal. Jur. 653. It does state certain facts which show bias and prejudice of the trial judge against defendant; e. g., that he called defendant a thief—the charge being theft. Since there was no affidavit disputing these statements, it was error to deny the petition for change of venue.

[7, 8] At the trial it appeared that defendant had obtained money from the complaining witness by stating that a certain bill was paid and producing a receipt for such payment. It was also shown that he obtained the receipt by giving a check which was not honored because of insufficient funds in the bank on which it was drawn. Defendant testified that he thought he had sufficient funds in bank to pay the check. The court instructed the jury that "passing or writing checks without sufficient funds in the bank to cover said checks, unless an agreement is proved with the bank to honor overdraft checks, is theft." This was error. The crime of theft does not include the offense which the court attempted to state in this instruction. Pen. Code, §§ 476a, 484. They are distinct and separate offenses and a defendant charged with one cannot be convicted of the other. Moreover, it is necessary to a violation of Penal Code, § 476a, that there be an intent to defraud and a knowledge at the time of drawing or uttering the check that the drawer has not sufficient funds or credit to meet it, both of which factors were omitted from the instruction given. The jury may very well have convicted defendant because of this instruction.

The judgment is reversed, and a new trial of the case in the superior court is ordered.

PEOPLE v. GLOBE GRAIN & MILLING CO.
S. F. 13907.

Supreme Court of California.

Dec. 15, 1930.

1. Constitutional law ⇨62.

Fish ⇨9.

Statute allowing reduction of food fish by others than packers held not unconstitutional as granting fish commission uncontrolled discretion (St. 1929, p. 903, amending St. 1919, p. 1203, § 5).

St. 1929, p. 903, amending Fish Reduction Act (St. 1919, p. 1203) § 5, authorizes fish and game commission to grant revocable permits in such amounts and subject to such restrictions and regulations as commission may prescribe to take and use fish by reduction or extraction process for manufacture of edible products, provided, among other things, it be shown to commission's satisfaction that such use of fish will not tend to deplete species, or result in waste or deterioration of such fish.

2. Constitutional law ⇨62.

Statute granting discretion to administrative body is not unconstitutional, where statute contains guide to and limitation on administrative body's actions.

3. Constitutional law ⇨318.

If statute requires administrative body to determine existence of necessary facts before making discretionary decision, essential requirement of "due process" is complied with, and statute does not give uncontrolled discretion.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Due Process of Law," see Words and Phrases.]

4. Constitutional law ⇨236.

Statute allowing reduction of food fish by others than packers held not invalid as discriminatory (St. 1919, p. 1203, § 5, as amended by St. 1929, p. 903).

Fish Reduction Act (St. 1919, p. 1203) § 5, as amended by St. 1929, p. 903, is not discriminatory merely because it does not expressly prohibit discrimination between applicants for permits on theory that thereby fish commission may favor one over others and perhaps create monopoly by granting permit to one person to take all available fish, since statute will be construed with constitutional provisions against discrimination.

5. Constitutional law ⇨48.

Statute is presumed constitutional.

6. Constitutional law ⇨48.

Statute will be given construction consistent with validity if possible.

7. Constitutional law ⇨42.

Charge of unconstitutional discrimination can only be raised where issue is involved, and only by person discriminated against.

8. Evidence ⇨83(1).

Presumption is that fish commission will exercise its powers in conformity with statute and Constitution (St. 1919, p. 1203, § 5, as amended by St. 1929, p. 903).

9. Fish ⇨10(1).

If applications for permit for reduction of food fish exceed in quantity amount of fish which fish commission finds may safely be taken, it would be commission's duty to make equitable apportionment of permits (St. 1919, p. 1203, § 5, as amended by St. 1929, p. 903).

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; H. G. Jorgensen, Judge.

Action by the People of the State of California, brought by the City Attorney of Monterey, against the Globe Grain & Milling Company. From an order granting a preliminary injunction restraining the taking of sardines for reduction purposes, defendant appeals.

Reversed with directions.

William B. Hornblower and Fabian D. Brown, both of San Francisco, and C. C. Baker, of Salinas, for appellant.

Argyll Campbell, of Monterey, and B. D. Marx Greene and Carl Westerfeld, both of San Francisco, for the People.

PER CURIAM.

This is an appeal from an order of the superior court granting a preliminary injunction. The action was brought by the city attorney of Monterey to restrain the taking of sardines by defendant for reduction purposes.

es, on the ground that such use of the fish caused irreparable injury to the people of the state and thereby constituted a public nuisance. The defense was that the taking was authorized by the terms of a permit granted by the Fish and Game Commission pursuant to a statute enacted in 1929. This would, of course, normally be a sufficient defense. Cal. Civ. Code, § 3482. Plaintiff contended, and the lower court held, that the statute was unconstitutional and hence did not justify acts which would otherwise have amounted to a nuisance. Some suggestion is also made by plaintiff that the statute does not confer upon the commission itself the power to grant the type of permit involved herein, but we deem this to be without merit. The sole basis upon which the injunction was granted was the alleged invalidity of the statute.

The law in question is the "Fish Reduction Act" (St. 1919, p. 1203) as amended in 1929. St. of 1929, p. 901, Deering's General Laws, Supp. 1929, Act 2895, p. 3224. The original statute, as enacted in 1919 and amended in subsequent years, had for its object the conservation of food fish for purposes of human consumption. However, in recognition of the problem facing canners in the use of an excess catch and the disposal of fish which are broken or otherwise unsuited for canning, the statute permitted sardine canners actually engaged in operating their plants to use not more than 32½ per cent. of their catch in a reduction plant, and also allowed the reduction of all fish unfit for ordinary methods of preserving, where they had not been deliberately taken into the plant in such condition. These provisions were construed and upheld in People v. Monterey Fish Products Co., 195 Cal. 548, 234 P. 398, 38 A. L. R. 1186.

In 1929 the statute was again amended to allow the reduction of fish by others than packers of sardines. The amendment reads, in part, as follows: " * * * the fish and game commission may grant a revocable permit or permits in such amount and subject to such restrictions, rules or regulations as the fish and game commission may adopt or prescribe to take and use fish by a reduction or extraction process for the manufacture of edible products fit for, intended to be used and in fact used for human consumption providing it shall be shown and appear to the satisfaction of the fish and game commission that such use of such fish will not tend to deplete the species, or result in waste or deterioration of such fish; and provided, further, that no such permit shall be granted unless at least fifty per cent (50%) of the wet weight of the whole round fish or all of the oil extracted from such fish is manufactured into such products within the State of California." It will be observed that while this provision allows the taking of fish for reduction purposes, it is nevertheless required that the product be intended for and suited to human consumption. Section 5.

Defendant has a reduction plant at Monterey. On June 22, 1929, it made application to the fish and game commission for a permit under the foregoing statute. On November 12, 1929, the commission held a hearing on the application, and on December 9, 1929, granted a permit to take and use not more than 7,500 tons for the period of the sardine season ending February 15, 1930. It is this permit which is relied upon as a defense to the suit for an injunction.

[1, 2] Plaintiff's contention is that the amendment to the statute is unconstitutional in that it grants to the commission an uncontrolled discretion, and permits discrimination between applicants. We are of the opinion that the amendment, properly construed, does not exhibit either of these defects.

The commission is given a broad but not an uncontrolled discretion. It may grant a permit only upon a showing that the use of the fish "will not tend to deplete the species or result in waste or deterioration," and the permit is always revocable. Here we have a condition limiting the exercise of the delegated power and, indeed, the only practicable one under the circumstances. Certainly the Legislature cannot intelligently prescribe any maximum quantity for all applicants or for any one applicant; nor would it be practicable for the Legislature to fix any period of time for the duration of the permit. These are important matters, but an administrative body in close touch with the conditions of the industry is far more competent to determine them than the Legislature. Aside from this practical consideration there is nothing unconstitutional in the grant to an administrative body of such authority, where the statute contains a guide to and a limitation upon its actions. Tarpey v. McClure, 190 Cal. 593, 213 P. 983; Bank of Italy v. Johnson, 200 Cal. 1, 251 P. 784; see, also, 15 Cal. L. Rev. 408. Here the statute contains the necessary limitation in the requirement that each applicant must make a showing, and the commission must find, that the granting of the permit will not conflict with the fundamental object of the statute—the conservation of food fish. In short, the question presented by the vesting of discretionary power in the commission by this amendment is very much the same as that presented by the original statute; and as to that this court said in People v. Monterey Fish Products Co., supra, at page 558 of 195 Cal., 234 P. 398, 402: "There is no merit in the contention that the act is invalid for the reason that it purports to vest in the commission arbitrary authority and unguided discretion in that it may allow one canner to take 25 per cent. and another 5 per cent. and another 1 per cent. of excess fish. The act confers discretion upon the commission, it is true, but such discretion is neither unguided nor uncontrolled. Its exercise is made dependent upon the findings of fact after a hearing 'that there is no market for the fish referred to in said application and that the taking or using of said fish in a reduction plant will not tend to impair or deplete said species of fish.' It is apparent that there may be varying circumstances of time, place, method of catching fish, location where they are to be found with relation to the location of the cannery, etc., which may legitimately justify the allowance of a larger leeway in one case than in another. The Legislature may, without violating any rule or principle of the Constitution, confer upon an administrative board or officer a large measure of discretion, provided the exercise thereof is guided and controlled by rules prescribed therefor. Tarpey v. McClure, 190 Cal. 593, 213 P. 983, and cases cited."

[3] The two statutes are similar in the one important respect that in each the discretionary power vested in the commission is controlled by a standard or guide set forth in the law itself. It is true that one contains more specific restrictions than the other. This is purely a matter of legislative policy, and does not affect the constitutional problem. The only substantial difference between them, so far as concerns the question of administrative discretion, is that the original statute expressly provides for a hearing. The difference is not material. The essential requirement of due process is merely that the administrative officer or body be required to determine the existence or nonexistence of the necessary facts before any decision is made. If the statute requires this, it does not vest an uncontrolled discretion, and the officer or body may not act arbitrarily. Riley v. Chambers, 181 Cal. 589, 185 P. 855, 8 A. L. R. 418; Doble Steam Motors Corp. v. Daugherty, 195 Cal. 158, 232 P. 140; Ex parte McManus, 151 Cal. 331, 90 P. 702.

[4-6] The contention that the statute is discriminatory is purely speculative. On its face it treats all persons in the same manner, authorizing the commission to extend its benefits to anyone so long as the interests of the people in the preservation of food fish are safeguarded. The theory of the attack appears to be that inasmuch as the Legislature has not expressly prohibited discrimination between applicants, the commission may therefore favor one over others, and might perhaps create a monopoly by granting a permit to one person to take all the available fish. The courts have given scant consideration to such reasoning. The Supreme Court of the United States disposed of a similar contention in the following language: "Learned counsel for the defendant suggests some extreme cases, showing how reckless and arbitrary might be the action of executive officers proceeding under an act of Congress, the enforcement of which affects the enjoyment or value of private property. It will be time enough to deal with such cases as and when they arise." Monongahela Bridge v. United States, 216 U. S. 177, 195, 30 S. Ct. 356, 361, 54 L. Ed. 435. A statute cannot be declared unconstitutional upon such implications. The rule is just the contrary. It is of no consequence that the statute makes no reference to an equitable apportionment of the benefits to be granted. The important thing is that it contains no express grant of authority to the commission to indulge in favoritism or to make or enforce discriminatory rules. A presumption of constitutionality protects every legislative act. Being silent on the matter of apportionment of the benefits, the statute will be construed together with the constitutional provisions against discrimination, and, as so construed, must be upheld. County of San Luis Obispo v. Murphy, 162 Cal. 588, 123 P. 808, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 712; Chesebrough v. City and County of San Francisco, 153 Cal. 559, 96 P. 288; Wheeler v. Herbert, 152 Cal. 224, 92 P. 353; In re Spencer, 149 Cal. 396, 86 P. 896, 117 Am. St. Rep. 137, 9 Ann. Cas. 1105; Lent v. Tillson, 72 Cal. 404, 14 P. 71; Plymouth Coal Co. v. Pennsylvania, 232 U. S. 531, 34 S. Ct. 359, 58 L. Ed. 713; Estate of Johnson, 139 Cal. 532, 73 P. 424, 96 Am. St. Rep. 161; Quong Ham Wah Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 184 Cal. 26, 192 P. 1021, 12 A. L. R. 1190; 12 C. J. 787, § 220; 5 Cal. Jur. 615, § 46; 628, §§ 56, 57; 6 R. C. L. 78, § 77.

[7] The two principles just considered, namely, that a statute is presumed to be constitutional, and that it will be given a construction consistent with validity if at all possible, dispose of the attack leveled at the statute itself. We do not mean to hold that the decision of the commission in granting a permit to the defendant must necessarily be affirmed as a proper exercise of its discretion. That question is not before us. No contention is made that there was discrimination in the granting of this particular permit. Hence, plaintiff is in no position to raise this constitutional question. It is well established that a charge of unconstitutional discrimination can only be raised in a case where this issue is involved in the determination of the action, and then only by the person or a member of the class of persons discriminated against. Estabrook Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 177 Cal. 767, 177 P. 848; 5 Cal. Jur. 622, §§ 52, 53; 6 R. C. L. 89, §§ 87, 88, 89; 12 C. J. 768, § 189. Although this rule is subject to certain exceptions (see Quong Ham Wah Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, supra), none of them are applicable to the situation presented by this case.

[8, 9] It may be observed in conclusion that the Legislature, in its desire to further the program of fish conservation without unduly restricting the development of this industry, has had occasion to change the scope and method of operation of this statute a number of times. Presumably the present amendment represents its well-considered judgment on the most reasonable and practicable method of achieving both of these ends. We should be slow to disturb the result of this judgment, and in no case should we anticipate capricious acts which are not intended by the Legislature and which may never take place. See In re Holmes, 187 Cal. 640, 203 P. 398; In re Culver, 84 Cal. App. 295, 257 P. 876; Rode v. Siebe, 119 Cal. 518, 51 P. 869, 39 L. R. A. 342. It is to be presumed that the commission will exercise its powers in conformity with the statute and Constitution of the state. It is to be expected that it will formulate reasonable rules of policy and practice. Ex parte McManus, 151 Cal. 331, 90 P. 702. In the event that the applications for permits should exceed in quantity requested the amount of fish which the commission finds may safely be taken, it would be the duty of the commission to make an equitable apportionment of its permits. Unless and until the commission is guilty of dereliction in these matters, and a charge of arbitrary action or discrimination is raised by a party affected by its decision, there is no basis for the intervention of this court. Should the question be presented at some future time in the proper manner, we would review the order of the commission in the same manner that we review the orders of other administrative bodies and officers.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to dissolve the injunction.

PARRA v. CLEAVER.

Chv. 250.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

Dec. 2, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 22, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 29, 1931.

1. Appeal and error ⇨1061(3).

Denial of nonsuit is not prejudicial error, where facts sufficient to support judgment are in evidence before or after denial.

2. Negligence ⇨85(3).

Sixteen months old child, not having sufficient understanding to be contributorily negligent, nor otherwise shown negligent, could not be charged with contributory negligence.

3. Automobiles ⇨162(8).

Greater care is required of truck driver where he knows there are small children at play, than where only mature people are involved.

4. Automobiles ⇨244(36).

Reasonable inference if raised by evidence showing negligence of truck driver causing injury to child will sustain judgment awarding recovery.

5. Automobiles ⇨245(8).

Whether due care required truck driver to look for children on all sides of truck in places of danger before backing truck, held for jury.

6. Appeal and error ⇨996.

Evidence raises inference of negligence of truck driver causing injury to child when backing truck, precluding appellate court from disturbing verdict as unsupported by evidence.

Evidence showed that truck driver, after driving into yard to deliver laundry, knew that children were playing around truck, that driver walked around rear of truck to see that no children were there and then went to right side, where he stepped on running board and waited a few minutes, but that view of left-hand side of truck was obscured by truck body, and that injured child may have approached on left-hand side of truck and was in position of danger when truck was backed up.

7. Appeal and error ⇨1064(1), 1067.

Judgment will not be reversed because of giving or refusing of instructions not harming appellant.

8. Damages ⇨132(1).

$1,950 damages to sixteen months old child suffering severe injuries about face and head, some of which were permanent, held not excessive.

9. Appeal and error ⇨1170(9).

Where verdict was only moderately compensatory, appellant suffered no injury by failure to instruct on punitive damages, and verdict could not be disturbed therefor (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; H. G. Ames, Judge.

Action by Jose Parra, an infant, by Manuel Parra, his guardian ad litem, against A. W. Cleaver, individually and as doing business under the firm name and style of Sanitary Laundry. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Guss Hagenstein, of Fullerton, for appellant.

D. G. Wettlin and Head, Rutan & Scovel, all of Santa Ana, for respondent.

MARKS, J.

This action grew out of an automobile accident occurring on the 18th day of September, 1926, in the town of Buena Park in Orange county. Jose Parra was then an infant of the age of sixteen months. Appellant was the proprietor of the Sanitary Laundry. At the time of the accident L. A. Baumstark was operating a laundry truck as the agent and servant of appellant and was acting within the scope of his employment. On the evening of September 18, 1926, at some time between 6:15 and 7 o'clock p. m., Baumstark drove into the yard of a house occupied by the family of Manuel Parra, the father of the infant, and delivered some wet wash to the Parra home, leaving the truck standing in the yard about fifty feet from the house. Returning to the truck he saw several children, all under the age of eight years, playing around or near the vehicle. Approaching its left side and throwing the empty laundry bag over the seat into the car, he walked around the rear end to see that no children were in his way before backing preparatory to driving from the premises. Coming around to the right-hand side opposite the cab and stepping up on the running board, he told the children to get away from the truck as he was going to back it. He testified that after he mounted the running board he "stood there and looked around a few minutes to see if everything was clear." He then took his seat behind the steering wheel, started his engine, cramped his front wheels to the left, and backed the truck. After proceeding about three feet he felt the left front wheel jar as though it had run over some object. As he moved further to the rear he noticed the body of Jose Parra lying on the ground in front of his truck. He stopped his vehicle, picked the baby up, and seeing that it was badly hurt, called its mother and then took it to a hospital, where the wounds were dressed and it was given treatment. The child was confined to this hospital for about three weeks, when it was moved to the County Hospital, where it remained for several months before being discharged. Baumstark was the only witness testifying to the manner in which the accident happened and there is no conflict in the evidence upon this point. However, he did testify that it was dark and the lights of the truck were burning at the time of the accident. This was denied by two witnesses for respondent, who testified that the accident happened about ten minutes after the sun had set and while it was still daylight and that the lights on the laundry truck were not illuminated.

The case was tried before a jury, which returned a verdict in favor of respondent in the sum of $1,950.

Appellant urges four grounds for a reversal of the judgment: First, that the trial court erred in denying his motion for nonsuit; second, that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the judgment; third, that the trial court erred in refusing to give an instruction proposed by him; and fourth, that the trial court erred in denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] The denial of a motion for a nonsuit is not prejudicial error where facts sufficient to support the judgment are in evidence either before or after the denial of the motion. Cosby v. Cline, 186 Cal. 698, 200 P. 801. Whether or not denial of this motion was prejudicial error must depend upon our conclusions as to whether there was sufficient evidence to sustain the judgment. Appellant's last specification of error depends upon a decision of his second and third specifications, which are the only ones requiring our consideration.

In support of his contention that the evidence was not sufficient to sustain the judgment, appellant argues, first, that it shows respondent guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, and second, that it shows no negligence on the part of the driver of the laundry truck.

[2] In the case of Todd v. Orcutt, 42 Cal. App. 687, 183 P. 963, 964, it was said: "An infant may be so very young that, like an idiot or a lunatic, no negligence may legally be imputed to him." As Jose Parra was only sixteen months of age at the time of his injury and as there was no evidence indicating that he had sufficient mind or understanding to enable him to be guilty of contributory negligence, and as the record is barren of any evidence pointing to contributory negligence on his part, we cannot charge him with it.

[3] In considering whether or not there was any evidence showing negligence on the part of Baumstark, we must bear in mind that a greater degree of care is required of the driver of a vehicle where he knows there are small children at play than in the case where only people of mature discretion are involved. As was said in the case of Lampton v. Davis Standard Bread Co., 48 Cal. App. 116, 191 P. 710, 711: "The proximity of the place where Graham was driving to the adjacent school grounds, and the hour, at which children might, with certainty, be expected to be using the street, imposed upon him a greater degree of caution than he might be required to use under ordinary circumstances. That which would be but ordinary negligence in reference to a grown person may be gross negligence as respects a child."

[4] While the evidence as to the manner in which the injury to Jose Parra occurred is undisputed, still if a reasonable inference pointing to the negligence of Baumstark may be drawn from it, such inference will be sufficient to sustain the judgment. It was held in the case of Wilbur v. Wilbur, 197 Cal. 1, 239 P. 332, 334, that: "The findings of the trial court upon conflicting evidence are conclusive, and all reasonable inferences are to be indulged in support of the findings. Treadwell v. Nickel, 194 Cal. 243, 261, 228 P. 25. The burden is upon appellant who claims error to show its existence. Hayne on New Trial and Appeal (Rev. Ed.) § 285, p. 1576, and cases cited. Where two or more inferences may reasonably be deduced from a certain state of facts or circumstances, a reviewing court is not permitted to substitute its deductions for those of the trial court."

It was further said in the case of Mah See v. North American Accident Insurance Company, 190 Cal. 421, 213 P. 42, 44, 26 A. L. R. 123, that: "This court has frequently held that, even though all the facts are admitted or uncontradicted, nevertheless, if it appears that either one of two inferences may fairly and reasonably be deduced from those facts there still remains in the case a question of fact to be determined by the jury (or by the trial judge where the case is tried without a jury), and that the verdict of the jury or the finding of the trial judge thereon cannot be set aside by this court on the ground that it is not sustained by the evidence. Anderson v. Los Angeles Transfer Co., 170 Cal. 66, 148 P. 212. In so far as the evidence is subject to opposing inferences, it must upon a review thereof be regarded in the light most favorable to the support of the judgment. Woodard v. Glenwood Lumber Co., 171 Cal. 513, 519, 520, 153 P. 951; Hassell v. Bunge, 167 Cal. 365, 367, 139 P. 800. 'In reviewing a question of this kind, all the inferences reasonably possible from the evidence favorable to the plaintiff (the prevailing party) must be indulged by this court.' Bandle v. Commercial Bank of Los Angeles, 178 Cal. 546, 547, 174 P. 44, 45."

[5, 6] The undisputed evidence of Baumstark shows that he knew that children were playing around his truck prior to the time that he started it. He walked around the rear of the truck to see that no children were there, then went to its right side, where he stepped up on the running board and stood "for a few minutes to see if everything was clear." The laundry wagon was equipped with a high body built out of wood with a cab over the driver's seat. Just how long Baumstark stood on the running board is not clear. A few minutes certainly would mean more than one minute. His view of the left-hand side of the truck was obscured by the body and cab during this period. It is entirely possible that Jose Parra approached the left-hand side of the truck during this time and was not seen by Baumstark. The fact that the child was not seen by him when he threw the laundry bag into the truck and walked around the rear of it would permit the reasonable inference that the baby approached the left side of the truck during this time and was in a position of danger when the truck started upon its backward course. Whether due care required Baumstark to have looked further for children in places of danger before backing his truck was a question of fact for the jury to determine. The jury by its verdict concluded that Baumstark was guilty of negligence in the operation of the truck and therefore resolved this question against appellant. There being a reasonable inference to be drawn from the evidence pointing toward negligence upon the part of the driver of the truck, we cannot disturb the verdict of the jury by holding that it was not supported by the evidence.

Appellant complains that the trial court refused to give an instruction upon punitive damages which had been requested by him. This instruction was as follows: "You are instructed that the plaintiff does not ask for, neither are you permitted to award, what is termed punitive damages in this case, or to add anything to your verdict by way of punishment of the defendants. Such damages as you may award must be reasonable, and be proven by the plaintiff by the fair preponderance of the evidence. You can only award damages to plaintiff for permanent injury or disability to the extent that you believe from the preponderance of the evidence as a whole, that the child has been permanently injured as a result of the accident complained of." In support of his argument that it was prejudicial error to fail to give this instruction, he cites the cases Mabb v. Stewart, 133 Cal. 556, 65 P. 1085, and Spencer v. San Francisco Brick Co., 5 Cal. App. 126, 89 P. 851, which hold that in a proper case it is reversible error for the court to refuse an instruction on punitive damages.

[7] "A judgment will not be reversed because of the giving or refusing of instructions which do not harm the appellant. To justify a reversal, under the Constitution it must appear, from a consideration of all the evidence, that any error in this respect resulted in a miscarriage of justice. It is not necessary to invoke the remedial provision of the Constitution to show that errors in instructions are harmless where the verdict would be the same with correct instructions." 2 Cal. Jur. 1026. Without holding that the requested instruction should have been given, but assuming that the court should have done so, we must determine whether or not appellant suffered any prejudice by the refusal of the court to give it.

[8] An examination of the evidence shows that Jose Parra was very seriously injured. His attending physician described his wounds as follows: "The child was immediately taken to the operating room for examination and I found a cut beginning on the right side of the head at the outer corner of the eye, piercing the skin of the upper eye-lid over to the nose and across the nose into the left eyebrow and right upward and backward over the crown of the head and ending about two and a half to three inches above and just posterior to the right ear. Another cut extended from the bridge of the nose below the right eye going just below the eyelid and ending about one-half inch below the end of the other cut. The flap of the scalp was turned back on a straight line from the end of the cut to the rear to the outer corner of the right eye, the skin and soft tissues and muscles being pulled back. Also the periosteum being torn off and slipped loose from the parietal bone of the skull." This physician further testified that it took between thirty and fifty stitches to suture the wounds. The child was under the care of this physician for three weeks when he was taken to the County Hospital, where he remained for over five months under treatment. The lid of the right eye had been so badly torn that it became everted, and at the time of the trial, about a year after the accident, it could not be closed. It was the opinion of experts that this condition could only be cured by one or more operations. There was some evidence tending to show that the sight of the right eye was seriously impaired. However, the weight of this evidence was to a certain extent negated by a showing that this condition might have been caused from a chronic disease of the blood from which the child was suffering.

[9] Considering the seriousness of the injuries, we believe that the verdict of the jury awarding damages in the sum of $1,950 was not excessive. Certainly it carried no punitive damages as the amount awarded could only be considered as moderately compensatory for the injuries suffered. We therefore conclude that the appellant suffered no injury or damage by the failure of the trial court to give his proposed instruction upon the question of punitive damages. This being the case, we are precluded by the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution from disturbing the verdict.

Judgment affirmed.

JORDAN v. GREAT WESTERN MOTORWAYS et al. *

Civ. 129.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

Dec. 1, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 20, 1930. Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Jan. 29, 1931.

1. Trial ⇐253(1).

Instructions purporting to contain conditions necessary to verdict must embody all pleaded defenses on which substantial evidence has been introduced.

2. Appeal and error ⇐1170(9).

In personal injury action, giving plaintiff's formula instructions stating circumstances authorizing verdict for plaintiff, but not embodying element of contributory negligence, held prejudicial error (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Formula instructions given at plaintiff's request told jury circumstances under which they could find verdict for plaintiff, which included reference to negligence of defendant as proximate cause of automobile accident and resulting injuries to plaintiff. Instructions, however, made no reference to contributory negligence of plaintiff, which was an issue before jury, and in fact conceded to be an issue by certain instructions covering subject of contributory negligence requested by plaintiff and given.

3. Appeal and error ⇐1170(9).

Giving of conflicting instructions covering subject of right of way at intersection as between respective automobiles held prejudicial error (St. 1923, p. 560, § 131, as amended by St. 1925, p. 412, § 15; Const. art. 6, § 4½).

First instruction covering subject of right of way at street intersection as between respective automobiles gave law as it stood prior to St. 1925, p. 412, § 15, amending St. 1923, p. 560, § 131, which amendment was in fact applicable because collision occurred after such amendment went into effect. Subsequent instruction set out provisions of section 131, and a third instruction covered duty of bus driver to yield right of way and that failure to do so constituted negligence.

4. Automobiles ⇐245(64).

Whether negligence of respective drivers of automobiles which collided at street intersection is independent or concurrent is generally for jury.

⇐For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

*Hearing granted 2 P.(2d) 786.

5. Appeal and error ⇨1001(1).

Finding of jury on question whether negligence of drivers of respective automobiles is independent or concurrent is conclusive on appeal if supported by any evidence.

6. Automobiles ⇨245(87, 88).

Whether guest was contributorily negligent, so as to preclude recovery for injuries sustained in collision in action against owners of both automobiles, held for jury under evidence.

7. Evidence ⇨474(8).

Person having opportunity to observe speed of moving vehicle is qualified to give opinion regarding speed, and previous lack of experience goes only to weight of testimony.

8. Evidence ⇨474(3).

Lay witnesses having requisite opportunity for observation may testify regarding health of another.

9. Damages ⇨166(1).Evidence ⇨471(13).

In personal injury action, permitting theatrical booking agent to testify that plaintiff, an acrobatic dancer, was in poor health, held not erroneous, because immaterial and calling for conclusion.

10. Damages ⇨158(1).

Testimony showing plaintiff suffered from vaginal bleeding after injury in automobile collision held properly admitted under pleadings.

Testimony that plaintiff suffered from vaginal bleeding for a long time after injury was objected to on ground that internal injuries were not within issues as framed. Complaint alleged that plaintiff received severe bruises, gashes, and injuries as result of the collision.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Charles L. Allison, Judge.

Action by Irene Jordan against the Great Western Motorways and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Reversed.

Bryce P. Gibbs, of Los Angeles, for appellant Great Western Motorways.

Swing & Wilson, of San Bernardino, for appellant Eslow.

A. S. Maloney and Martin J. Coughlin, both of San Bernardino, for respondent.

CARY, P. J.

Plaintiff brought this action against the defendants Eslow and the Great Western Motor-ways, a corporation, hereinafter referred to as Motorways, to recover for personal injuries sustained in a collision between Eslow's car and a bus belonging to Motorways. Defendant Eslow filed his answer denying the allegations of the complaint and the defendant Motorways did likewise and further set up the defense of contributory negligence. A jury brought in a verdict against both defendants from which each defendant has appealed.

The defendants severally contend that the judgment should be reversed because (1) certain errors in the instructions given were prejudicial; (2) each contends that the other was alone to blame; (3) each contends that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence sufficient to bar her recovery; (4) that certain evidence regarding the speed of the automobiles and the condition of the health of plaintiff was given by lay witnesses who were without the qualifications necessary to give such testimony, and (5) that evidence admitted regarding internal injuries was not within the issues.

The accident took place March 1, 1928, in the city of San Bernardino at the intersection of Sixth street and Arrowhead avenue. Arrowhead avenue runs north and south, while Sixth street runs east and west across it. It is a blind intersection at which the permissive speed is 15 miles per hour. Plaintiff, an acrobatic dancer by profession, was the guest of defendant Eslow, riding in his automobile. Eslow's car, going east on Sixth street, and the Motorways bus going north on Arrowhead avenue, were approaching this intersection at or about the same time. As Eslow approached the intersection his view was partially obstructed by three other cars in the vicinity. One of these cars just ahead of him and going east on Sixth street turned south on Arrowhead avenue, another, coming south on Arrowhead avenue, turned west on Sixth street, and a third, going south on Arrowhead avenue, crossed directly in front of Eslow and proceeded south. The jury might well have believed from the evidence that in spite of the fact that it was a blind intersection and that each driver's view was further obstructed by the other three cars mentioned defendant Eslow drove his car through the intersection at 20 miles an hour and collided with the bus without even seeing it until just at the moment of impact and that the Motorways bus at the same time was passing through the intersection at a speed estimated between 30 and 40 miles an hour and that the driver of the bus was not keeping a lookout and failed to see Eslow's car. Plaintiff, seated on Eslow's right, noticed the bus a few seconds before the collision, whereupon she immediately cried out to Eslow to look out. The evidence is somewhat uncertain as to whether Eslow's car ran into the bus or the bus ran into Eslow's car, but, in any event, they came together at a point within the southeast quarter of the intersection and the bus traveled approximately 150 feet north of the north curb line of Sixth street before it was brought to a stop.

Numerous objections are made to the instructions. It may be noted at the outset that by instruction No. 1, given at plaintiff's request, the jury were told that the burden was upon plaintiff to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that plaintiff was free from contributory negligence, while by instruction No. 11, also given at plaintiff's request, they were told that the burden was upon defendants to prove that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence.

By instruction No. 6—a formula instruction—given at plaintiff's request, the jury were told that if the negligence of defendant Eslow proximately contributed to the accident and plaintiff's injuries their verdict "must be for plaintiff and against said defendant," also that if the negligence of defendant Motorways proximately contributed to the accident and plaintiff's injuries their verdict "must be for the plaintiff and against said defendant," also that if the negligence of both defendants "contributed or proximately caused" the accident and plaintiff's injuries their verdict "must be for the plaintiff and against both said defendants." By instruction No. 7—another formula instruction—also given at plaintiff's request, the jury were told that if defendants or either of them were not driving his or its automobile at a careful and prudent speed and such driving proximately contributed to the collision their verdict "must be in favor of plaintiff and against the defendants or defendant" so driving, also that if defendants or either of them were driving at a speed to endanger the life, limb, or property of any person and such driving proximately caused or contributed to the collision their verdict "must be in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant or defendants so driving." It will be noted that in these two instructions the admonition that under certain conditions the jury's verdict "must be in favor of the plaintiff" is repeated five times.

[1, 2] If instructions purport to contain the conditions necessary to a verdict for one party, they must contain all of those conditions and not overlook pleaded defenses on which substantial evidence has been introduced. Beyerle v. Clift, 59 Cal. App. 7, 9, 209 P. 1015; Douglas v. Southern Pacific Co., 203 Cal. 390, 393, 394, 264 P. 237; Sinan v. Atchison, etc., Co. (Cal. App.) 284 P. 1041; Starr v. Los Angeles Railway, 187 Cal. 270, 278, 201 P. 599; Keena v. United Railroads, 57 Cal. App. 124, 126-128, 207 P. 35. By requesting instructions 1 and 11 hereinabove referred to, plaintiff conceded that the question of the contributory negligence of plaintiff was before the jury, yet in plaintiff's formula instructions

Nos. 6 and 7 no reference is made to the fact that before finding a verdict for plaintiff the jury should find plaintiff to be free from contributory negligence. This omission was error.

[3] Defendant Motorways complains of several instructions given at the request of defendant Eslow. In one of these, No. 15, the jury were told that if defendant Eslow, while going at a lawful rate of speed, entered the intersection before the Motorways bus, Eslow had the right of way and it was the duty of the bus driver to yield such right of way to him and if he did not do so and a collision occurred defendant Motorways was guilty of negligence and liable to plaintiff for any injuries proximately caused thereby. While this instruction might possibly have been correct as far as right of way is concerned under the law as it stood prior to the 1925 amendment to section 131 of the Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 560), yet it was not the law at the time the accident happened, since the 1925 amendment was then in effect and provided: "When two vehicles approach an intersection of public highways at approximately the same time, the vehicle approaching from the right shall have the right of way, provided such vehicle is traveling at a lawful speed." Stats. 1925, p. 412, § 15. In instruction No. 9, also given at defendant Eslow's request, there were set out the provisions of section 131 of the Motor Vehicle Act above quoted. Instruction No. 16, likewise given at defendant Eslow's request, told the jury that if Eslow "had the right of way at the intersection of Arrowhead avenue and Sixth street as defined in these instructions" it was the duty of the driver of the bus to yield such right of way and if he did not do so it constituted negligence on the part of the bus driver. It is at once apparent that by No. 15 the court gave to the jury the law regarding rights of way at intersections as it stood before the 1925 amendment, while by instruction No. 9 it gave them the law as it stood after the 1925 amendment—a direct conflict—and then by No. 16 the jury were told that if Eslow had the right of way "as defined in these instructions" and the Motorways bus did not yield it to him defendant Motorways was negligent. Since the jury might well have found that the defendant Eslow was the first to enter the intersection, and at the same time it is an undisputed fact that the Motorways bus was approaching from the right, it can be seen that a jury could not help but be confused by these conflicting instructions.

Plaintiff, in a brief evidencing commendable diligence in research, contends that these errors were not prejudicial and should not warrant a reversal of the judgment. We are not unmindful of the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, nor of the decisions in this state in which errors in instructions have been held without prejudice where, notwithstanding, the reviewing court has been able to conclude that the jury were fully and fairly instructed on the law of the case. But here not only were the jury instructed that the burden was upon both plaintiff and the defendants to prove the facts regarding contributory negligence, but in five different instances the jury were told that their verdict must be for the plaintiff under certain conditions which did not include the necessary condition that plaintiff be free from contributory negligence, and further the jury were given an instruction which, under the facts in the case, might well have given them to understand that both defendants had the right of way and yet were further instructed that if they should find that the defendant Eslow had the right of way, the failure of defendant Motorways to yield that right of way was negligence. Under these circumstances we feel that it cannot be said that the jury were fully and fairly instructed as to the law nor can it be said that the errors complained of were without prejudice.

As the errors in instructions will necessitate a new trial, we shall proceed to consider some of the other questions presented by the record.

[4, 5] Regarding the contention of each defendant that the other was alone to blame it is quite apparent from the evidence that the negligence of the defendants, if any, was concurrent and so simultaneous as to allow no break between cause and effect. As to defendant Eslow, viewing the evidence in its aspect most favorable to plaintiff, the jury could well have believed that although his car could have been stopped in ten feet had it been going at the rate that he testified, yet it traveled 55 feet after plaintiff had called his attention to the danger from the bus, while as to defendant Motorways the jury might well have concluded that its bus was passing through the intersection at 30 to 40 miles an hour. Furthermore, the question of whether the negligence of two defendants is independent or concurrent is generally one for the jury. Springer v. Pacific Fruit Exchange, 92 Cal. App. 732, 738, 739, 268 P. 951. And if there be evidence to support it, their finding is conclusive on this court. Dougherty v. Ellingson, 97 Cal. App. 87, 93, 275 P. 456; Gett v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co., 192 Cal. 621, 625, 626, 221 P. 376.

[6] Regarding the alleged contributory negligence of plaintiff, this court, under the facts, cannot say as a matter of law that plaintiff neglected to use that care which was necessary under the circumstances.

[7] Defendants complain of several alleged errors in the admission of evidence. Plaintiff, over objection of counsel that she was not qualified so to do, was allowed to testify as to the speed of the motor bus and Eslow's car. It has been repeatedly held that a person having the opportunity to observe the speed of a moving vehicle is qualified to give his opinion as to such speed and that his previous experience or lack of experience goes only to the weight rather than to the competency of his testimony. Kramm v. Stockton Electric R. Co., 22 Cal. App. 737, 755, 756, 136 P. 523; Hutchinson v. Miller & Lux, Inc., 60 Cal. App. 1, 5, 212 P. 394; Scragg v. Sallee, 24 Cal. App. 133, 141, 142, 140 P. 706; Shropshire v. Pickwick Stages, 85 Cal. App. 216, 223, 258 P. 1107; Bowman v. Motor Transit Co. (Cal. Sup.) 284 P. 443.

[8, 9] Complaint is further made that the witness Halperin, a theatrical booking agent and friend of plaintiff, was allowed to testify regarding plaintiff as follows:

"Q. Do you know whether or not she was in good health or not? A. No she was in poor health."

The question was objected to as immaterial and calling for the conclusion of the witness. Lay witnesses having the requisite opportunity for observation may testify as to the health of another. Robinson v. Exempt Fire Co., 103 Cal. 1, 5, 6, 36 P. 955, 24 L. R. A. 715, 42 Am. St. Rep. 93; Chicago, etc., Ry. Co. v. Van Vleck, 143 Ill. 480, 32 N. E. 262, 263; Ewing v. Wichita R. & L. Co., 91 Kan. 388, 137 P. 940.

[10] Defendant Motorways urges that plaintiff was allowed improperly to testify that she had suffered from vaginal bleeding (a term used by the physician) for a long time after the injury, the objection being that internal injuries were not within the issues as framed. The complaint contains the following: "That the said plaintiff herein received severe bruises, gashes and injuries as a result of said collision." This allegation was sufficiently broad to admit the testimony complained of. Samuels v. California, etc., Ry. Co., 124 Cal. 294, 296, 56 P. 1115; Martin v. Pacific G. & E. Co., 203 Cal. 291, 302, 303, 264 P. 246; Dullanty v. Smith, 203 Cal. 621, 626, 265 P. 814; Lauder v. Currier, 3 Cal. App. 28, 29, 84 P. 217.

The judgment is reversed as to both defendants.

COLEMAN v. DAWSON.

Civ. 4205.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

Dec. 4, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 3, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 2, 1931.1. Assignments ⇨41.

Scrivener's error in respect to interest transferred in contract was immaterial, where assignment of proper interest was made as part of same transaction.

Although it appeared that scrivener incorrectly inserted one-twentieth in contract for transfer of undivided interest in letters patent, intention of parties was nevertheless properly carried out by execution and delivery as part of same transaction pursuant to understanding of parties under same date and assignment of undivided two-twentieths interest, which was the amount intended to be transferred.

2. Contracts ⇨164.

Separate instruments executed and accepted at same time as part of same transaction must be construed together.

3. Vendor and purchaser ⇨22.

Description of ranch in contract for conveyance as land consisting of 94.6 acres located about 4 miles northeast from Porterville was adequate.

Since description enabled absolute identification, and it was apparent that owner was attempting to designate a particular ranch which he proposed to convey, rather than a specific acreage, it was immaterial that tract actually contained 96.055 acres, instead of 94.6 acres.

4. Alteration of Instruments ⇨24(1).

Contract to convey ranch with adequate description to identify property was properly admitted, regardless of addition of specific description acknowledged as correct.

5. Alteration of Instruments ⇨2.

Alteration of instrument is material, affecting validity, only when it results in changing intention of parties so as to substantially affect interests.

6. Exchange of property ⇨4.

Transfer of stock in corporation to manufacture and sell patented machines was not condition precedent to obligation to convey land under contract for interest in patent.

The contract for transfer of interest in patent in accordance with contemporaneous agreement to convey land in consideration thereof acknowledged receipt of $10,000 as payment in full of undivided interest in and to letters patent, with further provision that, in case owners of patent later decided to form a corporation to finance sale and development of mechanical device, grantee of interest therein would join in transferring and conveying his interest to corporation in consideration of issuance to him of specified percentage of total capital stock.

7. Specific performance ⇨114(2).

Complaint in action to enforce specific performance of agreement to convey land in exchange for interest in patent sufficiently alleged adequacy and fairness of consideration.

The complaint alleged that real property described in agreement to convey was at all times and was now of value of less than $8,000, and that value of undivided interest in patent transferred in accordance with agreement was and was at time of execution of agreement the sum of $10,000, which amounted to specific declaration that $2,000 promissory note given for interest in addition to asserted value of land did not exceed value of conveyed interest in patent rights.

8. Pleading ⇨406(5), 433(7).

Any defect in form of allegation as to adequacy and fairness of consideration is waived by failure to demur and cured by findings and judgment.

9. Appeal and error ⇨931(1).

Appellate court, unless evidence is pointed out to contrary, will assume that evidence amply supports findings.

10. Appeal and error ⇨901.

Appellate court is not bound to search record for evidence to sustain finding.

11. Appeal and error ⇨931(1).

Appellate court, where attention is not called to evidence to contrary, must assume that record supports findings that transfer of patent interest was fully consummated.

12. Specific performance ⇨71.

Specific performance is proper action to enforce contract to convey patent rights.

13. Courts ⇨489(3).

State courts have jurisdiction in proper action to enforce contract to convey patent rights.

14. Exchange of property ⇨8(4).

Evidence held to sustain finding that contract for exchange of land for interest in patent was not procured by means of fraud.

There was evidence to support statements made by owner of patent rights respecting cost of patent to him and cost of manufacturing machine, in addition to which it was found that purchaser of patent interest did not wholly rely upon statements, but made independent investigation and watched operation of the machine, thereafter declaring he was satisfied with it and would buy share in patent rights if owner would take ranch in part payment therefor.

15. Exchange of property ⇨3(1).

Alleged statements of owner of patent that machine could be leased and operated at profit were mere expressions of opinion and may not furnish basis of action for rescission.

16. Vendor and purchaser ⇨37(4).

Assertions as to value of property or profit which may be earned are ordinarily classed as mere opinions.

17. Appeal and error ⇨926(5).

Objection to admission of certified copy of patent must be assumed to have been properly sustained in absence of request to have it marked for identification.

Since attention of appellate court was not called to any request to mark certified patent for identification and objection to its admission in evidence was sustained, it must be presumed that it was not a proper part of record on appeal, and appellate court was therefore unable to determine whether it was in fact a machine similar in character to one involved in action and therefore material to issues.

18. Specific performance ⇨129.

Loss of rental on land wrongfully detained to date of judgment held issue under pleadings and properly allowed (Civ. Code, § 3283; Code Civ. Proc. § 580).

Complaint in action to specifically enforce agreement to convey property alleged reasonable value of use and occupation of property and asked damages for detention of premises for specified years and for such other sum as might accrue before rendition of judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; F. C. Valentine, Judge.

Action by R. B. Coleman, also known as Robert B. Coleman, against John B. Dawson. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

See, also, By-Products Fuel Mach. Co. v. Dawson, 294 P. 19.

Edward Winterer and Winterer & Ritchie, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Bordwell, Mathews & Wadsworth and Odell S. McConnell, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

Mr. Justice R. L. THOMPSON delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an appeal from a decree enforcing specific performance of an agreement to convey real property.

The defendant owned a tract of land four miles northeast of Porterville, consisting of 96.055 acres. The plaintiff owned five United States patents covering a machine designed to manufacture and compress certain by-products into briquettes for fuel purposes. January 10, 1924, a written agreement was executed between these parties for the sale of an undivided one-tenth interest in these patent rights for $10,000, to be paid by the promissory note of the defendant for the sum of $2,000 and the conveyance of the Porterville ranch at a valuation of $8,000. The terms and conditions of the agreement were incorporated in three documents executed at the same time. These instruments are construed together as a part of the same transaction. The first two are in the following language:

"Receipt for Payment on Account of Purchase of Interest in Letters Patent Covering Material Compressing Machine

"The undersigned, R. B. Coleman of Los Angeles, California, the owner of United States Letters Patent Nos. 1,067,476, July 15, 1913; 1,113,121, October 6, 1914; 1,260,514, March 26, 1918; 1,260,605, March 26, 1918, and 1,310,004, July 15, 1919, covering a certain machine or mechanical device designed primarily for compressing by-products and waste materials, Herewith Acknowledge the receipt of Ten Thousand Dollars ($10,000.00) to him in hand paid by John B. Dawson of Los Angeles, California, as payment in full of an undivided one-twentieth interest in and to said Letters Patent and in and to said Invention and Device.

"Within five (5) days after date, the undersigned agrees to Make, Execute and Deliver to John B. Dawson, a formal Transfer and Assignment of said interest in said Letters Patent and said Invention and Agrees to cause the same to be recorded and entered on the records of the United States Patent Office at Washington, D. C.

"It Is Understood and Agreed that should the owners of said Letters Patent later decide to form a corporation to finance the sale and development of said Mechanical Device and Invention, the said John B. Dawson will join with the undersigned in transferring and conveying his interest in and to said Letters Patent and said Invention to said corporation in consideration of the issuance to him of one-twelfth ($\frac{1}{12}$) of the total capital stock thereof. This provision, however, is not to be construed as a subscription to the capital stock of any corporation.

"Dated this Tenth day of January, 1924.

"Robert B. Coleman

"Accepted: John B. Dawson."

"Los Angeles, Cal., Jan. 10/24

"I hereby agree to convey to R. B. Coleman free and clear of incumbrance except 2d installment of taxes 1923-24 my land consisting of 946/10 acres located about 4 miles Northeast from Porterville, Cal. Certificate of Title showing the land clear in my name to be furnished not to cost more than $25.00 with delivery of Deed.

"John B. Dawson."

[1] The defendant's answer admits the execution of the first document above quoted, except that it is alleged the plaintiff agreed to sell and transfer an undivided two-twentieths interest in the patents instead of only one-twentieth therein as erroneously recited in the document. This error was conceded. It was immediately corrected. The court found that the scrivener incorrectly inserted "one-twentieth" in the document instead of the agreed two-twentieths interest in the patents. The appellant may not complain of this error, for the intention of the parties was promptly carried out. As a part of the same transaction, and pursuant to the understanding of the parties, the plaintiff executed and delivered to the defendant, on the same date, an assignment of an undivided two-twentieths interest in the patents, which transfer was indorsed and signed by the defendant as accepted. This assignment contained the following language:

"Now Therefore, For and in consideration of the sum of Ten Dollars (\$10.00) to me in hand paid and other good and valuable consideration paid, I said Robert B. Coleman, have sold and by these presents do hereby sell, assign and set over to the said John B. Dawson, an undivided two-twentieths ($\frac{2}{20}$) interest in and to each and all of the above-identified letters patents and application for patent, the same to be held and enjoyed by the said John B. Dawson jointly with me and not independently of me, and with the distinct understanding that neither of us can operate under said patents or assign or obligate our interests without the written consent of the other, except that I the Robert B. Coleman can make similar assignments to others who will become partners with us in the ownership of said patents, and I do hereby authorize and request the Commissioner of Patents to issue the patent on the application above identified as Serial No. 590708, in accordance with this assignment.

In part fulfillment of the foregoing agreement of sale and exchange of properties, the defendant executed and delivered to the plaintiff on the same date his promissory note for $2,000, without interest, due one year from the date thereof. The balance of the $10,000, which was the consideration for the sale and exchange of properties mentioned in the first document heretofore quoted, consisted of the Porterville ranch of the agreed value of $8,000, which the defendant was to convey to the plaintiff. Upon demand the defendant refused to deed this land to the plaintiff. Thereupon this suit for specific performance was commenced.

The defendant's answer admits the execution and delivery of the instruments above quoted, but alleges the invalidity of the transaction on account of the clerical error of inserting in the first-mentioned document the word "one twentieth" instead of "two-twentieths," the transfer of which undivided shares were agreed upon by the parties. The answer further alleges that the second instrument heretofore quoted was rendered void on account of the addition thereto, by the plaintiff, after the defendant had signed and delivered the document, of a particular description of the land in question. It was then alleged the agreement was for a transfer of an unqualified two-twentieths interest in the patent rights whereas the plaintiff had assigned only a joint interest therein to be enjoyed in common with the plaintiff and other joint share owners with the restriction that "neither of us can operate under said patents or assign or obligate our interests without the written consent of the other." The answer further alleges that the transaction was inequitable since the real property was worth $10,000 instead of $8,000 as contemplated by the contract. Finally, the answer attempts to allege that the agreement to exchange the properties was procured by means of fraud, consisting of false representations that the plaintiff had expended $100,000 in perfecting the machine upon which he held the patents involved in this action; that the machine would successfully manufacture marketable pressed briquettes at a cost which would enable them to be sold at a good profit; that the machine could be manufactured at a cost which would justify its sale for $1,600, and that the machines could be leased for a rental of $2,500 for the period of the term of the patents in addition to 50 cents royalty per ton on all briquettes manufactured; that all of said representations were false and that the defendant relied upon them and was thereby deceived and defrauded to his damage. The answer then alleges that the agreement to purchase the patent rights is void, and that the defendant duly served upon the plaintiff a notice of rescission and an offer to restore to him everything of value received on account of said transaction. Thereupon the defendant prays that the agreement and the $2,000 note be annulled.

The court adopted findings favorable to the plaintiff on all the material issues. A decree was rendered directing that the Porterville ranch be forthwith conveyed to the plaintiff, and that he recover $300 damages as the rental value thereof during the period that he was wrongfully deprived of the possession. From this judgment the defendant has appealed.

[2] The three documents heretofore quoted appear to have been intended by the parties as a part of the same transaction. They were executed and accepted at the same time. They should, therefore, be construed together as one instrument in ascertaining the terms and intention of the contracting parties. 6 Cal. Jur. 298, § 181.

[3] The reference to the defendant's ranch, which appears in the foregoing instrument No. 2, as "my land consisting of 94 $\frac{9}{10}$ acres located about 4 miles northeast from Porterville, Cal.," is an adequate description to bind the owner under the circumstances of this case. It enabled the court to absolutely identify the tract. It is immaterial that the tract actually contained 96.055 acres instead of only 94.6 acres. It is apparent the owner was attempting to designate a particular ranch which he proposed to convey as part consideration for the patent rights, rather than a specific acreage. The difference in the acreage is small and unimportant. After signing and delivering the agreement to convey that ranch, the plaintiff procured and added to the instrument a more definite description of the land. When this document was shown to the defendant at the trial with the addition of the more particular description, which was appended thereto, it was read to him. He testified: "If that is a correct description of the land, I own it." Subsequently he admitted that it was a correct description of the property. Referring to this description, which was compared with that which is contained in the certificate of title, Mr. Dawson testified:

"Q. Did you compare the description Mr. Dawson? A. Yes sir.

"Q. Is it a correct description? A. It is. * * *

"Q. Now calling your attention to the Plaintiff's Exhibit 3 (the agreement to convey real estate) I will ask you if the property described in paragraph 1 of the second amended complaint is the same property as the property described in Plaintiff's Exhibit, to-wit, 94.6 acres located about four miles northeast of Porterville, Tulare County? * * * A. Yes. * * * It is the same property."

The addition of the particular description of the property to the agreement to convey it does not alter the intent of the parties.

[4, 5] There was, therefore, no error in admitting this instrument in evidence over the objection of the defendant, after the addition of the specific description had been acknowledged as correct. The alteration of the document constituted no material change. An alteration of an instrument is said to be material so as to affect its validity only when it results in changing the intention of the parties so as to substantially affect their interests. Jones on Evidence (3d Ed.) §69, § 560; 1 Cal. Jur. 1068, § 4; Lasky v. Bew, 22 Cal. App. 393, 395, 134 P. 353; 1 R. C. L. 967, § 4. In the authority last cited it is said: "That is a material alteration which so changes the terms of the instrument as to give it a different legal effect from that which it originally had and thus works some change in the rights, interests, or obligations of the parties."
